This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) July 31, 1899.

ROCHE v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Ship—Limitation of liability—Sum paid into Admiralty Division—Actions under Lord Campbell's Act in the Queen's Bench Division—Transfer of actions.

The owners of a ship, on which great loss of life had occurred in consequence of the negligence of their servants, obtained in the Admiralty Division an order limiting their liability to £15,400, and they paid that sum into the Admiralty Division. Actions under Lord Campbell's Act having been commenced against the owners in the Queen's Bench Division,

Held, that there was no reason for transferring such actions to the Admiralty Division.

Appeal from the refusal of Lawrance, J., to order the transfer of an action from the Queen's Bench Division to the Admiralty Division.

The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act against the London and South-Western Railway Co., as the owners of the steamship Stella, to recover damages in respect of the death of the plaintiff's husband, which was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants in the navigation of The Stella, whereby the ship and a great number of lives were lost.

Before the issue of the writ the defendants had commenced proceedings in the Admiralty Division under section 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for limitation of their liability, and Bucknill, J., made an order limiting their liability to £15 for each ton of the ship's tonnage, which amounted to £15,404. The defendants paid this sum into the Admiralty Division.

Other similar actions having been commenced in the Queen's Bench Division, and more being anticipated, the defendants, treating this action as a test case, applied at chambers for an order for the transfer of the action to the Admiralty Division, on the ground that the sum to be distributed being in the Admiralty Division, it would be more convenient and less expensive if all the actions arising out of the matter were tried in that division. Lawrance, J., dismissed the application.

The defendants appealed.

R. B. D. Acland, for the defendants.

Rawlinson, Q.C., and F. M. Abrahams, for the plaintiff.

A. L. SMITH, L. J.—In my opinion Lawrance, J., has exercised his discretion rightly. There is no reason why the plaintiff should not have her claim assessed by a jury as she wishes. A jury, and not a registrar and merchants, is the proper tribunal to assess damages in an action like this. I think the proper course for the defendants is to let judgment go by default in each of the actions, and the plaintiffs will then go to the Sheriff's Court and have their damages assessed by a sheriff's jury. The defendants have paid into court the sum at which their liability is limited, and it is inmaterial to them what proportion each plaintiff receives. They are entitled to have execution stayed in each action until damages have been assessed in all, and then the total sum will be divided into sums proportionate to the amounts at which the damages of the various plaintiffs have been assessed. The decision in The Nereid, 37 W. R. 688, 14 P. D. 78, is in favour of the course which I am now adopting.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., concurred.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

On the 29th of March, 1899, the plaintiff was the duly registered holder of 500 fully-paid shares of £1 each in the True Blue (Hannan's) Gold Mine (Limited).

At meetings of the company held on the 29th of March, 1899, and the 19th of April, 1899, at which the plaintiff was not present, a special resolution was duly passed and confirmed providing for the reconstruction and voluntary winding up of the company, the appointment of a liquidator, and the registration of a new company to be called by the same name.

By an agreement dated the 24th of April, 1899, and made between the old company and the liquidator of the one part and the new company of the other, it was agreed that the old company and the liquidator should transfer, and the new company should take over all the property and business of the old company as therein set out; that, as part of the consideration for the transfer, the new company should undertake to satisfy the debts and liabilities of the old company, and that the new company should pay the costs and expenses of winding up the old company. By clause 4 it was provided that, as the residue of the consideration for the transfer, every member of the old company should in respect of each share held by him be entitled as of right to claim an allotment for himself or his nominee of one £1 share in the new company with the sum of 17s. credited as paid up thereon, and that the new company should allot the shares so claimed. Clause 5 provided as follows: "A member entitled to claim an allotment as aforesaid must claim the same within twenty-one days from the date hereof or such further time (not exceeding fourteen days) as the new company shall determine, by sending in to the new company a claim in writing for the allotment of the shares, and such claim must be signed by the member making the same, and must be accompanied by the sum of one shilling per share claimed; and where it requests that the allotment be made to a nominee of such member, it must be countersigned by such nominee." Clause 6 provided that the liquidator should, within the next seven days, give notice in writing of the agreement to each member of the old company; and by clause 7 the liquidator, when sending such notice, was to invite the members of the old company, other than dissentient members within the meaning of section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, to apply for such shares of the new company as, but for their dissent, would have been claimed by the dissentient members, and also for such of the shares of the new company as members of the old company other than dissentient members should be entitled to claim but should not claim within the limited period (all of which shares were referred to as surplus shares); and in the event of more than the surplus shares being applied for the new company were to accept the applications, and allot the surplus shares rateably according to the holding in the old company of the number applying. The new company were to be under no obligation to accept any such application, and if any such application were refused, or accepted in part only, the sum remitted with the application, or the due proportion thereof, was to be returned to the member. Under clause 8 such of the surplus shares as the members of the old company, other than dissentient members, should be entitled to claim, but should not within twenty-one days claim, and as should not be allotted under clause 7, were to be allotted to W. F. Turner under a prior underwriting agreement.

At the end of April, 1899, the plaintiff received notice of the agreement, and a form of application for shares in the new company. He went abroad on the 19th of May, and through inadvertence did not send in his form of application for shares in the new company until the 26th of May. The defendants refused to allot him any shares in the new company on the ground that he was out of time.

The plaintiff therefore brought this action against the two companies and the liquidator, and moved before Kekewich, J., for an injunction to restrain the old company and the liquidator from transferring or dealing with, and the new company from allotting, any shares in the new company until the plaintiff's claim to have shares allotted to him was first provided for.

Kekewich, J., granted the injunction asked for, and the defendants appealed.

LINDLEY, M.R., said: In this case it appears to me that the appellants are entitled to succeed. I think that, when you come to look at it, it is impossible to take the view that this scheme is open to the objections in point of law which Mr. Lawrence has urged against it. First of all it must be borne in mind that we are not asked to approve of a scheme. It is said that the working of some of these provisions is or may be a hardship upon the plaintiff or other persons similarly situated. If we were asked to approve the scheme, it may be that we ought to listen to that; but our function here is quite different. The scheme has been considered and duly passed by meetings of shareholders, and has become binding upon all concerned if it can be made binding, that is, if it is not ultra vires. What we have now to decide is a pure question of law. In order to settle that question of law we must look at the section—section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862—which authorizes, or is supposed to authorize, what has here been done, and see whether the provisions of this agreement come within the authority the Legislature has conferred upon majorities of shareholders. [His lordship read the section, stated the material provisions of the agreement, and proceeded:] It is in practice, and as a business matter, impossible to work out a matter of this kind unless a time for sending in claims is fixed. If the time fixed were so short as to be unreasonable it would, of course, be set aside by the court; but without some time limit you cannot work this arrangement through. If no time limit was fixed the law would imply that the claims must be sent in within a reasonable time, and there would be endless disputes about what was a reasonable time. There can therefore be no objection to a provision of that sort. Clause 6 of the agreement requires that the liquidator of the old company shall, within seven days from the date thereof, give notice in writing of the agreement to each member of the old company. It is plain from the terms of the agreement itself that it was foreseen that there may be, and probably will be, some persons, members of the old company, who have not sent in their claims within that period, and, if so, invitations are to be sent out to the shareholders of the old company to apply for the surplus shares. Then it is further stated that the application made to the new company must mention the number of surplus shares which the member is willing to take, and must be delivered to the new company within twenty-one days. The new company, of course, is not under any obligation to accept those applications. That is plain, and in fact the agreement says so expressly. Suppose the new company did not accede to any of the applications made to them: the result is that they have got the shares and the assets of the old company, and they are therefore the masters of the situation. Then comes clause 8. When you look at that clause and consider that this is a scheme by which the new company took over the assets of the old, which were transferred upon the consideration of certain obligations undertaken by the new company as to allotment of shares and so on, one of the provisions of the scheme being that the shares shall be at the disposal of the new company, I confess that I think that scheme is quite warranted by section 161. The objection is that this is a provision for forfeiting the shares of the old company; and in a sense, no doubt, you may use that language. But the real effect of the offer is: You, the shareholders, shall have shares in the new company if you choose to take the trouble of applying for them; if you do not apply, you may be treated as saying that you do not care to have them. It appears to me that this is a scheme which is sanctioned in principle by the decision in Postlethwaite v. Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co. I think, indeed, that this case goes one step farther. I have not before seen any scheme worked out in such detail; but, having looked at it, it appears to me that it is warranted by the section. If that is so, this injunction cannot be sustained. The view upon which the learned judge proceeded in granting this injunction has been encouraged by the query in Mr. Buckley's book on Companies (7 ed.), at p. 428, and the doubt raised by him. My predecessor, Lord Esher, in Nicholl v. Eberhardt Co., expressed some doubt as to whether a stipulation in an agreement of this kind that shares not applied for should be at the disposal of the new company was not inconsistent with section 161 of the Companies Act, and therefore void. I now answer the query, and at the same time dissent from the observations of my predecessor. He was not considering a case like this, and he was careful to say that he did not decide the question.

The appeal must be allowed, and the order of the learned judge granting an injunction must be discharged.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that this injunction should be dissolved. In the first place, if the agreement of the 24th of April is valid, the plaintiff has no right to an injunction at all, for the defendants are certainly not doing anything contrary to the provisions of the agreement, or anything outside of its provisions. Therefore, the question in the case comes to this: Was this agreement valid and binding, or was it outside of the powers conferred by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862? It is not suggested that the transaction is not a perfectly honest one. The agreement was honestly entered into by the liquidator and the shareholders as a whole. It is not suggested that it was entered into for any improper purpose. If what has been done is within section 161 of the Companies Act, there is nothing which should induce the court to refuse to allow it to be carried out. I think that when that section is considered it is clear that this agreement is within it. It appears to me that in those circumstances any shareholder who does not like the scheme ought to attend at the meeting and vote against it. If he is outvoted, his next course is to dissent in accordance with section 161. It is no answer to say, "I was ill, or abroad, or careless and negligent, and did not dissent." That is the shareholders' own fault or misfortune; but he has to abide by the provisions of section 161. He cannot claim shares unless he applies for them within the proper time. The truth is that the argument urged before us is based on this, that this scheme ought to be treated as invalid, because sufficient protection is not afforded by it to those shareholders who are ill, or abroad, or weak-minded, or negligent. But the scheme cannot be upset or held invalid on such considerations. It is useless to suppose that a scheme otherwise good would be held bad because it might bear hardly upon certain shareholders who, owing to their own fault or misfortune, were unable to apply for shares within twenty-one days. Really, the case before us has already been decided in principle by prior authorities. There is really no distinction in principle between the present case and some prior cases. If, then, it is only a question of degree, and not of principle, if the agreement is within section 161, there is no reason on the face of it why that agreement should not be acted upon. We must act upon the agreement unless we can show conclusively that it is not within section 161, either because it is a dishonest transaction, or as going beyond what that section authorizes. I have endeavoured to show that it does not go beyond what the section authorizes. It appears to me that it is intra vires, and must be enforced. On that ground the plaintiff's case fails, and he has no right to come to the court and ask for an injunction.

Decision of Romer, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Romer, J.

The plaintiff Mrs. Oliver was an equitable mortgagee by deposit of title deeds of some houses, which the mortgagor, Hill, subsequently sold to the defendant Mary Ann Hinton without notice of the mortgage. The defendant did not employ a solicitor, but managed the transaction through an agent named Price. Price gave evidence that no abstract of title was furnished, and that he did not require one. He did ask to see the deeds, but he was told by the mortgagor that the deeds were in his possession, but would not be delivered to the purchaser because they also related to other property of the mortgagor. Price accepted this assurance, and made no further inquiry whatever. As a result the purchaser was never aware of the existence of the plaintiff's mortgage. The plaintiff having brought an action against the purchaser to enforce her charge, Romer, J., held that she was entitled to priority over the purchaser, on the ground that there had been gross negligence in not requiring the production of the title deeds.

The defendant appealed.

Cavanagh, for the appellant.—In this case there is no question of fraud. It has been repeatedly held that to deprive a purchaser for value without notice of his property there must be gross negligence amounting to fraud. Here an inquiry was made for the deeds, and the purchaser was put off with a reasonable excuse. According to the authorities this would relieve him from a charge of gross negligence.

Rowden, Q.C., and J. B. Mathews, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think that this case presents any serious difficulties when once the facts are understood. The defendant has been cheated by Hill, but she has not been cheated in any way by the plaintiff. In 1888 Hill mortgaged five cottages to the plaintiff, three of which are the subject of this action. This was not a legal mortgage, but an equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds accompanied by a memorandum of deposit by which Hill agreed to execute a legal mortgage when requested by the plaintiff to do so. The plaintiff has therefore a good equitable mortgage, and cannot be charged with any neglect or breach of duty in not obtaining a legal mortgage. She ran the risk, however, of losing her priority in case the legal estate was conveyed to a subsequent purchaser for value without notice of her charge. Who is it now claims to override her charge? The only person who is entitled to do so, if he has acquired his title subsequently to hers, is a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice of the charge. But that does not include a purchaser for value who is so grossly careless that he does not take the ordinary precautions which ought to be taken in such a matter. He may be a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice of a prior charge, but he is not entitled to the protection of the court. I do not base my judgment upon constructive notice, nor do I mean to suggest that there was any fraud or any complicity in fraud on the part of either the defendant or his agent. Price's evidence was given with perfect candour. He was a friend of the defendant, and she left the whole management of the purchase to him. He inquired for the deeds and he was told by Hill that they were in his possession but would not be delivered to the purchaser because they also related to other property. No abstract of title was either asked for or delivered, and there was no further inquiry as to the title. Price in the witness-box admitted that he made a mistake in not asking to see the deeds, but said he relied upon Hill.

Can a purchaser of property be regarded as a bonâ fide purchaser without notice and entitled to the protection of the legal estate when he acts in this way and takes none of the ordinary precautions? To allow a purchaser who acts with such gross carelessness as the defendant did to deprive a prior innocent mortgagee of her priority would be a great injustice. None of the cases cited really assist the defendant with the exception of Ratcliffe v. Barnard. The actual decision in that case was right, but I think that James, L.J., went too far in his judgment when he said that in order to deprive a man of his legal security "he must have been guilty of fraud or of that wilful negligence which leads the court to conclude that he was an accomplice in the fraud." I am not prepared to go that length, and I do not think what was said by James, L.J., is justified by the case of Hunt v. Elmes, 9 W. R. 362, 2 De G. F. & J. 578, to which he referred. In that case and also in Hewitt v. Loosemore it was said that to deprive a man of the protection of the legal estate he must have been guilty of either fraud or gross and wilful negligence. In order to deprive a purchaser for value without notice of a prior incumbrance of the protection of the legal estate I do not think it essential that he should have been guilty of fraud. It is sufficient that he should have been guilty of such gross negligence as to render it unjust to deprive the prior incumbrances of his priority. The appeal must be dismissed.

JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion. I have endeavoured to discover the principle underlying the cases referred to. This class of case depends on mixed questions of fact and law, but so far as I understand them, I think the principle is that there must be gross negligence on the part of the subsequent purchaser for value without notice to disentitle him to the protection of the legal estate. The observations of James, L.J., in Ratcliffe v. Barnard would appear to show that he thought there must have been either fraud on the part of the purchaser or such gross negligence as to lead the court to infer fraud on his part. In this case there is no fraud on the part of the purchaser, only gross negligence in the ordinary sense of the word. But we must look at the judgment of James, L.J., in the light of the other authorities. I think they show that what he meant was, not such conduct as would entitle a jury or a judge at common law to find that there had been actual fraud, but negligence so gross as would justify the Court of Chancery in concluding that there had been fraud in an artificial sense of the word—such gross negligence as consisted in not making an inquiry as to the title to the property. In that sense I think in this case there has been such gross negligence on the part of the defendant as would almost have led the Court of Chancery to impute fraud, although I do not mean to suggest that there has been any fraud in fact. But there has been such gross negligence on the part of the defendant as to disentitle her to be protected as a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiff's charge.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and so entirely concur in what has been said by Lindley, M.R., and Jeune, P., that I will not repeat it. I will only say that I consider that most of the authorities cited as being in favour of the appellant are, when considered, hostile to her. In many of them it is said that if a purchaser makes inquiries and gets an answer with which he might reasonably be satisfied he is excused from making further inquiries. Most of the cases relate to the delivering up of title deeds, but the answer with which the purchaser may rest satisfied must be an answer to the question which, under the circumstances, he ought to ask. In the present case production of the title deeds ought to have been demanded by the purchaser—not delivery. When he was told that the vendor had the deeds he did not (as he ought to have done) say "Let me see them." I do not mean to say that if he had done so the vendor might not have given him an answer which he could reasonably have accepted. But he got no reasonable answer because the question never was put. The vendor was never asked to produce the deeds. With reference to the language of James, L.J., in Ratcliffe v. Barnard, which has been referred to, a court is not bound to treat the language of a judge adopted in a particular case he was dealing with, as laying down a principle of law applicable to other cases. In the present case no proper inquiry was made by the defendant's agent, and it is, in my opinion, just the same thing as if he had made no inquiry at all about the deeds.

Ex parte TWEED. (a.)

Solicitor — Costs—Charging order—Property recovered or preserved—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

A testator devised his estate to his wife for life, and after her death to his two daughters, of whom one was legitimate and the other illegitimate. The daughters having opposed probate of the will, an action was commenced by the executor, in which the will was upheld.

Held, that the solicitor of the executor was entitled to a charging order for his costs on the property devised, as being property preserved through his instrumentality.

Appeal from the refusal of Grantham, J., to make a charging order under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860.

A testator by his will devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his wife for life, and after her death to his two daughters in equal shares. One of the daughters was a legitimate daughter by a former wife, the other was illegitimate. The greater part of the estate was real property. On the death of the testator the daughters opposed probate of the will. The executor commenced an action in the Probate Division to establish the will, and the case was tried before Grantham, J., at Lincoln Assizes. The learned judge upheld the will, and ordered the daughters to pay the executor's costs. The solicitor of the executor, being unable to obtain payment of the costs from the daughters, applied to Grantham, J., at chambers for an order under section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, declaring that he was entitled to a charge upon the property devised and bequeathed by the will as being property recovered or preserved through his instrumentality.

Grantham, J., refused to make an order, being of opinion that the case did not come within the section. The solicitor appealed.

W. H. Stevenson, for the appellant.

The following cases were cited: Catlow v. Catlow, 25 W. R. 866, 2 C. P. D. 362; Bulley v. Bulley, 26 W. R. 638, 8 Ch. D. 479; Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The appellant asks for a charging order on the ground that property has been recovered or preserved in the probate action through his instrumentality. He says that, at any rate, the interests which the wife and illegitimate daughter take under the will were preserved; and he further says that the interest which the legitimate daughter takes under the will was preserved, though she would have taken as heiress-at-law in case of intestacy. Grantham, J., thought that no property had been recovered or preserved within the meaning of the section, and he held that he had no jurisdiction to make a charging order. I am of opinion that the cases which have been cited show that he had jurisdiction to make an order, for they establish that this property was preserved through the instrumentality of the appellant within the meaning of the section. I think that a charging order ought to be made on the whole property, both the life interest of the wife and the reversionary interests of the daughters. The appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

STOCK v. MEAKIN. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Private street works—Charge—Completion of works—Final apportionment—Date when charge comes into existence—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 257—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), s. 13.

The apportioned expenses of private street works executed by an urban authority are, under section 13 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, charged upon the premises affected from the date of the completion of the works.

By an agreement dated the 10th of October, 1898, F. Meakin, the vendor, agreed to sell to the agent of the purchaser, W. Stock, in fee simple in possession, a piece of freehold land in the parish of West Ham, in Essex.

Clause 2 provided that up to completion "all rent (if any) and outgoings were, if necessary, to be apportioned," and clause 4 that the premises were sold subject "to any subsisting liability to repair party walls, fences, roads, or streets."

The piece of land abutted on a private road called Queen's-road. The purchaser asked if this road had been taken over by the parish and all charges in connection with it paid, to which the vendor replied that he did not know, but that he had never paid any charges for the road.

The purchase was completed on the 22nd of November, 1898, by a conveyance of that date, in which the vendor, after reciting that he had agreed to sell "free from incumbrances," as "beneficial owner," conveyed and confirmed the land to the purchaser.

On the 29th of November, 1898, the purchaser received from the urban authority a notice of the final apportionment of a sum of £130 14s., for private street works executed by the authority in Queen's-road under the Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57). The works had been completed on the 26th of July, 1898.

It appeared that the vendor, having himself recently acquired the property, had not received the notices of the provisional apportionment of the cost of the works. The purchaser paid the sum demanded and then brought this action to recover it, with interest, from the vendor. Whether the vendor or the purchaser ought to bear the cost of the works depended on whether it was a charge on the premises from the date of the completion of the works, the 26th of July, before the contract for sale, or the date of the final apportionment, the 29th of November, after the contract for sale.

The Private Street Works Act, 1892, s. 1, provides: "This Act may be cited as the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and shall be construed as one with the Public Health Acts . . . , and this Act and the Public Health Acts may be cited together as the Public Health Acts"; and section 13 (1) provides: "Any premises included in the final apportionment and all estates and interests from time to time therein shall stand and remain charged (to the like extent and effect as under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875) with the sum finally apportioned on them, or if objection has been made against the final apportionment, with the sum determined to be due as from the date of the final apportionment with interest. . . ."

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and P. F. Wheeler, for the purchaser.—The Act of 1892 is to be construed as one with the Act of 1875, section 257 of which latter Act is expressly incorporated in section 13 of the Act, 1892. Under the Act of 1875 and previous Public Health Acts it has been held that a charge of this nature comes into existence at the date of the completion of the works: In re Bettesworth and Richer, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535; Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 29 W. R. 36, 15 Ch. D. 378; Hornsey Local Board v. The Monarch Investment Building Society, 38 W. R. 85, 24 Q. B. D. 1; In re Boor, Boor v. Hopkins, 37 W. R. 349, 40 Ch. D. 572; Corporation of Birmingham v. Baker, 17 Ch. D. 782, 30 W. R. Dig. 121. This charge therefore came into existence at the date of the completion of the works, and the cost ought to be borne by the vendor as an "outgoing," and as an incumbrance within his covenants as "beneficial owner" for freedom from incumbrances, and further assurance.

Warrington, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the vendor.—The authorities cited do not apply, for this Act of 1892 is distinct from the Act of 1875. Under section 150 of the latter Act the owner is to do the work, and the urban authority only do it if the owner is in default, whereas under this Act of 1892 the urban authority are to do the work themselves directly. The Act of 1892, sections 6 and 7, in dealing with provisional apportionment, speaks of the premises as "liable to be charged." Not until dealing with the final apportionment in section 12 are they spoken of as "charged." Section 13 of the Act of 1892 says the premises are to remain charged "with the sum finally apportioned on them," which must mean there is to be no charge until the final apportionment is made. This charge did not, therefore, come into existence until the date of the final apportionment; it is not an "outgoing," nor is it an incumbrance, and it ought to be borne by the purchaser.

KEKEWICH, J.—Here the decision of a short point has occupied a long time, but it was quite inevitable, and Mr. Lawrence could not have argued his client's case without calling my attention to the Acts of Parliament which he mentioned and to the several authorities in which those Acts of Parliament have been construed, and of course it has been necessary to refer to them in some detail. But now we have had a full discussion the point is an extremely short one, not by any means without difficulty, but not the less a short one because of difficulty. The difficulty arises from the habit of the Legislature, which has increased of late years, of making enactments by reference and incorporating previous Acts.

That is the mainspring of the difficulties in this case.

Section 13 of the Act of 1892, which is the critical section, though not by any means the one section of that Act which requires attention, refers to the Act of 1875, and obviously depends on the Act of 1875 in great measure, and particularly on section 257 of that Act, and yet some modifications are introduced which are introduced not by repeating language with alteration, but by incorporation.

Mr. Warrington boldly met that difficulty by saying that the Act of 1892 is an independent Act. Of course he did not mean that it was out of place to refer to the Act of 1875, or to the decisions on that Act, but he said the Act of 1892 was an independent Act, and you must construe it, I think he went so far as to say, independently of the Act of 1875. Now that seems to me impossible because it is wholly inconsistent with the language of the Act of 1892. The first section of the Act of 1892 introduces the great difficulty to which I have referred, "This Act may be cited as the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and shall be construed as one with the Public Health Act," which includes, of course, the Act of 1875 and so on, "and this Act and the Public Health Act may be cited together as the Public Health Acts"; that is to say, it is like another chapter in the book or another section in the Act or a fasciculus of sections—to use a term which is familiar to us—added to the Act of 1875. The two Acts, and a great many others with which fortunately we are not now here concerned, are to be read as one. Therefore I cannot possibly say that I may construe the Act of 1892 independently, and not as depending upon the Act of 1875.

The real question which I have to decide is whether this sum which is clearly now charged on the premises in question though sold by the defendant to the plaintiff was so charged before the date of the contract. It matters not whether we take the date of the contract or conveyance, because it is now admitted that the works were completed on the 26th of July, 1898, and as the contract is dated the 10th of October in that year, the conveyance of course being later, we may take the contract on the one hand and the completion of the works upon the other as the crucial dates. That is the question. Expenses of this character were charged under the Act of 1875, and the question when that charge took effect has been discussed in several cases. It arose in the case of Hornsey Local Board v. The Monarch Investment Building Society. I agree that the real question with which the Court of Appeal had to deal there was how far the Statute of Limitations became applicable—that is to say, from what date it became applicable, and their judgments are directed mainly to that point, but in order to ascertain from what date the Statute of Limitations began to run, they were obliged to consider and express a judicial opinion on the question when the charge took effect. It is true they considered it tolerably plain, but they had to consider it, and they had, if not to decide it, to express a judicial opinion upon it, and it is expressed in a very few words as plainly as can be by the Master of the Rolls, who says: "The conclusion of the whole matter appears to me to be this. It has been settled by this court in the case of Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, which has been followed by North, J., in In re Bettesworth and Richer, that the charge is a present existing charge as from the time of the completion of the works. The actual amount, no doubt, has to be ascertained, but the charge exists." After that, of course, it is quite impossible to say under the Act of 1875 the charge came into existence at any other time than the completion of the works. Then is that rule to be applied to the Act of 1892, or does the later Act introduce exceptions? We have no decision on the Act of 1892, and having regard to the passage I have just read, it seems to me quite unnecessary to refer to any other decisions on the Act of 1875, or on the preceding Acts, for some of them went back to the Act of 1848. I may say in passing that I do not consider the case of In re Boor, Boor v. Hopkins, before Kay, J., to be of any value in the present instance to either side, because it is quite obvious from a perusal of the case that Kay, J., was discussing an entirely different question, and the case has been so accepted. Passing that case by, and taking these decisions as establishing, as they do, the position which I have mentioned from the present Master of the Rolls' judgment, let us look at the Act of 1892 to see in what respect it differs from the Act of 1875—that is to say, what difference the Act itself constitutes. There are no doubt other differences, but in what respect has the Legislature said that the procedure, and the incidence of the charge are to differ in the Act of 1892 from those under the Act of 1875, bearing in mind that this Act of 1892 is to be read as one with the Act of 1875. No doubt a very important difference has been introduced, about which there is no question. Under the Act of 1875, and as far as I am aware under all the previous Public Health Acts, wherever improvements were required which the urban or district authority had power to construct, the owner was given opportunity of doing the works at his own expense.

It has seemed right to the Legislature as regards this Act of 1892 to reverse that, and to say that the owner shall not have that opportunity, the works must be done for him by the local authority, and all he has to do and all he has an option of doing is to pay the expense. That, no doubt, is an alteration, and much has been made of it in this way; it is said that the default of the owner to comply with the requirements of the local authority to execute the works is what governs the decisions. I do not follow that criticism throughout, nor do I think it is of much avail on the present occasion; but it is a distinction no doubt. Then the language unfortunately is rather different, and Mr. Warrington called my attention to one verbal difference which must be treated by itself. In section 6, sub-section 2 (c), a provisional apportionment is spoken of as having to be prepared by the local authority, and it is "a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses among the premises liable to be charged therewith under this Act." In section 7, again, you have that exact phrase with reference to the provisional apportionment, because the owner has a month during which he may object to the proposed works, and he is described as the owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as "liable to be charged" with any part of the expense. But when you come on later to section 12 the phrase is changed, and you come then to the final apportionment, and then the premises are spoken of as "charged," and not as "liable to be charged"; and on that hangs the argument that the Legislature intended, while incorporating the Act of 1875, or rather making this Act a part of the Act of 1875 and one with it, by those words to indicate that until the final apportionment there was no charge, notwithstanding that in 1892 it had been settled by a series of decisions that under the Act of 1875 the charge existed when the works were completed. That is a strong thing to hold, but with an Act of Parliament of this kind when one has to construe language you must make the best of it. It seems to me these words in section 6, "liable to be charged therewith under this Act," are a mere description of the premises thus spoken of. There is to be a provisional apportionment of the estimated expense, and it is to be distributed—that is to say, apportioned according to the proper values among the premises. What premises? Why, the premises which under this Act of Parliament are those properly chargeable therewith—not others, but only those. If any others were included they would be wrongly included. The distribution of the expense is to be made on a proper scale among the premises properly chargeable according to the Act. I think that is what it means, and nothing more. It is a mere description of the premises. If so, the words in section 7, "the owner of any premises shown in the provisional apportionment as liable to be charged," are merely referential to the preceding section. One of the first things the owner may object to is that he is not liable to be charged. He may object to the proposals of the urban authority on any of the following grounds—that is to say, section 7 (a), that an alleged street or part of a street is not or does not form part of the street within the meaning of this Act. He may make that objection under that clause, or under 7 (e), "that any premises ought to be excluded from or inserted in the provisional apportionment." He may say that house No. 1 ought to be excluded because it is not chargeable—that is to say, not liable to be charged; or that house No. 6, which is not in the provisional apportionment, ought to be there because it is properly chargeable—that is to say, liable to be charged. That seems to me to give the words to which I have referred in the section a thoroughly plain meaning, and one ought not to be surprised to find that different language is used in section 12, nor is it in the slightest degree out of place that the premises are there spoken of as "charged" when the final apportionment has been completed. Such objections as the owners had to raise to it have been raised and decided and now you know, subject to the possible power to object even to the final appointment, what premises are charged, and they are treated then as "charged," and not as "liable to be charged." The description of the premises there is not required. I think with that I may pass to section 13, on which, of course, a good deal depends: "any premises included in the final appointment and all estates and interests from time to time therein shall stand and remain charged." Mr. Wheeler has conjured up a vision of some charge before created and there referred to as standing and remaining, but I think that is a little hypercritical and I cannot construe even an Act of Parliament on that argument. But I am bound to say every word requires consideration and possibly it is open to more than one construction. Then there are introduced into this section in a parenthesis these words: "to the like extent and effect as under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875." I apprehend that the reference to the Act of 1875 and section 257 was really unnecessary. This Act is part of the Act of 1875, and it might very well be that the charge would have been by reference to the Act of 1875 without this. But I consider it quite unnecessary to go as far as that on the present occasion, and it is only a passing remark. Nor am I disposed to say what is the real meaning of "the like extent and effect." It may mean a great many things, but I think we have a clear induction here that section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is to be taken as the guide in considering the charge, except so far as this Act now in question, the Act of 1892, has expressly modified it. Now, the premises are to be charged with what? With the sums finally apportioned on them. There is not a word there to indicate that the charge is to take effect from the final apportionment, and I apprehend perhaps it is going too far—but I think that if the framer of this section had intended to say, contrary to all the decisions on the Act of 1875, that the charge should only take effect as from the date of the final apportionment, nothing could have been easier than for him to have written "shall as from the date of the final apportionment stand and remain charged," and I cannot help thinking that any intelligent draftsman would have seen the necessity for stating in plain language, and in the earliest possible part of the section, the date from which the charge is to be created. That is not done. It is treated as a charge under section 257, which, as I have already mentioned, means from the date of the completion of the works.

But there are these other words, "or if objection has been made against the final apportionment with the sum determined to be due as from the date of the final apportionment, with interest . . ." Those are words which create a certain difficulty, and I do not profess to thoroughly understand them, but what I do say is they are introduced simply in order to indicate what sum is to be charged and what sum is to carry interest. The charge is said to be the sum finally apportioned on the premises, or if objection is made against the final apportionment, the sum determined to be due as from the date of the final apportionment. The final apportionment may have been wrong. It may have been objected to, or it may have been altered, and if so, of course it would be absolutely wrong to say that, notwithstanding that the final apportionment has been altered, the sum charged is to be that which was originally in the final apportionment. That seems to me to be the key to the alternative there given, and having regard to what I have already said, which I venture to repeat, because it is the ground of my decision, that inasmuch as the Legislature intended to make the Act of 1892 part, and has said it is to be part, of the Act of 1875, it would be giving those words far too wide a meaning to hold that here the Legislature intended to alter the date from which the charge was to run. What the alternative is introduced here for, seems to me clearly to be in order to show for what sum the charge is to stand. I do not think it will do to say that that reference to the final apportionment is in connection with the interest only, but the real object is to show what sum is to be charged, and that sum you are to find either in the final apportionment itself, the original one, or, when objection is made to the final apportionment, in the final apportionment as altered, if it has been altered in consequence of the objection. Of course it is obvious that that is not giving full grammatical meaning to the words "as from the date of the final apportionment," but I do not myself see what the real meaning of those words is. That may fairly be a point for consideration in some other case, and some other point may arise thereon. What I decide is that those words do not alter the law as it then stood on the construction of the Public Health Act, 1875, which, I take it, was not intended to be altered, and cannot be taken as having been altered by this Act except so far as the Legislature has so expressed it.

That is the short point on the construction of the Act, and that being so, I need go no further, because if my view is correct it follows from decided cases, and having regard to the covenants entered into by the vendor in this case, that this is a charge which was existing at the date of the contract, a charge which the vendor was bound to discharge, and that he is liable now to do so notwithstanding completion. Perhaps the circumstances explain why, but it seems that neither vendor or purchaser were aware of this charge, but that makes no difference. The purchaser, in my view, is entitled now to have the property released from this charge—that is to say, he would have been if he had paid it. I understand he has paid it. He must be taken to have paid it on behalf of his vendor, and is now entitled to receive it from him.

In October, 1864, certain property was mortgaged to A., B., and C. (who were trustees), as joint tenants, to secure £3,000 and interest. In February, 1866, the same property was mortgaged to L. to secure £3,500 and interest. In October, 1876, a further charge was executed in favour of the first mortgagees to secure £1,000 and interest. A. died in May, 1883.

The plaintiffs in the action were the present trustees of the settlement of which the first mortgagees had been trustees, and the defendants were the present owners of the second mortgage.

B., who was a solicitor, had acted for all parties in carrying out the first and second mortgages and the further advance by the first mortgagees, and had actual notice of the second mortgage at the date of its creation, but he failed to communicate the fact of the second mortgage to his co-mortgagees at the time of the further advance and they had no personal knowledge of its existence.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to tack the amount due in respect of the further advance to the amount due on the first mortgage and so postpone the second mortgagees.

In the case of a mortgage of real estate to joint tenants to secure a debt due to them jointly, it cannot be said as against strangers that any one portion of the security or of the debt belongs to any one of the mortgagees: each is entitled to the whole, and if notice of a second incumbrance is given to any one of them, such notice creates an equity against one in respect of the whole sufficient to prevent any tacking.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 12th of October, 1864, and made between Thomas Cowan and James Cowan of the one part, and Joseph Oldham, Thomas Walker and Fredk. Barker of the other part, certain premises therein described were demised to Oldham, Walker and Barker to secure £3,000 and interest.

The mortgagees were in fact trustees of a settlement, and the mortgage was to them as joint tenants.

By an indenture dated the 12th of February, 1866, the same premises were, subject to the mortgage of the 12th of October, 1864, assigned by way of mortgage to Samuel Laing to secure £3,500 and interest.

By an indenture dated the 9th of October, 1876, the same premises were charged in favour of the said first-mentioned mortgagees with the further sum of £1,500 and interest.

Joseph Oldham died in May, 1883, and thereupon the first mortgage and the further charge of the 9th of October, 1876, and the debts thereby secured, became vested in Thomas Walker and Frederick Barker as joint tenants.

Thomas Walker died in January, 1889, leaving Frederick Barker the sole surviving trustee.

The plaintiffs were the present joint mortgagees, claiming as new trustees only, appointed of the settlement of which Oldham, Walker, and Barker were the trustees, and by virtue of assignment from Barker to them as such trustees. The defendants were the present owners of the second mortgage of the 12th of February, 1866, claiming as trustees of a settlement created by Samuel Laing, and dated the 23rd of February, 1856, to whom the mortgage of the 12th of February, 1866, had been assigned. The said Thomas Walker being one of such trustees. Thomas Walker was a solicitor, and acted for all parties on the occasions of the creation of the first and second mortgages, and of the further advance by the first mortgagees.

Thomas Walker had actual notice of the second mortgage at the date of its creation and at the date of the further advance, but he failed to communicate the fact of the second mortgage to his co-mortgagees, and they had no general knowledge of its existence at the date of the further advance.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled to tack the further charge to their mortgage dated the 12th of October, 1864, and to rank in priority to the charge dated the 12th of February, 1866.

The defendants under the indenture of the 12th of February, 1866, claimed priority over the indenture of further charge dated the 9th of October, 1876.

Neville, Q.C., and H. J. Turrell, for the plaintiffs.—The doctrine of Ward v. Duncombe, 42 W. R. 59, [1893] App. Cas. 369, that notice to one trustee is notice to all, only applies to successive assignees of trust funds held by trustees. The personal disqualification of one mortgagee who is dead is no answer to an action by his co-mortgagees: Luke v. South Kensington Hotel Co., 27 W. R. 514, 11 Ch. D. 121; In re South Durham Iron Co., Smith's case, 27 W. R. 845, 11 Ch. D. 579.

Levett, Q.C., and Medd, for the defendant.—The estate and interest of each joint tenant is in the whole subject-matter. Here one of the mortgagees, who were joint tenants, as a solicitor acted for all parties in all three transactions and had actual notice of the second mortgage at the time when he and his co-mortgagees made the further advance, and the equity arising against him owing to this must prevent tacking.

They referred to Bolland v. Hart, 19 W. R. 962, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 678, and Bradley v. Riches, 26 W. R. 910, 9 Ch. D. 189.

June 28.—BYRNE, J., after stating the facts, proceeded: All the foregoing facts are admitted, and the question for consideration is whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to tack the amount due in respect of the further advance to the amount due on the first mortgage, and so to postpone the second mortgagees.

I am of opinion that they are not. No question arises in this case as to the effect of purchase for value without notice, and the matter has to be determined as though it were a claim on the part of Barker, the survivor of the original joint tenant mortgagees.

Had Walker been the survivor it would have been impossible for him to have asserted the right to tack, but it is said that the equity arising against a first mortgagee who seeks to tack by reason of his having notice of a second mortgage at the time when he makes a further advance is a purely personal equity against the individual and cannot affect others, though interested jointly with him in the mortgage debt and the security.

The question is, of course, different from that arising when there is a contest between assignees of a fund of personal estate vested in trustees, as to priority. In that case it is established that if one only of the trustees in existence at the date of the second assignment had notice of the prior assignment, the earlier assignee does not lose his priority. It has also been held that an assignee who has given notice to one only of several trustees is not entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who takes his assignment after the death of the trustee to whom notice was given; and it has also recently been determined by Stirling, J., in In re Wasdale, 47 W. R. 169, [1899] 1 Ch. 163, where the authorities for the former propositions are referred to, that an assignee who has given notice to all the trustees in existence at the time of his assignment is entitled to priority over a subsequent assignee who has taken his assignment after the death or retirement of all those trustees, and who gives notice of such assignment to the new trustees.

So far as there can be considered to be any analogy between the effect of notice as applied to the class of cases to which I have referred and to cases like that with which I have to deal, it is against the plaintiffs, but I do not think that the analogy is very close. In the case of a mortgage of real estate to joint tenants to secure a debt due to them jointly, it cannot be said, as against strangers, that any one portion of the security or of the debt belongs to any one of the mortgagees; each is entitled to the whole, and if notice of a second incumbrance be given to any one of them, that appears to me, by creating an equity against one in respect of the whole, to prevent any tacking, which in such a case must be of the further advance to the whole subsisting original debt.

If the joint tenant to whom notice is given dies, the security and debt become vested in the survivors by operation of law, but I cannot see how that confers upon them any better equity than they had before or renders the pre-existing equity of the second mortgagee any worse. If it be correct to say that the right of the three joint tenants to tack, which is a right to retain the legal estate until the first debt and all that is due in respect of further advances is satisfied, was lost by reason of the notice given to one of them, it is difficult to see how that right can revive.

I think there is a certain analogy between this state of things and the case of a devise to two as joint tenants, one being privy to an illegal intent on the part of a testator, and the other not, in which case neither can claim under the devise, the result being different in the case of a devise to two as tenants in common, in which case he who is not privy to the intent will take, the other will not: see Jones v. Badley, 16 W. R. 713, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 362; and Rowbotham v. Dunnett, 26 W. R. 529, 8 Ch. D. 430. The case of In re South Durham Iron Co., Smith's case, relied upon by the plaintiffs, is distinguishable on the ground, amongst others, that there was no question there as to the effect of the neglect of one of several joint tenants, but of the neglect of one of several persons having separate interests to do something which he ought to have done in a different capacity.

It is unnecessary to express my opinion upon the other point argued—namely, whether or not notice ought to be imputed to Walker's co-mortgagees by reason of his having acted as solicitor for them on the occasion of the further advance. There are some observations by the Master of the Rolls in Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W.R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25, at p. 35, which would have to be borne in mind before determining this question hostilely to the defendants. They have a bearing on the argument put forward by Mr. Levett as to the duty of a party to inquire.

Married woman—Separate use—Restraint on anticipation—Bankruptcy—Subsequent discoverture—Residue of life interest—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 5; s. 19.

Where a married woman entitled to property for life for her separate use without power of anticipation becomes bankrupt, her entire life interest vests in her trustee in bankruptcy, under section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, subject, however to the restraint upon anticipation under section 19; but the restraint upon anticipation saved by section 19 only attaches to her life interest during the joint lives of herself and her husband, and not to the residue of her life interest after her husband's death. Consequently the trustee in bankruptcy of a married woman, who at the date of her bankruptcy is entitled to real property for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, becomes entitled upon the death of the husband of the bankrupt to the future rents and profits during the remainder of her lifetime.

Originating summons.

This summons was taken out for the purpose of determining whether the defendant, Mrs. Ryan, a widow lady, or her trustee in bankruptcy, was entitled to certain rents and profits accruing since the death of her husband.

By an indenture of settlement of March, 1859, certain shares of certain lands were vested in trustees for Mrs. Ryan for her sole and separate use independently of any husband with whom she might intermarry, but without power for her whilst covert or sole in any way to charge or anticipate the same, and after her death upon the trusts therein mentioned. She married in 1868. In 1891 Mrs. Ryan, who had been carrying on the business of a schoolmistress apart from her husband, was adjudicated a bankrupt. The defendant, Gittins, was the official receiver and the trustee in the bankruptcy. In February, 1899, Mr. Ryan, the husband, died. The bankruptcy had not been closed and Mrs. Ryan was still undischarged. The trustee in bankruptcy now claimed to have the rents and profits of the settled land which had accrued since the death of Mr. Ryan, and those which would accrue in the future during the life of the widow, paid over to him. This claim was opposed by Mrs. Ryan.

The trustee of the settlement thereupon took out this summons to obtain the direction of the court.

Brabant, for the trustee.

Astbury, Q.C., and W. A. G. Woods, for Mrs. Ryan.—The trustee in bankruptcy can claim this property only either (1) as vesting in him immediately upon the bankruptcy, or (2) as after-acquired property. But it clearly is not after-acquired property, for Mrs. Ryan acquired no fresh interest upon the death of her husband. She still had the same life estate: Pelton Brothers v. Harrison, 39 W. R. 689, [1891] 2 Q. B. 422; Beckett v. Tasker, 36 W. R. 158. 19 Q. B. D. 7. Did, then, the property vest in the trustee immediately upon bankruptcy? It could not do this, because of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Moreover, section 1 of that Act only applies to property which the woman can alienate. The involuntary alienation of bankruptcy only reaches property capable of voluntary alienation: Ex parte Gilchrist, in re Armstrong, 34 W. R. 709, 17 Q. B. D. 521. Upon the death of the husband the separate use ceased as well as the restraint upon anticipation, and therefore section 1, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1882 would not apply: see Kay, J., in Pelton Brothers v. Harrison, p. 425.

H. Greenwood, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—Separate use and restraint upon anticipation are different things. Restraint continues during coverture only, while separate use lasts during lifetime:

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Barton v. Briscoe, Jac. 603. The whole life interest of Mrs. Ryan vested at once in the trustee in bankruptcy (In re Armstrong, Ex parte Boyd, 36 W. R. 772, 21 Q. B. D. 264), although he could not touch it until the death of the husband removed the restraint upon it. The cases cited by the other side are all cases depending on contract, and not upon bankruptcy. The words "as if she were a feme sole" in section 1, sub-section 5, distinguish the case of bankruptcy from the other cases. Pelton Brothers v. Harrison was, moreover, decided merely upon the form of the judgment obtained by the creditor.

The cases of Softlaw v. Welch, 46 W. R. 626, [1899] 2 Ch. 419; Cooper v. Macdonald, 28 W. R. 377, 7 Ch. B. 566, were also referred to.

Aug. 11.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—The question in this case depends upon the true construction and effect of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, coupled with section 19. Now, it is clear that the entire life interest of Mrs. Ryan, notwithstanding the restraint upon anticipation, passed to the official receiver: Axford v. Reid, 37 W. R. 291, 22 Q. B. D. 548. That she could not by voluntary alienation affect her life interest would be of no moment. This is her separate estate, and the language of the statute is general. Then comes section 19, which is not easy to interpret. It has been decided by the Court of Appeal that the life estate of a married woman limited to her separate use, but without a restraint upon anticipation, will vest in her trustee in bankruptcy notwithstanding this section: In re Armstrong, ex parte Boyd, 36 W. R. 772, 21 Q. B. D. 264. It is plain that the bankruptcy could not render inoperative the restraint upon anticipation. But is the title of the trustee effective now that that restraint is no longer operative? It is important to observe that Mrs. Ryan takes nothing under the Act of 1882. She takes under an instrument of 1859, which purports to give her an interest for her separate use during the whole of her life, and subject to a restraint upon anticipation. It is common knowledge that it is usual to give the income of property during the whole life of a woman for her separate use, though the separate use is sometimes limited to a particular coverture: Stogdon v. Lee, 39 W. R. 467, [1891] 1 Q. B, 661. There is no difficulty in attaching a separate use either to the complete life interest or even to an estate in fee: Bagget v. Meux, 1 Coll. 138; or to an absolute interest in personal estate: In re Grey's Settlements, 35 W. R. 560, 34 Ch. D. 712. In the well-known case of Tullett v. Armstrong, Lord Langdale treated the separate use as suspended, and having no operation while the woman is discovert. Lord Cottenham expressly negatived the idea that a new separate estate arises on second marriage, and asserts that the old estate continues through the second coverture: 4 My. & Cr., p. 405. There are authorities which speak of that which was separate estate being so still after the husband's death: Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 28 W. R. 667, 29 ib. 551, 14 Ch. D. 837; Seton on Decrees (5th ed.), p. 757. And so also after the wife's death: Heatley v. Thomas, 15 Ves. 596, and London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lempriere, 21 W. R. 513, L. R. 4 P. C. 572. Section 23 of the Act of 1882 treats a married woman's separate estate as something that may vest in her executors: Surman v. Wharton, 39 W. R. 416, [1891] 1 Q. B. 491. It seems to follow that separate estate may be said to exist notwithstanding discoverture. It is "suspended" in this sense—that the widow's power of disposition over it is the same as if it had been given her simply, and without words creating a separate use. It is not extinct because it becomes operative upon second marriage. If the coverture ends by her death it is still regarded as her separate estate, and is applied in satisfaction of her debts and liabilities. If the coverture ends by her husband's death, the same principle ought to apply. Unless, therefore, I am constrained by authority, I should hold that the combined effect of sections 1 and 19 of the Act of 1882 was to vest in the trustee the whole of the life interest of Mrs. Ryan, subject only and except so far as it was protected by the restraint upon anticipation, and that, directly the restraint upon anticipation ceased by the death of her husband, the title became free from impediment. But it said that I am not at liberty to take that view in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Pelton Brothers v. Harrison. In that case judgment had been obtained against a married woman in the form settled in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. In delivering the judgment of the court Kay, L.J., said: "The question is whether, under this judgment, the property which the married woman was restrained from anticipation was affected. The shortest answer is that the judgment expressly directs that there shall be no execution against such property, and, in my opinion, it is as completely excepted from the consequences of the judgment as if it had been specifically mentioned in it and stated to be excepted, because the married woman was restrained from anticipating it" (p. 423). This, of course, was a sufficient ground for the decision. But the Lord Justice proceeds to discuss the Act of 1882, section 1, sub-sections 2 and 4, and says, p. 425: "But it is argued that when the husband died the property was still separate property, and that by the death of the husband the restraint upon anticipation was gone, and it may therefore be treated as separate property acquired upon the death of the husband. The answer to this argument is that there is no such thing as separate property of an unmarried woman. Separate property means property held separately from the husband." The case turned upon sub-section 2, which may be called the contract section, and not sub-section 5, which is the bankruptcy section. But I have felt great difficulty in consequence of these observations. They were not, however, necessary to the decision of the case, and they seem to me not to be consistent with the view of the Court of Appeal in Pike v. Fitzgibbon, and of other judges in many cases, to some of which I have referred. I therefore feel myself at liberty to follow my own view, and hold that the entire life interest of Mrs. Ryan was her separate property at the date of the bankruptcy within the meaning of sub-section 5, and that the restraint upon anticipation which is saved by section 19 attached only to a portion of that life interest—namely, during the joint lives of herself and her husband—and that the residue of the life interest from the death of the husband belongs to the trustee in bankruptcy, and must be applied in satisfaction of Mrs. Ryan's debts. I make a declaration accordingly. I think it is a case in which the costs of all parties, including Mrs. Ryan, should be paid by the plaintiff, the trustee of the settlement, out of the life interest to which the declaration extends.

Information.

By an indenture dated the 25th of May 1853, Sir John James Smith, in exercise of a power of jointuring given to him by an indenture of settlement dated the 3rd of July, 1813, granted to Dame Frances Smith, his wife, an annual sum or yearly rent-charge of £400 to be issuing and payable out of estates in the county of Lincoln subject to the uses of the indenture of the 3rd of July, 1813, and he demised the estates to trustees for a term of ninety-nine years to commence after his death upon trust for further securing the payment of the jointure rent-charge.

Sir John James Smith died on the 3rd of September, 1862, and the defendant succeeded to a life interest both in the Lincolnshire estates subject to the above-mentioned jointure rent-charge and, also, in estates in the county of Dorset which were subject to another jointure rent-change of £1,000 per annum secured thereon in favour of Dame Frances Smith.

In 1870 the defendant sold the Lincolnshire estates to two separate purchasers subject to the jointure rent-charge of £400. He invested part of the purchase-money in the purchase of a sum of £13,333 6s. 8d. reduced 3 per cent. bank annuities in the names of trustees upon trusts for indemnifying the purchasers against the jointure rent-charge and subject thereto upon trust for the defendant absolutely.

In 1883 an arrangement was made between the defendant, Dame Frances Smith, and the purchasers of the Lincolnshire estates for the extinction of the jointure rent-charge of £400 and the surrender and merger of the term; and for the release of the bank annuities from the trusts for indemnity, the defendant agreed to grant to Dame Frances Smith an annuity of £400 secured upon his life interest in the Dorsetshire estates and upon life policies upon his life.

Three indentures were executed in furtherance of this arrangement. By two of the indentures, both dated the 31st of December, 1883, Dame Frances Smith in consideration of the defendant having secured the annual sum or rent-charge of £400 to her satisfaction released the Lincolnshire estates from the rent-charge of £400 created by the indenture of the 25th of May, 1853, and by the same two indentures the term of years vested in trustees for securing the rent-charge was released.

By the other indenture, which was of the same date, the defendant, in consideration of Dame Frances Smith having agreed to release the Lincolnshire estates from the jointure rent-charge of £400 and in consideration of the sum of £13,333 6s. 8d. reduced 3 per cent. bank annuities being released from the trusts for indemnity, charged his life interest in the Dorsetshire estates and, in the event of his death in the lifetime of Dame Frances Smith, certain policies of assurance on his life with the payment of the annual sum of £400, in addition to the annual sum or rent-charge of £1,000 to which she was then entitled.

On the 7th of January, 1884, the defendant paid to the commissioners, by way of commutation of succession duty due upon the succession on the death of Dame Frances Smith, the sum of £116 7s. 9d.

Dame Frances Smith died on the 18th of June, 1895, and the information claimed that estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, became payable in respect of the benefit accruing or arising to the defendant as tenant for life of the Dorsetshire estates by the cesser of the annuity of £400.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with him), for the Crown.—The answer of the defendant to the claim for estate duty is based on section 3, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, which provides that "estate duty shall not be payable . . . in respect of the determination of any annuity for lives where . . . such . . . annuity" was "granted for full consideration in money or money's worth paid to . . . the grantor for his own use or benefit . . . ," and it is said, here, that the release of the Lincolnshire estates from the burden of the rent-charge was full consideration for the creation of the annuity secured on the defendant's life interest in the Dorsetshire estates. It cannot be denied that subject to section 3, sub-section 1, on the cesser of an annuity such as this there is an increase of benefit on which estate duty is payable. The true effect of the transaction in 1883 was, however, merely to change the security of a subsisting annuity.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the defendant.—From 1870 to 1883 the rent-charge upon the Lincolnshire estates was relieved in the hands of the purchasers from all liability to pay estate duty by virtue of section 21, sub-section 3, which provides as follows: "Where an interest in expectancy in any property has before the commencement of this part of this Act been bonâ fide sold or mortgaged for full consideration in money or money's worth then no other duty on such property shall be payable by the purchaser or mortgagee when the interest falls into possession than would have been payable if the Act had not passed." Then in 1883 the Lincolnshire estates were released from the rent-charge and succession duty was paid, and a new annuity was granted by the defendant to Lady Smith which was secured on estates coming to the defendant by a different title. This annuity was granted for full consideration within section 3, sub-section 1, the price paid being the release of the rent-charge issuing out of the Lincolnshire estates and the release of the £13,333 6s. 8d. from the trusts for indemnity. The transaction was a perfectly bonâ fide one, and, having taken place ten years before the Finance Act was passed, it could not have been effected with a view to evading the duty. The statute does not happen to hit the present case, and unless the property comes within the very words of the Act the Crown ought not to succeed: see Phillips v. Morrison, 12 M. & W. 740; Tennant v. Smith, [1892] A. C. 150, 40 W. R. Dig. 216; Commissioners of Taxation v. Teece, [1899] A. C. 254.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., in reply.—Section 21, sub-section 3, does not apply. It affords relief to the purchasers, and has no reference to the defendant at all.

DARLING, J.—I think that in this case our judgment must be for the Crown. The effect of the settlements was this: that Sir William Smith-Marriott became possessed of property in Lincolnshire and Dorsetshire, and that one of the consequences of his having that property was that he had to pay £400 a year to Lady Smith. He was from the time he came into possession of the property until Lady Smith's death liable in one way or another to pay her an annuity of £400. It is true that he was not liable in the same way, nor did the annuity issue out of the same property or funds during the whole of that time; because in 1883 an arrangement was made, the effect of which was this, that whereas formerly the annuity was secured upon the Lincolnshire property it now became secured upon the Dorsetshire property; but though the security was changed the burden upon Sir William Smith-Marriott remained precisely the same as before.

In these circumstances Sir William Smith-Marriott says that upon the death of Lady Smith he is not liable to pay estate duty because he comes within the exemption in section 3, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894. The question is, was anything paid to Sir William Smith-Marriott "for his own use or benefit," and if there was, was it "full consideration in money or money's worth." I am unable to see anything which fairly comes within those words. The arrangement by which the annuity was charged upon the Dorsetshire property is said by Mr. Lawrence and Mr. Danckwerts to amount to the creation of a new annuity—a new burden. I do not think it was. I think it was a mere transfer of the burden, which was always upon Sir William Smith-Marriott, from one portion of his property to another. It does not seem to me that the annuity created on the Dorsetshire property by the deed of December, 1883, was an annuity created for full consideration in money or money's worth. That annuity may have been less burdensome to Sir William Smith-Marriott, but I cannot see that for that reason it can be held to come within the words that it was created "for full consideration in money or money's worth" paid to him.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree that our judgment should be for the Crown. The case is brought clearly under section 2 of the Act, and the burden is on the defendant to bring the case within the excepting words of section 3, sub-section 1.

The whole matter turns upon the question, Is this a new annuity, or is it an old one with a varied security? The strength of the argument for the defendant (and I am not at all saying that there is not some force in it) lies in this, that in law a freehold annuity upon the estate of A. is a different thing from a freehold annuity upon the estate of B. To put the matter plainly, if there had been a bond by Sir William Smith-Marriott to secure £400 a year as a security charged upon his Lincolnshire estates, and the whole effect of the arrangement had been to leave that bond untouched, but to substitute as the security a charge upon the Dorsetshire estates, I should have said that the defendant would not have had a word to say for himself. What the defendant says is that the effect of the arrangement was that a freehold interest in one estate was substituted for a freehold interest in another. Lady Smith ceased to be a freeholder in the county of Lincoln and became a freeholder in the county of Dorset. The annuities were different to that extent. But at the same time the true substance of the matter is the substitution of one security for another. The annuity, though it does not in reality exist apart from the estate, out of which it is carved, is nevertheless treated by the parties as an entity of itself, and that, after all, is the business view of the matter. Therefore, in my opinion, Sir William Smith-Marriott, who would certainly have had to pay duty in respect of the annuity if he had not sold the Lincolnshire estates, does not escape from paying such duty because, by arrangement with Lady Smith, he has substituted his Dorsetshire estates for the Lincolnshire estates as security for the payment of the annuity.

BURROWS v. RHODES AND ANOTHER. (a.)

False representation—Raid on friendly State—Illegality of common venture—Criminal offence — Claim for damages — Joint delinquents — Demurrer — Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), s. 11 (i.).

Where the plaintiff was induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the defendant to join with him and others in doing an act which in consequence of such misrepresentation he believed to be legal, but which in fact was criminal, and the plaintiff thereby suffered injury and loss,

Held that the defendant could not set up the plea that there was no right of indemnity between joint delinquents as an answer to an action for damages by the plaintiff.

Special case for the opinion of the court on points of law raised by the defendants' contention that the plaintiff's statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

The proceedings in this case arose out of the Jameson raid upon the Transvaal Republic, and the plaintiff, a trooper, claimed damages in respect of injuries he had suffered in the course of that expedition, which he alleged he had been induced to take part in by the fraudulent misrepresentations made to him by the defendants Rhodes and Jameson.

The statement of claim was as follows:

(1) The British South Africa Co. is a British company incorporated by Royal Charter dated the 29th of October, 1889, and having for the principal field of its operations a region of South Africa. (2) The defendant Rhodes was at all times material to this action a director of the said company, and was entrusted with the management of all its property and affairs in South Africa. The defendant Jameson was at all such times as aforesaid an officer and agent of the said company, and was entrusted with the control of the forces of the company which were employed in the invasion hereinafter mentioned. (3) In or about the month of September, 1894, the plaintiff was employed by the company to serve for a year in the armed forces of the company within the territorial limits prescribed for the company by the said charter, and he entered upon and remained continuously in such employment from the time of his engagement as aforesaid until the happening of the matters hereinafter complained of. (4) In the month of September, 1895 (when the plaintiff was at Bulawayo, and his period of service was about to expire), the defendants, having secretly determined to invade the territory of the South African Republic with a hostile armed force, in order to induce the plaintiff to renew his engagement and take part in such invasion as a member of the said force, fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that the detachment in which he was serving was about to be employed in active service, and that it would be to his benefit, and they requested him to continue in the service of the said company. The defendants intended the plaintiff to believe, and he did believe, that the service on which the said detachment was about to be employed was of a lawful nature, and, relying upon the aforesaid representations, the plaintiff agreed to and did continue in the said company's service for a further period. The said representations were to the knowledge of the defendants untrue. (5) Shortly after the plaintiff had entered into the agreement in paragraph 4 hereof mentioned, the defendants caused a considerable number of the troops in the employment of the said company (including the detachment in which the plaintiff was serving) to be concentrated at or near Pitsani under the control of the defendant Jameson for the purpose of the said invasion. (6) On the 29th of December, 1895, the defendants, for the purpose of the said invasion and in order to induce the plaintiff to take part therein and to enter the territory of the said republic as a member of the said company's armed forces, fraudulently represented to the plaintiff that fighting was about to commence in or near Johannesburg; that protection was needed for the women and children there; that a body of Rhodesian Horse would meet and co-operate within the territory of the said republic with the troops with which the plaintiff was serving; that a body of Cape Mounted Rifles (forces of her Majesty) was also waiting near the frontier of the said republic to join and co-operate with the said troops; and that the proposed invasion had the sanction and support of her Majesty's Government. The representations in this paragraph mentioned were to the knowledge of the defendants untrue. (7) The plaintiff, believing the aforesaid representations to be true and relying thereupon, was induced thereby to enter the territory of the South African Republic as a member of the said company's armed forces and to engage in hostilities with the troops of the said republic. (8) By reason of the matters aforesaid the plaintiff suffered great injury, and was subjected to severe hardship and imminent dangers. The troops of the said company with which the plaintiff was serving as aforesaid were defeated by the forces of the said republic at Doornkop, and in the battle which was fought there the plaintiff was severely wounded, and lost a leg, and subsequently had to undergo seven surgical operations. He was taken and kept prisoner by the authorities of the said republic, and was liable to summary execution at their hands. Hospital accommodation was refused him, and he was left lying exposed in the street at Pretoria. He was also rendered liable to severe punishment in England for offences against the laws of England, and was brought to England as a prisoner. He was caused much pain and suffering, and his health and capacity for earning his livelihood were, and still are, and always will be, greatly impaired. The particulars of the special damages were: (1) Loss of kit, £25; loss of pay for first eight months of 1896 at £15 a month (rations were provided), £120; (3) loss of earnings from the 1st of September, 1896, to November, 1898, at £200 a year, £433 6s. 8d.; (4) loss of leg. Damages 3 and 4 are still continuing, and must be so throughout plaintiff's life.

In the defence the above statements were denied.

Paragraph 11 of the defence was as follows: "The defendants will submit that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action."

By a consent order it was directed (1) that the British South Africa Co., who were originally defendants, should be dismissed from the action without costs; (2) that the question of law raised by paragraph 11 of the statement of defence be set down for hearing.

Arthur Cohen, Q.C. (with him Lord Robert Cecil), for the defendants, said the question was whether a person who had committed a criminal offence could recover compensation from anybody who had induced him to commit the offence, for the consequences which he had suffered by reason of committing that offence. He submitted that he could not. The plaintiff's claim was founded on the assumption that the expedition in which he was induced to take part was an illegal venture. If the plaintiff established that proposition his claim for the loss and damage he sustained from having done so could not be enforced against the defendants, for they were, on his own showing, joint delinquents with himself. On the ground of public policy the courts would not assist him in such circumstances.

The learned counsel then referred to all the cases considered in the judgments, and also to Scott v. Brown, 41 W. R. 116 [1892] 2 Q. B. 724.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (with him Barnard Lailey), for the plaintiff, submitted that this demurrer ought not to succeed, and said it might be necessary that he should ask for some amendment to the statement of claim, which stated in effect that the plaintiff had been brought to England as a prisoner and had become liable to prosecution, because by that statement he did not intend to admit and did not admit that he had intentionally violated the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870. His submission was that that Act could not be violated by anyone who had not mens rea. [GRANTHAM, J.—It does not seem necessary to prove mens rea to establish the committing of an offence under that Act.] If the plaintiff in what he did had innocently acted illegally, then he never became a criminal, and therefore the defence set up was not sufficient, because there had been no violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act so far as the plaintiff was concerned. The general rule of English law was that no crime could be committed without there being a mens rea. [GRANTHAM, J.—By some statutes—for example, Acts relating to licensed victuallers and to trade-marks—an employer is made liable for the acts of his servants. They render the employer an insurer for the observance of the law, and under those statutes persons might be rendered liable to punishment without there being any mens rea.] The cause of action was that the expedition was clearly of an illegal nature, and that the plaintiff was induced to take part in it by representations made to him by the defendants or their agents which, if true, would have legalized it. The plaintiff believed the truth of what he was told. It was said that he might have been prosecuted as a wrong-doer, but he was not in fact brought to trial. A man was not a criminal in the eyes of the law because someone to suit his own purpose chose to go about saying he was. There was no question of public policy involved in the case. The basis of the rule that a person who was engaged in an illegal expedition could not sue another person engaged in that expedition was founded upon the assumption that there was a community of wrong-doing between the parties, but nothing of that kind could be successfully alleged by these defendants.

Arthur Cohen, Q.C., in reply.—A person who engages in an attack on a friendly State does so at his peril. If it turns out that the expedition was illegal, it is no defence to say he was under the belief that the expedition was made with the sanction of her Majesty's Government. The courts, on the ground of public policy, will not assist such a person to recover damages for loss he so incurred. The offence is perfectly distinct from a tort, which is a wrong committed against an individual.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we are asked to determine whether, on the statement of claim as presented to us (or with such amendments, if any, as may be necessary to raise the question of law to be determined), any cause of action has been shown for which an action is maintainable according to English law. For the purposes of our judgment, this being a demurrer by the defendants, all the facts alleged in the claim must be taken to be true and admitted by the defendants. What, therefore, are these facts? Shortly, these. That the defendants, having secretly determined to invade the territory of a friendly Power with a hostile armed force, they, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to enter their service as an armed servant, deceived the plaintiff as to their intentions, told him that the service on which they wished to employ him was lawful, that, as fighting would shortly take place in the said South African Republic between other forces, his services were required for the protection of women and children, that the force of which he was a member would have the support of other lawfully appointed forces, and that such invasion of the territory of the South African Republic had the sanction and support of her Majesty's Government; whereas, in fact, all the aforesaid representations were untrue to the knowledge of the defendants. Acting on and believing in these statements, the plaintiff entered the services of the defendants, and in obeying their orders received the injuries, and suffered the losses complained of, and for which he seeks to recover damages in this action. It is difficult to realize any period of our history in which a defendant making such fraudulent statements and inflicting such serious injury would not be liable for the consequences of his fraud, and yet it has been solemnly argued that such is the law at the present time. Let us see, therefore, on what grounds the learned counsel (Mr. Cohen) attempts to support his contention that this statement of claim discloses no good cause of action. He does not rely on a possible assumption that the damages resulted from the voluntary enlistment of the plaintiff on a warlike expedition for the pay and the prospective advantages likely to accrue to him, and were not in any way caused or aggravated by the fraud; but he admits that his contention rests solely on the assumption that the plaintiff, innocent of all knowledge of wrong on his part, did by obeying the order of the defendants in fact become a criminal himself, and could not therefore complain of any wrong done him by the defendants, who were particeps criminis with him. But how does he show that he is a criminal? He relies on the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, s. 11 (i.). That section deals with the penalty of fitting out naval or military expeditions without the license of her Majesty, and exacts that: Every person engaged in such preparation or fitting out, or assisting therein, or employed in any capacity in such expedition, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment or either of such punishments, at the discretion of the court before which the offender is convicted, and imprisonment, if awarded, may be either with or without hard labour. The defendants contend, therefore, that, it being immaterial whether the person employed in such expedition had a mens rea or guilty knowledge of the nature of his act or not, and although believing as he did that his action had the sanction of the Queen's Government, yet he was just as much a criminal as the defendants who had knowingly broken the law and that, once that the plaintiff was proved to be a criminal, he could not, according to the defendants, be heard to complain of the original and deeper dyed fraud of the defendants, which had placed the plaintiff unwittingly on his part in a position which made him liable to be called a criminal. A grosser perversion of English justice it is impossible to imagine, and I should indeed be sorry if under any circumstances it could be proved to be English law. It must not be forgotten that the plaintiff has not been proved to be a criminal in any court of law. He has not been tried, much less convicted, and never will be tried, and therefore cannot be convicted, and under the circumstances a jury would, I doubt not, acquit him if he was now tried; but, till he has been convicted, how can the defendants be heard to say that, as in their opinion the plaintiff's conduct was an infringement of the Act, he must be treated as if he had been convicted of being a criminal by Act of Parliament? Let us look, therefore, at the authorities relied upon by Mr. Cohen on behalf of the defendants to see what aid, if any, they give him in his contention. First, he relies on the dictum of Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341 at p. 343 (of the date 1775), wherein he says, "the objection that a contract is immoral or illegal as between plaintiff and defendant sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. But it is not for his sake that the objection is allowed. . . . No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. If from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. . . . So if the plaintiff and defendant were to change sides the latter would have the advantage, for potior est conditio defendentis," and so on. It seems to me that no stronger authority could be quoted against the defendants. The plaintiff's cause of action is not founded, as far as he is concerned, on any immoral or illegal consideration, but, as the defendants rely on their own immorality and illegality, it does sound very ill in their mouths to endeavour to rob the plaintiff of his rights by their (the defendants') illegality; and as in these proceedings the defendants have changed places with the plaintiff and are practically plaintiffs, as they are claiming a judgment on their demurrer, I am only echoing Lord Mansfield in saying I will not allow the plaintiffs to rely on their illegality to obtain a judgment against defendant for potior est conditio defendentis, and the demurrer being dismissed the present plaintiff's right of action is admitted. The next case Mr. Cohen relied on was Colburn v. Patmore, 1 C. M. & R. 73. This case, when it is carefully examined, seems to me to help the defendants less even than the last. The only matter under discussion in that case was whether the plaintiff, the printer and owner of a paper, having been convicted of a criminal libel and fined £100, could recover that sum from the defendant, the editor of the paper, whom he alleged to have first inserted the libel contrary to his duty to the plaintiff and so induced the plaintiff to publish it. It was held he could not recover, because he had not shown that he had not himself approved of the libel before printing and publishing it himself. But even taking the obiter dicta of the learned judge as law in the passage where (quoting from Lord Lyndhurst's judgment) Lord Lyndhurst says, "I know of no case in which a person who has committed an act declared by the law to be criminal has been permitted to recover compensation against a person who has acted jointly with him in the commission of the crime." Quite true. But what compensation can he not recover? Why, compensaion for the damages he has incurred by proceedings having been taken against him for the commission by him of the wrongful act complained of. As Mr. Maule (afterwards Maule, J.) said during the argument, "the question is whether a person convicted of a criminal offence can claim indemnity from another who has participated with him in the commission of that offence"—i.e., indemnity for the damages recovered against him for the commission of the offence. In this case the plaintiff, in the first place, has been convicted of no offence and, in the second place, is not seeking to recover an indemnity for damages recovered against him, but is seeking to recover damages for a wrong done to him, in which he did not participate except as a sufferer, and in which it cannot be said he was a criminal. When the false and fraudulent representation was made which was the causa causans of this action, no crime had been committed by the defendants much less by the plaintiff, and as far as plaintiff knew no crime had been committed by the defendants at any time up to the happening of the events which caused the damage to the plaintiff, for if the invasion had the sanction and authority of her Majesty or her Government, as the defendants alleged, there were no breach of any statute for which the plaintiff or the defendants could be made liable. Mr. Cohen relies next on the case of Merryweather v. Nixan, 8 T. R. 186, in which it was held that one wrongdoer cannot have redress or contribution against another. True, it was so held; but what does Best, C.J., say about it in delivering the judgment of the court in the case of Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66? He says: "From the concluding part of the judgment in Merryweather v. Nixan, and from reason, justice, and sound policy, the rule that wrongdoers cannot have redress or contribution against each other is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act." Again, in the case of Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co. [1894] A. C., 318, the noble lords, though not overruling Merryweather v. Nixan, damn the case with faint praise, decline in terms to apply it to Scotland, and refuse to extend its operation one iota. As the action of the plaintiff is only made a criminal act by statute, and is not inherently a criminal act, the plaintiff cannot be presumed to have known of his guilt until he has been proved to have been guilty. As the expedition in question is alleged to have been something in the nature of a highway robbery, I am surprised that the defendants did not refer to the case of Everet v. Williams, mentioned in Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.), p. 101, which it was said was a suit of one highwayman against another for an account of their plunder, the bill alleging that the plaintiff was skilled in dealing in several commodities, such as plate, rings, watches, purses, &c., and that the defendant applied to him to become a partner, and that, after dealing together at several places, such as Bagshot, Hampstead, Salisbury, &c., they differed as to their respective shares, and so the suit in Chancery was instituted for an account. The bill was dismissed with costs because it was held that they were both particeps criminis, and so plaintiff could not recover. Perhaps it may be that the learned counsel were afraid to refer us to this case lest the same results should happen—namely, that the counsel who signed the bill was made to pay the costs of the bill, and the solicitors were fined £50, and the plaintiff and defendant were both hanged. As the defendants have failed to establish their case, it is hardly necessary to refer to any authorities on the other side, and I will only mention Campbell v. Campbell, 7 Cl. & Fin. 166, where one partner in a distillery had been convicted of illegal transactions and made liable to penalties, and he was held entitled to recover against his co-partner contribution for those penalties, notwithstanding the authority of Colburn v. Patmore before referred to, because (as Lord Cottenham said) he was not particeps criminis in the sense which would disentitle him to sue for contribution. If, in such case, he could recover, how much more so when the cause of action is not one for indemnity for damages given against him for the commission of the alleged illegal act, but is for damage for the alleged fraud on the part of the defendants in putting the plaintiff into such a position as caused him personal injury and loss quite irrespective of any illegal complicity in a crime. It is true the plaintiff also refers in his statement of claim to the liability the defendants had made him incur to severe punishment in England for offences against the English law, but he never was made liable to punishment, he never was made a criminal, and he suffered no damage from that liability; and I therefore treat that part of the statement of claim as struck out, since no damages are really claimed under that head. As the defendants have entirely failed to refer us to any authority that, in my judgment, justifies their contention that the plaintiff's declaration discloses no good cause of action for which he can sue, I am glad to be able to say that our law has been purged from the suggestion that fraud and false representation injurious to an innocent person can be committed with impunity if the injured person has by such fraud and false representation been unwittingly and innocently made to commit what the law has said shall be called a crime. For these reasons, in my judgment, the demurrer must be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, J.—The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover damages from the defendants on the ground that they induced him by false and fraudulent representations to renew an engagement of service with the British South Africa Co., and to take part in the well-known expedition which was led by the defendant Jameson into the Transvaal in December, 1895, in consequence whereof he was demnified in various ways which are set forth in the statement of claim.

In paragraph 8 of the statement of claim the plaintiff alleges, among other things, that by reason of the premises he was rendered liable to severe punishment in England for offences against the laws of England. The defendants in paragraph 11 of the statement of defence have pleaded that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action, their point being that that allegation of paragraph 8 which I have just quoted puts the plaintiff out of court. It is an admission that the plaintiff's participation in the expedition constituted a criminal offence under section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, and the defendants' argument is that no action can be maintained to recover damages for having been induced to commit a crime.

It is upon the correctness of this contention that the court is called upon to adjudicate, as if the point had been raised by a demurrer under the old common law practice.

It has, I think, long been settled law that if an act is manifestly unlawful, or the doer of it knows it to be unlawful, as constituting either a civil wrong or a criminal offence, he cannot maintain an action for contribution or for indemnity against the liability which results to him therefrom. An express promise of indemnity to him for the commission of such an act is void. In Shackell v. Rosier, 2 Bing. N. C. 634, where, in consideration that the plaintiff had published a libel at the defendant's request, and had at the like request consented to defend an action brought against the plaintiff for such publication, the defendant promised to indemnify the plaintiff from the costs of the action, the Court of Common Pleas held that the promise could not be enforced. In the preceding year 1835, in the American case of Arnold v. Clifford, 2 Sumner, 238, at p. 239, Judge Story held that a promise to indemnify another for doing a private wrong or for committing a public crime is against public policy, and is void at law. [See also Martin v. Blithman, Yelv. 197, which is cited in the note to Farebrother v. Ansley, 1 Camp., at p. 348.] Where the circumstances constituting the unlawfulness of the act are known to the doer of it, his inability to claim contribution or indemnity appears to me to be clear.

In the next place it is, I think, also clear that an action for indemnity grounded either on deceit or warranty may be maintained where the party who seeks the indemnity has incurred damage by reason of his having been authorized or (as is alleged in this instance) fraudulently induced by another to do an act, indifferent in itself, which has turned out to be unlawful, because it constitutes a private wrong, but which was not at the time apparently unlawful, and was done in honest ignorance of the particular circumstances which constituted its unlawfulness. [See the judgment of Best, C.J., in Adamson v. Jarvis, 4 Bing. 66; Betts v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57; Dixon v. Fawcus, 9 W. R. 414, 30 L. J. Q. B. 137; Pollock on Torts (1887 ed.), p. 171.] In such a case an express promise to indemnify is valid in law: Fletcher v. Harcot, Hutton 55.

I come now to the question which was very fully argued before us in the present case—namely, Does this right of indemnity which exists in the case of a wrongdoer by misadventure when the wrong is a private wrong, exist also in any case in which the wrong is a criminal offence? The defendants contend that it does not. They say that in no case whatever where the act done constitutes a criminal offence can the doer of it have a right of indemnity against any of the consequences of the act. It appears to me that this proposition of the defendants is wider and more general than the law warrants. Certainly there is no right of indemnity where the doer of the act, which another has authorized or induced, knows it at the time to be an offence. If, upon the face of his claim for an indemnity in a case in which knowledge is an essential ingredient of the offence, the plaintiff admitted that he was guilty of the offence, his claim would be, on the face of it, bad. If, in a like case, he was at the trial found to have been convicted of the offence, judgment must be given against him. Nor, in my judgment, can there be any valid claim to indemnity when the doer of the act which constitutes the offence has done it with knowledge of all the circumstances necessary to constitute the act an offence, but in ignorance that the act done under those circumstances constituted an offence. A man is presumed to know the law. Again, although it is not necessary to decide the point, I am inclined to think that there could be no claim to indemnity for being authorized or induced to do an act, when the act, which is in fact criminal, is done in ignorance, indeed, of some circumstances which is necessary to constitute a crime, or even is done in a belief that such circumstance does not exist, but the doer knows that the act is honestly a wrong act. In such a case the doer of the act has the mens rea in the sense attributed to that expression by Bramwell, B., in the well-known case of Reg. v. Prince, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 154, 23 W. R. Dig. 65, and referred to by Willes, J., in Queen v. Tolson, 37 W. R. 716, 23 Q. B. D., 168, at p. 180. Such cases I think might occur, although it is not likely to come often. But I am unable to accept the defendants' proposition where the act, though a criminal offence—malum prohibitum—is upon the state of facts which the doer by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the person against whom he claims indemnity, has been induced to believe to be the true state of facts neither criminal nor immoral. Take the present case as an example, and for the purposes of the argument the facts must be assumed to be as the plaintiff alleges them to be. [His lordship then referred again to the facts.] It appears to me that a representation that the expedition had the "sanction" of her Majesty's Government, necessarily involves a representation that the "sanction" had been given in the way in which by section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, it would be properly given—namely, with the license of her Majesty.

The learned counsel far the defendants contended that any claim for damages arising out of this matter which constitutes an offence on the ground of public policy was legally inadmissable. Speaking for myself I can see no ground of public policy upon which redress for consequent damages should be refused to the person so led to commit an offence by the false and fraudulent misrepresentations of fact which in this case, if true, as he believed them to be, justified the doer in believing that he was acting in accordance with the law.

It appears to me that if the defendants' reasoning on this point were adopted a real injustice might result. For instance, the Licensing Act, 1872, makes it an offence for any licensed person to sell any intoxicating liquor to any drunken person. It was held in Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207, that the prohibition was absolute, and that knowledge of the condition of the person served with liquor was not necessary to constitute the offence. Suppose a person by a fraudulent misrepresentation of the sobriety of another person, who gives no indication of intoxication, but whom he knows to be drunk, authorizes and induces a licensed victualler, who has no reason to disbelieve and does himself believe the truth of the representation, to sell drink to the drunken person, and the licensed victualler is convicted and fined, upon what consideration of public policy should a man who, if the representation as to sobriety had been true, would have committed no offence, either against law or morals, be debarred from redress against the man who had by fraud inflicted upon him what might be a very serious injury? Or take a case under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 44. A person who receives two or more lunatics into his house not being a registered asylum or hospital or a house duly licensed under the Act or any previous Act commits an indictable offence, and in Reg. v. Bishop, 28 W. R. 475, 5 Q. B. D. 259, it was held by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved that it afforded no defence to prove, as was proved in that case, that the defendant honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that the persons who he received were not lunatic. Suppose in such a case that the belief had been induced by a false and fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the person who requested and authorized the proprietor of the house to receive the persons into his care. I am unable to see upon what ground of public policy or of justice the proprietor who has been led into the committing of the offence by the fraud of another should be denied a right of suing for damages. There is an express provision in the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1895, s. 328, for the right of a person convicted under the Act recovering the amount of any penalty in which he may have been convicted under the Act together with all costs from the person who sold him the adulterated article.

Mr. Cohen has, for the defendants, relied principally upon the opinion which was expressed by Lord Lyndhurst, C.B., in Colburn v. Patmore, It is quoted and criticized in the notes to Lampleigh v. Brathwait in Smith's Leading Cases (7th ed.), p. 159. It does not appear to me to help the defendants in the present case. The facts shortly were that the plaintiff, the proprietor of a journal, had been prosecuted, convicted, and fined for falsely and maliciously printing and publishing a libel in his newspaper. He thereupon sued the editor for damages, which included the amount of the fine and the expenses he had been put to in defending himself. The decision of the court was given upon a point of pleading, but there was a very full discussion in the course of the argument as to the right of the plaintiff, having been himself convicted and fined for the libel, to sue the editor for indemnity. The members of the court in the course of the argument expressed a strong opinion that he had no such right, and Lord Lyndhurst said, "I entertain little or no doubt that such an action could not be maintained." The plaintiff in Colburn v. Patmore could not after his conviction be heard to say that he did not falsely and maliciously publish the libel. As it was put by Alderton, B., in the course of the argument, the plaintiff though actually ignorant was legally cognizant of the publication of the libel. Here the gist of the plaintiff's case is that he did not know the facts which made his conduct criminal, but, on the contrary, was led by the defendants to believe and did believe in the existence of a fact—the sanction of the British Government, which if it was given, as he had a right upon the defendants' representation to assume it had been in the proper way—namely, by license of her Majesty—would have been an answer to any imputation of illegality. Further, while I have felt it my duty to deal with the case as if the plaintiff had been convicted and was claiming an indemnity from the final consequences of a criminal offence, it should, I think, be borne in mind that in fact the plaintiff here has not been convicted and is claiming under various heads damages which are connected with the possibility of conviction and punishment. The nearest claim to an indemnity to damages consequent upon the conduct of the defendants inducing the commission of action is contained in the allegation that he was brought to England as a prisoner. Whether any of these other heads of damage are so proximately connected with the alleged tortious conduct of the defendants as to be legally recoverable we have not to consider. It is a matter which, like the proof of the act itself, the plaintiff will have to prove at the trial. It may be that in any case some of these claims of damages might be legally sustained even if a claim for indemnity strictly so-called against the penal consequences of the commission of an offence could not. I prefer, however, to base my judgment for the plaintiff in regard to the question before the court upon the broader grounds which I have stated above.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., Jeune, P., and Rigby, L.J.) — June 29, 30; July 14, 1899.

DAY v. SINGLETON. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Leaseholds—Sale subject to consent of lessor—Duty of vendor to obtain consent—Vendor inducing lessor to refuse—Measure of damages.

When a lessee whose lease prohibits assignment without the written consent of the lessor enters into an agreement, expressed to be subject to the lessor's consent, to sell the property, he is bound to do his best to obtain such consent. If the vendor does not perform that duty, and still more if he actually induces the lessor to refuse, he is liable to an action for damages in which the purchaser may recover not only his deposit with interest and costs, but also damages for the loss which he has sustained owing to the vendor's omission to obtain the required consent.

Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158, distinguished.

In such a case, if it appears that the vendor has made no effort to obtain the lessor's consent, it will be presumed against him that he could have procured it; and it is then for him to prove that he could not have induced the lessor to accept the purchaser as a tenant.

Appeal from Romer, J.

Dunn was lessee from the Governors of the Charterhouse of a private hotel known as Cocker's Hotel. The lease, which expired in 1900, contained several restrictive covenants preventing him (inter alia) from making structural alterations and from assigning the premises without the written consent of the lessors. Dunn obtained from the lessors a promise of a renewal of his lease until 1940, and also permission to put up a public bar on the premises, and to make other alterations. But the lessors insisted upon reserving power to remove the bar at any time, should they think fit. Dunn commenced the alterations, but before he had completed them he entered into an agreement to sell the hotel and his business to the plaintiff. The contract was contained in a memorandum dated the 1st of April, 1897, which was as follows: "Received of Mr. Frank Day the sum of £325 as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money for the lease and goodwill of 'Cocker's Hotel,' 18, 19, 20, and 21, Charterhouse-square. Also the whole of the stabling and warehouse at the back. The lease has about forty years to run on the whole property. Rent £560, less a portion let off for stabling and warehouse in rear £220, the net rental being £340. The whole of the furniture and household effects on the premises to be included. The takings were about £2,800 to £3,000 per annum. I, Mr. Dunn, undertaking to finish my contract I now have with my builders for completion of the alterations and additions now being carried out, which include all gas fittings, the fitting up of bar and beer engine or otherwise, the same to be allowed for. The hotel is fully licensed for wine, spirits, and beer, on and off the premises. The present alterations to be completed within one month from the date hereof. All painting and graining to be done by me and allowed for. The title of the above premises to be satisfactory, and, subject to landlord's consent to transference of lease; price £6,500 all at.—Dated this 1st day of April, 1897. (Signed) A. D. DUNN, FRANK DAY."

On the 2nd of April, 1897, H. W. Lee, the agent of the governors, was informed of the agreement by Dunn's solicitors, who suggested that the new lease should be granted direct to the plaintiff. Lee gave no definite answer about accepting the plaintiff as a tenant, but he informed Dunn that the plaintiff would not be allowed to retain the bar.

On the 26th of April, 1897, Dunn died. Litigation ensued respecting his will. On the 24th of May, 1897, the defendant Singleton was appointed administrator pendente lite; on the 13th of April, 1898, the other defendants, as executors, duly proved the will. An action for the administration of the estate in the Chancery Division was then commenced, an order for administration was obtained, and the administration was being proceeded with.

On the 11th of June, 1897, Day was informed that he could not have the bar. After some correspondence, in which Day insisted on specific performance with compensation for the loss of the bar, the defendant Singleton, by his solicitors, on the 2nd of November, 1897, required Day to elect whether he would complete the contract or rescind it, and on the 7th of December, 1897, Singleton's solicitor sent Day a notice rescinding the contract, and offering to return his deposit with interest, and to pay any costs he had been put to. On the 14th of December, 1897, Lee, the lessor's agent, wrote to Singleton's solicitors pressing for the rent, which was in arrear. On the 15th of December, 1897, the solicitors, in a letter to Lee, after fully describing the nature of the difficulties in which Singleton found himself owing to the bargain with the plaintiff being neither on nor off, wrote as follows: "The heavy arrears of rent," due to the Charterhouse from Singleton as administrator, "ought to be paid, and the administrator is not in funds at the present time to meet them. There are persons quite ready, and who have offered, to purchase the hotel at a price slightly beyond that proposed to be given by Mr. Day, and who would, we believe, be considered eligible tenants by the governors, which would at once relieve the administrator of difficulty. The contract with Mr. Day was stated to be (and of course was) subject to approval by the Charterhouse. We have taken the necessary steps to rescind it, but in the view of possible further litigation with him we think we may ask the governors whether, taking into consideration all the circumstances, they would or would not be satisfied with him as a tenant if the contract were still in existence." Lee replied that he did not think it was likely that the plaintiff would be accepted as a tenant. In another letter to Lee, dated the 8th of March, 1898, Singleton's solicitors said: "We beg to inform you that on the 14th of January last Mr. Day commenced an action in the Chancery Division against Mr. Singleton, the administrator pendente lite, claiming specific performance and compensation in respect of the contract for the sale to him of the hotel. . . . It will in all probability be some time before the action is reached. . . . May we therefore now again ask the governors whether, taking into consideration all the circumstances, they would or would not accept Mr. Day as a tenant if the contract were still in existence, which we deny?" Day, knowing nothing of this correspondence, had, in December, 1897, commenced an action against Singleton for specific performance with compensation, and delivered a statement of claim. Singleton, in his reply, delivered on the 27th of January, 1898, pleaded that the lessors would not consent to the transfer to the plaintiff of the existing lease or of the proposed new lease. The plaintiff's reply was filed on the 2nd of February, 1898.

On the 9th of July, 1898, the plaintiff amended his claim, adding Dunn's executors as defendants, abandoning his claim for specific performance, and claiming damages occasioned by Singleton's breach of duty in inducing the lessors to refuse their consent to an assignment to the plaintiff. He also claimed a return of his deposit with interest. In the meantime Dunn's executors had sold the hotel and business to other purchasers for £6,825—£325 more than the plaintiff had agreed to give; and it was on hearing of this sale that the plaintiff amended his claim.

At the trial before Romer, J., Lee was not called, and no evidence was given to show what the lessors would have done if they had been asked to accept Day as their tenant, and had been told that Dunn's representatives were desirous of completing the sale.

Romer, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of his deposit, with interest, and the costs of the investigation of the title, but held, on the authority of Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158, that he was not entitled to recover any damages for the loss of the bargain.

The plaintiff appealed.

July 14.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the judgment of himself and RIGBY, L.J., as follows: The question raised by this appeal is whether a purchaser of leasehold property, which the vendor could not assign without a licence from his lessor, is entitled to damages (beyond the deposit, interest, and expenses) by reason of the vendor's omission to do his best to procure such licence. [His lordship stated the facts down to the delivery of the reply, and proceeded:] Pausing here, let us consider the rights of the parties at this time. Day was willing to complete if he could obtain the new lease and compensation for the loss of the bar. But it is obvious that he was not willing to complete if he could not get the new lease, and that he did not take the risk of obtaining or not obtaining the lessors' consent to its transfer to him. He was not, therefore, in a position to succeed in his action if such consent could not be obtained. If, however, the lessors' consent could be obtained, Singleton had no defence to Day's action. Singleton's notice to rescind did not deprive Day of his right to specific performance with compensation for loss of the bar, if the lessors' consent could be obtained. It was Singleton's business, as Dunn's representative, to obtain that consent if he could (Lehmann v. McArthur); although it was not necessary to obtain it until the time for completing the assignment to Day had arrived: see Ellis v. Rogers, 29 Ch. D. 661, 33 W. R. Dig. 237. If Singleton could not obtain the consent, then, as already stated, specific performance would be impossible, and Day's action as it stood must have failed, and in such case Day could only have recovered back his deposit and interest and the costs of investigating the title. This is shown by Bain v. Fothergill. But if Singleton could have got the lessors' consent and would not, still more if the refusal of that consent was procured by Singleton, Day would have had a right of action for damages against Singleton for a breach of his duty to obtain the lessors' consent, it being in his power to obtain it. In such an action (unless Bain v. Fothergill extends to it, which I will consider presently) the measure of damages would not be confined to the deposit and interest and costs rendered useless, but the measure of damages would be the loss occasioned by not obtaining the lease with compensation for the absence of the bar. Singleton never asked the lessors to accept Day as their tenant without a bar, and consequently it would be for him (Singleton) to show that if he had asked them they would have refused. [His lordship then stated the rest of the facts, and proceeded:]

Romer, J., did not think that the plaintiff had proved that Singleton, by his solicitors, had induced he lessors to decline to accept Day as their tenant, and the learned judge considered that the case fell within Bain v. Fothergill. He took a very charitable view of the letter of the 15th of December, 1897; but, even taking this view of it, Singleton certainly made no effort to obtain the lessors' consent to the required assignment without a bar, as it was his duty to do. But for that letter there is no reason to suppose that Day would not have been accepted as a tenant without a bar, and it ought to be inferred as against Singleton that the lessors would have accepted Day, if Singleton had asked them to do so. Having regard to this circumstance, we do not think that Bain v. Fothergill covers this case. There the vendors did all they could to obtain the lessors' consent to the assignment, and they failed to obtain it: see L. R. 7 H. L., p. 175. The first question submitted to the judges (see p. 170) shows that what was being considered was the rule as to damages on the sale of real estate where a vendor, without his default, is unable to make a good title. Lord Chelmsford's judgment is addressed to that question, and his observations on fraud (on pp. 206-7) are part of his comment on Hopkins v. Grazebrook, 6 B. & C. 31, which had decided that the exceptional rule laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill did not apply where the vendor knew that he had not a good title, although he believed he could get one, and had in fact an equitable title. Neither Lord Chelmsford's judgment nor Lord Hatherley's is an authority for the application of that exceptional rule to the case of a vendor who can make a good title but will not, or will not do what he can do and ought to do in order to obtain one. Such a case is, however, covered by Engel v. Fitch, which was to a certain extent based on Hopkins v. Grazebrook, and was much commented on in, but not overruled by, Bain v. Fothergill.

These observations do not, however, dispose of this case. They render it necessary to consider another difficulty, which is this: If Dunn's representatives had tried to obtain the lessor's consent, and had failed, Day could have obtained no more damages than those he has recovered. The damage to him is occasioned by his not obtaining what he was entitled to by his contract, and, so far as damages are concerned, the reason why he fails to obtain what he bargained for is immaterial. The damage is the same whatever that reason may be. Why, then, should he obtain more damages if no attempt is made to obtain the lessors' consent than he would be entitled to if a proper effort to obtain such consent had been made and had failed? The only reason which can be assigned for deciding that he is entitled to more is that the rule which limits his damages in the first case is itself an anomalous rule based upon and justified by difficulties in showing a good title to real property in this country, but one which ought not to be extended to cases in which the reasons on which it is based do not apply. This answer to the question with which we are dealing appears to us sufficient and satisfactory. The answer may possibly be difficult to reconcile with some of Lord Chelmsford's observations in Bain v. Fothergill, but the answer is, in our opinion, quite consistent with the decision in that case, and it has the merit of preventing the rule there upheld from leading to grievous injustice.

We come, therefore, to the conclusion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, except so far as it relates to the deposit, and that it ought to be declared that the plaintiff is entitled to the damages which he has sustained by the omission of the defendant Singleton to obtain the consent of the Governors of the Charterhouse to the assignment to the plaintiff of the lease referred to in the memorandum of the 1st of April, 1897, without the bar, which the said governors would not allow the plaintiff to have. Then there must be an inquiry to ascertain the amount of these damages, and the defendant Singleton must be ordered to pay them. He must look for his indemnity to Dunn's estate.

As regards the costs, the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the appeal, and to the costs of the action, and the defendants must look to Dunn's estate for their indemnity.

JEUNE, P., read the following judgment: I think that in this case the real question is one of fact rather than of law, and I am compelled to differ from the conclusion of the learned judge in the court below mainly because I cannot accept his view of the facts, which is founded hardly at all on the evidence of witnesses, but turns on the inference to be drawn from certain correspondence. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] The action, therefore, as it now stands, is a claim for damages, based on the refusal by the administrator to carry out Mr. Dunn's contract, and on his not only failing to do his best to obtain the consent of the lessors to the assignment to Day, but inducing the lessors to refuse such consent.

I am compelled to differ from the learned judge in the court below as to the proper inference to be drawn from the facts and correspondence to which I have referred. To me it appears abundantly clear that the administrator's solicitors, acting on his behalf, did not use their best endeavours to obtain the lessors' consent, but, on the contrary, endeavoured, and I think successfully endeavoured, to induce the lessors through their solicitor to refuse that consent. It should be mentioned that on the 2nd of April, 1897, Messrs. Roscoe & Hincks wrote to Mr. Lee recommending Mr. Day as an assignee, and stating that they were informed that he was a man of respectability and good means. It was then their interest to get Mr. Day accepted as a tenant. But by December it was greatly to the interest of the estate which they represented to induce the governors to refuse their consent. They could so, but only so, get rid of the impending action for specific performance and compensation, to which as far as I can see they had no answer; and they would also be made free to sell their property on more advantageous terms. I do not think it possible that an experienced solicitor, such as Mr. Lee doubtless is, could fail to understand the drift of the letter of the 15th of December, or to see that the administrator was asking the governors to refuse to their consent on account of the great advantage which such refusal would be to him; and also the advantage which he suggests it would be to the governors. And I cannot, as a matter of common sense, refuse to connect the refusal which promptly followed with the letter of the 15th of December.

Romer, J., was struck with the fact that Mr.

Lee was not called by the plaintiff. It appears to me that it was for the defendants to call him to refute, if they could, the strong presumption arising from their letter, and to show, if they could, that something other than Messrs. Roscoe & Hincks' representations induced the governors to refuse their assent. It was argued before us that the letter of the 15th of December was written bonâ fide in the interests of Mr. Dunn's estate. I have no doubt that it was. But, as Mr. Neville pointed out in his forcible reply, Mr. Singleton had a duty to Mr. Day superior to that to Mr. Dunn's estate, and it was just because he was zealous in regard to his duty to that estate that he failed in his duty to the person with whom Mr. Dunn had contracted.

But now comes the question whether, on the facts as I have found them, an action lies at the suit of the plaintiff, and an action in which full damages can be recovered. It is contended that the case of Bain v. Fothergill is a conclusive authority against such a proposition.

The effect of the decision in Bain v. Fothergill is, I think, summed up in saying that it overruled the exception which the court in the case of Hopkins v. Grazebrook had sought to engraft on the rule laid down in the case of Flureau v. Thornhill. What that exception was may be stated in the words of Lord Chelmsford in his judgment in Bain v. Fothergill (at p. 206): "The exception which the court in Hopkins v. Grazebrook engrafted upon the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill has always been taken to be this: that in an action for breach of contract for the sale of real estate, if the vendor at the time of entering into the contract knew that he had no title the purchaser has a right to recover damages for the loss of his bargain." As the law, therefore, now stands, limited damages only can be recovered in an action for breach of contract for the sale of real estate, whether or no the vendor knows that he had no title to the thing contracted to be sold. Lord Chelmsford, indeed, in his judgment (p. 207) was led to regard the rule laid down in Flureau v. Thornhill as without exception. "I think," he said, "the rule as to the limits within which damages may be recovered upon breach of contract for the sale of real estate must be taken to be without exception. If a person enters into a contract for the sale of a real estate, knowing that he has no title to it nor any means of acquiring it, the purchaser cannot recover damages beyond the expenses he has incurred by action for the breach of the contract; he can only obtain other damages by an action for deceit."

But the present action is not, I think, to be regarded as an action for breach of contract to sell the lease of the hotel in question. It is really an action against Mr. Singleton for failing in his duty to obtain, if he could, the consent of the Charterhouse to a transfer.

I do not think it can be doubted that it is the duty of a vendor to make a good title for his purchaser if he can, and certainly not to do anything to impair or spoil such title. The emphatic words of Turner, L.J., in Williams v. Glenton have been often referred to: "The vendor is bound to complete the contract, and if he does not take the steps which are necessary to enable him to do so, he is liable for damages upon the contract; and heavy damages would be given if, having the means of completing the sale, he should decline to take the proceedings necessary for the purpose." It may perhaps be doubted if the expression of opinion that the vendor is liable for damages upon the contract does not conflict with the dicta of Lord Chelmsford, but the expression of the duty of the vendor leads to no such conflict. In Lehmann v. McArthur Page Wood, L.J., said "it was the duty of McArthur" (the vendor in that case) "to do his best to obtain the landlord's consent." Engel v. Fitch, decided by the Court of Queen's Bench and the Exchequer Chamber, appears to me to be an authority on this point. In that case the mortgagee of a house sold it to the plaintiff, the particulars of sale stating that possession would be given on completion of the purchase. The title was satisfactory, but the mortgagor, who was in possession, refused to go out, and the vendors refused to oust him by ejectment or to complete the sale. It was held that the rule in Flureau v. Thornhill did not prevent the purchaser from recovering damages for the loss of his bargain. It is quite true that in the judgment of Kelly, C.B., may be found words which approve the decision in Hopkins v. Grazebrook. But the case of Engel v. Fitch appears to me to rest on ground quite different from that taken in Hopkins v. Grazebrook. It turned, not on the knowledge of the vendor of his want of title, but on his failure to do his best to carry out his contract.

Nor does the case of Bain v. Fothergill at all conflict with this view of the duty of a vendor. The decision in that case clearly does not. The words of Lord Chelmsford are, no doubt, very general, but they may be understood to refer to the exception which the case of Hopkins v. Grazebrook sought to engraft on the rule of Flureau v. Thornhill. Lord Hatherley, on the other hand, repeating, as I think, his former opinion expressed in Lehmann v. McArthur, said, referring to the case of Engel v. Fitch: "The vendor in that case was bound by his contract, as every vendor is bound by his contract, to do all that he could to complete the conveyance. Whenever it is a matter of conveyancing, and not a matter of title, it is the duty of the vendor to do everything that he is enabled to do by force of his own interest, and also by force of the interest of others that he can compel to concur in the conveyance." But it should be added that his lordship proceeded to express a doubt whether in Engel v. Fitch damages were properly given in respect of the loss of the contract. It cannot, I think, be said that the House of Lords in Bain v. Fothergill overruled the case of Engel v. Fitch.

I am of opinion that in the present case the vendor's representative distinctly failed in his duty to do his best to obtain the lessors' consent. Indeed he went further, and, as I think, prevented that consent from being given. I can see no reason why he is not liable to an action for this, and why in such an action damages should not be awarded to compensate the plaintiff. Now, what are the damages in the present case? They are not, I think, exactly the damages for the plaintiff's loss of bargain in respect of this hotel. It is true that the defendant did not, and could not, complete Dunn's contract to sell the hotel with the bar, but this did not arise from the refusal of the Charterhouse to accept the plaintiff as a tenant, but from the terms of the lease to the vendor. What happened was that the plaintiff accepted the position that he could not have the hotel with the bar, and in consequence brought an action for specific performance with compensation for the loss of the bar. It was in consequence of and in order to defeat this action that Singleton, as I think, resorted to the plan of getting the Charterhouse to refuse to take the plaintiff as tenant, and the result of the refusal necessarily was that the action was rendered abortive. I think that the defendant is liable for the consequences of his conduct, such consequences being that the plaintiff lost, not the hotel with the bar, but a successful result to his action—that is to say, a decree of specific performance with compensation. It seems that the hotel without the bar has been sold far a larger sum than the plaintiff agreed to give for it with the bar, and this fact will be material in estimating the amount of the damages.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff, with an inquiry as to damages estimated on the principle which I have indicated.

RIVER RIBBLE JOINT COMMITTEE v. HALLIWELL. SAME v. SHORROCK. (a.)

River—Pollution—Putrid solid matter—Right of impounding or diverting water—Rivers Pollution Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), ss. 2, 17, 20.

The defendant had been for many years the owner of weaving sheds on the bank of a river, and, before the passing of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, had acquired a right of diverting and impounding water for the purpose of his business. The water higher up the stream contained vegetable refuse, which, if it had been allowed to flow along the natural course of the river, would not have become putrid. But when it settled in the defendant's impounding reservoir it became putrid, and, when the reservoir was periodically cleared out by opening sluices, the effluent contained the vegetable refuse which had so become putrid. The effluent consisted of 97·6 per cent. of water and 2·4 of solid matter. Proceedings having been taken against the defendant, in which it was alleged that he put putrid solid matter into the river contrary to the provisions of section 2 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876,

Held, that the defendant was protected from liability under the Act by section 17.

Held, also (by A. L. Smith and Rigby, L.JJ.), that the matter put into the river by the defendant was not solid matter.

Per Vaughan Williams, L.J.—Quære, whether the proper time for considering whether the matter was solid was not the moment of commencing the operation of flushing rather than the moment when the matter came into contact with the stream.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, J.) on the hearing of an appeal in two actions brought in the Blackburn County Court by the Joint Committee of the River Ribble under the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant in each action put or caused to be put or to fall, or knowingly permitted to be put or to fall or to be carried into the River Darwen certain putrid solid matter, so as to interfere with its due flow and to pollute its waters, contrary to the provisions of section 2 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, and they claimed against the defendant in each action an order under section 10 requiring him to abstain from the commission of any further offence against the Act, and an order requiring him to perform his duty in the premises in manner to be specified in such last-mentioned order, and with such conditions and directions for carrying it into effect as to the court should seem meet.

The defendant Halliwell was and had been for many years the owner of weaving sheds worked by steam power on the banks of the River Darwen. Higher up the stream there were a considerable number of manufactories of paper, which discharged vegetable refuse into the river. Before the passing of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, Halliwell had acquired a right to divert water from the river for the purposes of his business by means of a goit. The water passed through the goit into a large impounding reservoir, where it was allowed to settle, and it was then let into a smaller reservoir for the purpose of condensation. It was necessary to clear out the larger reservoir from time to time in order to prevent it silting up, and the practice was on Saturdays to open three sluices and let the water flow through the reservoir and out into the stream. If the vegetable refuse from the paper manufactories had been allowed to flow along the natural course of the river it would not have become putrid. But when it settled at the bottom of the reservoir it did become putrid, and, when the sluices were opened, the effluent contained the vegetable refuse which had so become putrid. The defendant did not add any solid matter to the water in the reservoir, but only let the contents of the reservoir flow out. Spades and shovels were used to stir up the deposit at the bottom of the reservoir, but the only effect of this was to clear out the reservoir more quickly. The effluent consisted of 97·6 per cent. of water and 2.4 per cent. of solid matter.

The facts in the other action were substantially the same.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant in each case, being of opinion, first, that the effluent was not "solid matter" within the meaning of section 2 of the Rivers Pollution Act, having regard to the definition in section 20; and secondly, that the defendants were protected by section 17.

Section 2 of the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876, enacts that "Every person who puts or causes to be put or to fall or knowingly permits to be put or to fall or to be carried into any stream, so as . . . to interfere with its due flow or to pollute its waters, the solid refuse of any manufactory, manufacturing process or quarry, or any rubbish or cinders, or any other waste or any putrid solid matter, shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act."

By section 17, "This Act shall not apply to or affect the lawful exercise of any rights of impounding or diverting water."

By section 20, "In this Act, if not inconsistant with the context . . . 'solid matter' shall not include particles of matter in suspension in water."

The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the county court judge.

The Joint Committee of the River Ribble appealed.

C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and F. H. Mellor, for the appellants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the respondents.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this case may be decided in favour of the respondents either under section 2 coupled with section 20, or under section 17. The charge against them is that they have put putrid solid matter into the River Darwen. No doubt the matter which they put into the river was putrid and polluted the river. But was it, at the time when they put it into the river, solid matter? Having putrid solid matter at the bottom of the reservoir was not an offence against the Act. What constitutes an offence against the Act is putting putrid solid matter into a river. I am not sure that this was ever solid matter at all, but the evidence clearly shows that at the time when it was put into the river it was not solid. I should come to this conclusion independently of section 20. I think the judgment of the Divisional Court on this point was right. I also think the judgment was right as to section 17. The respondents have for years been carrying on their business and exercising their right of impounding for the purpose of getting clear water, and in my opinion they are within the protection of section 17. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

RIGBY, L J., concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. But I prefer to rest my decision on section 17. As to section 2, I am inclined to think, for my part, that the time with regard to which we ought to consider whether the matter was solid, is the moment of commencing the operation of flushing, and that a case might well be within the Act though the matter had ceased to be solid when it was brought into contact with the stream.

WALTERS AND OTHERS v. GREEN AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trade union — Strike and lock-out — "Watching or besetting" — Interlocutory injunction — Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 86), ss. 3, 7—Practice—Joinder of parties—R. S. C., ord. 16, rr. 1, 4, 11.

The eight defendants, who were officials of various trades unions, met men who had been brought over by the plaintiffs under contracts from Ireland to replace workmen on strike, at the railway station of their destination, and persuaded many of them to leave the place or to refuse to work for the plaintiffs. The seven plaintiffs were several master builders and members of a master-builders' association.

Held, (1) that the action was properly constituted, since the seven plaintiffs were suing the eight defendants on one and the same series of transactions and to determine a question of combination; (2) that the acts complained of in two out of the eight cases were a "watching or besetting" within the meaning of section 7 of the Conspiracy Act, 1875; and an injunction was granted in those two cases accordingly.

This was a motion to restrain the defendants from watching or besetting any railway station in Hull or elsewhere or the works of the plaintiffs or any of them or the approaches to any such station or works or any place where any persons employed or about to be employed by or working or intending to work for the plaintiffs or any of them resided or worked or happened to be, for the purpose of persuading such persons not to work or abstain from working for the plaintiffs or any of them or for any other purpose than to obtain or communicate information. A preliminary question was raised on the hearing of the motion as to whether the action was properly constituted, and that led to his lordship directing a statement of claim to be delivered; this now came before him and was said by his lordship to state very clearly the cause of action which the plaintiffs claimed and to enable him to deal with great facility with that objection.

The plaintiffs were master builders carrying on their businesses at Hull and were members of the master builders' association there.

The defendants were officials of the various trades unions at Hull and also of a federation called the Hull Building Trades' Federation, which was a union of unions connected with Hull. It appeared that in the early part of the present year there arose a labour dispute in the building trade, and as a result a large number of men employed either struck or were locked out. In order to replace the services of the workmen so lost the plaintiffs, the masters, imported workmen from Belfast in Ireland. These men entered into contracts with an agent of the masters that they would go to Hull and work as non-union men for twelve months for such firms belonging to the masters' union as the masters' association should specify, and in other cases as a particular member of that body should specify. In this connection paragraphs 9 and 10 of the statement of claim were important. Paragraph 9 said: "The defendants having ascertained that the masters' association were bringing workmen from other places to Hull to fill the positions vacated by the men on strike or locked out as aforesaid, thereupon with the intention of injuring the plaintiffs and other members of the masters' association in their trade and business, and thereby compelling the plaintiffs and the other members of the association to accept the terms of the unions, and to conduct their respective businesses in accordance with the requirements of the unions, wrongfully and without lawful excuse combined and conspired together to watch and beset, or cause or procure to be watched and beset railway stations and other places where workmen brought to Hull by the masters' association as aforesaid, or other non-union men employed or about to be employed by the plaintiffs or some or one of them might happen to be, and the approaches thereto respectively, for the purpose of persuading or otherwise inducing such workmen not to work or to cease working for the plaintiffs or any of them or any other member of the masters' association." Paragraph 10 continued: "In furtherance and execution of the said combination and conspiracy, the defendants wrongfully and without legal authority did, or caused to be done, the several overt acts, of which particulars are stated in the next succeeding paragraph hereof, for the purpose of persuading or otherwise inducing workmen brought to Hull by the masters' association as aforesaid, or other non-union workmen working or intending to work for the plaintiffs or any of them, or any other members of the masters' association, and did in fact persuade or induce many of such workmen to leave Hull or refuse or cease to work for the plaintiffs or any of them or any other member of the masters' association, by reason whereof the plaintiffs have been much hindered and interfered with in the lawful conduct of their respective businesses, and have respectively suffered serious loss and damage." Paragraph 11 gave particulars of the overt acts complained of.

Upjohn, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs, said that the torts in respect of which the defendants were sued were not separate, but were acts of conspiring together within the meaning of section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875: Lyons v. Wilkins, 47 W. R. 291, [1899] 1 Ch. 255; also see Clerk & Lindsell, Law of Torts (2nd ed.), p. 53: "Persons are said to be joint tortfeasors when their respective shares in the commission of the tort are done in furtherance of a common design." The effect of ord. 16, rr. 1, 4, and 11, is that where A., B., and C. are, for example, joint trustees in X. trust, and A. and B. also joint trustees in Y. trust, if A., B., and C. are sued jointly, the case to succeed must be proved against all three. Here, the real injuria is the common design to put pressure on the plaintiffs which is unlawful: Flood v. Jackson, 43 W. R. 453, [1895] 2 Q. B. 21. There is a combination in overt acts: Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick, 1 Car. & Kir. 24; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25; Skinner v. Gunton, 1 Williams's Saunders, 269; Drincqbier v. Wood, 47 W. R. 252, [1899] 1 Ch. 393; Gower v. Couldridge, 46 W. R. 214, [1898] 1 Q. B. 348. It is not necessary to prove everything against everybody; the court is competent to direct a separate assessment of damages in the different cases.

J. D. Crawford, for six of the defendants, said that the acts complained of were distinct acts committed against distinct plaintiffs on distinct occasions, and that therefore seven plaintiffs could not be joined in the one action in accordance with order 16: Smurthwaite v. Hannay, 43 W. R. 113, [1894] A. C. 494. That this order was not passed for the purpose of dealing with distinct cases of tort has been shown in Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., 45 W. R. 51, [1896] A. C. 450; Thompson v. London County Council, 47 W. R. 433, [1899] 1 Q. B. 840; Gower v. Couldridge. The terms of sections 3 and 7 of the Conspiracy Act, 1875, make clear the importance of keeping the actions separate. An action in which seven plaintiffs and eight defendants are joined makes fifty-six issues. Where the defendants are joint tortfeasors, that does not give a cause of action to joint plaintiffs: Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 258, [1898] A. C. 1; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor; Hutchins v. Hutchins, Ir. R. 10 Eq. 453, 25 W. R. Dig. 10.

Stewart Smith, for defendants Hall and Cuttill, officials of the Carpenters' and Joiners' Association, said that there was no evidence that they were agents of the other defendants, or that they authorized the acts of the other defendants.

Aug. 9.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued: In order to ascertain whether the action is properly constituted, let me consider what would be the case if a single plaintiff were suing all these defendants. It appears to me that the allegations contained in paragraphs 9 and 10 of the statement of claim (set out above) amount to this, that the defendants jointly committed a series of illegal acts causing damage to the plaintiffs. Therefore what is alleged is a joint cause of action. In my judgment, therefore, the case is distinguishable entirely from the case of Sadler v. The Great Western Railway, which on this point was relied on. The decision there was on claims for damages, and it was held that such claims against two or more defendants in respect of their several liability for separate torts cannot be combined in one action. The present case is not one of suing several defendants on account of several liability for several torts, but jointly in respect of their acts. Lord Davey in his judgment in Sadler v. Great Western Railway Co., at p. 456 of [1896] A. C., puts it thus: "I believe there is not a scintilla of allegation, nor was it intended, as the appellants' counsel fairly said, to state in the statement of claim that there was anything else than a separate cause of action—that there was anything like a joint cause of action, or a joint action of any kind on behalf of the defendants." In this case the allegations are of a totally different kind. Then, if I may make a few remarks as to what the result would be supposing that it were not established that all the defendants have committed the acts complained of, I think the authorities to which I was referred—viz., Skinner v. Gunton; Savile v. Roberts, 1 Ld. Ray. 374, at p. 379; Muriel v. Tracy, 6 Mod. 169—show that even if the result of the trial be that some only of the defendants are shown to have committed such acts, judgment may be recovered against them, and even against one of them. I do not at all speculate on the result of the evidence at the trial; it is obvious that difficulties may arise in proving joint acts. It is enough to state now that the action is brought in respect of joint acts.

Then the next question is whether the plaintiffs can properly combine in bringing this action. That depends on the effect of the recent modification of ord. 16, r. 4. As it now stands it runs thus: "All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or, in the alternative, where, if such persons brought separate actions, any common question of law or fact would arise." The meaning of that rule was considered by the Court of Appeal in Stroud v. Lawson, 46 W. R. 626, [1898] 2 Q. B. 44, where Chitty, L.J., says: "It is necessary that both these conditions should be fulfilled—that is to say, that the right to relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of or arise out of the same transaction, and also that there should be a common question of fact or law in order that the case may be within the rule." I then ask, Are these two conditions fulfilled? It seems to me that they are, because, firstly, the right to relief as alleged here to exist arises out of the same series of transactions; secondly, there has been a question of fact as well as law—viz., whether all those acts were done in pursuance of a combination so as to make the defendants jointly responsible in respect of them.

Now, passing by the objection to the constitution of the action, we come to the question of the plaintiff's legal rights. On that I propose to say very little. The law is settled to a great extent in the case of Lyons v. Wilkins. That action was based on section 7, sub-section 4, of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, which runs as follows: "Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority" (inter alia) "(4) watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place . . ." shall, on conviction, be liable to certain penalties. Then follows a proviso: "Attending at or near the house or place where a person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section." I will read a few words from the judgment of Chitty, L.J., in that case, where he says: "To bring a case of watching and besetting within the section it must be shown that the watching or besetting was done with a view to compel the person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing." As to that, the allegations tend to show that the acts here were done with a view to compel the masters to act in accordance with the views of the trades unions and not in accordance with those they think fit to adopt, these views being perfectly legal and not otherwise objectionable. Then the lord justice says: "It was urged that the watching or besetting mentioned in the fourth sub-section was not rendered unlawful by that section where it was done for the purpose of persuading workmen to abstain from taking work from the person sought to be compelled. I cannot accept that proposition. I think that when that view is established the only case in which watching or besetting is allowed, or, in other words, is not unlawful, is that mentioned in the proviso at the end of the section—namely, where the attending at or near the house or place where a person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, is in order merely to obtain or communicate information. Attending in order to persuade is not within the proviso." So that although there may be attendance for the purpose of communicating information, there may not be attendance in order to persuade. As regards the general nature of the acts complained of, that is very similar to the recent case of Charnock v. Court. There is, however, one point in which the frame of this action differs from that. In that case all the members of the masters' association were plaintiffs in the first instance, though ultimately some were made defendants. They were all present. The contracts which were made here with the workmen were made on behalf of the masters' association, and the workmen were to work for such members of that body as should be specified by some member thereof. They were intercepted before they went to work, or before any member had been specified, and it is contended that that does not give rise to damage to a plaintiff who had not been specified. It seems to me that that is not so. I think that the men being intercepted so that a particular master lost the chance of employing those particular men who were intercepted, is a sufficient damage to enable the master to sue. I pass then to the question whether there is evidence that these defendants have been guilty of the acts complained of. Now, looking at the particulars given in the statement of claim, there are two defendants whose names are very prominent—namely, Tighe and Emerson. The case against them is most strongly urged. I begin first with Tighe, and it seems to me clear that he has been guilty of going beyond that which has been allowed by the clause of the section I have referred to. There are several such acts to which I might refer, but it will be sufficient to refer to one—viz., that which occurred on the 31st of May, and which is spoken to by the witness J. Hayes in paragraph 10 of his affidavit, where he says: "On arriving we put our boxes in the parcels office. A number of the men on strike were there and followed us out of the station. The man I know as Tighe came up and got between McKenna and me. He asked me where we were going. I said we were going to see Mr. Walters. He said he would advise us to come first and see the officials of the club. He said 'I assure you we will treat you decently and give you a good dinner, and either find you employment or send you back again.' We said it was not fair for Mr. Walters to import men from Belfast and rob them of their just claims." That is not denied specifically. What Tighe says is this: "I have never watched or beset or picketed any of the works or buildings of the plaintiffs or any of them, neither have I caused anyone else to do so on my behalf; furthermore. I have never been the cause of a crowd assembling at the railway stations or elsewhere or the cause of any disturbances that may have arisen, neither have I been at the railway stations or elsewhere during the dispute save and except to obtain or communicate information." That may be in accordance with what took place as stated by Hayes. But it seems to me that that is not attending merely for the purpose of communicating information, but attending for the purpose of persuading or inducing men to abstain from working for the plaintiffs and other members of the masters' association. The next case is that of Emerson. It is clear again here that there are several such acts. According to the affidavit of G. B. Thain in paragraphs 11 and 12 he says this: "On the 30th of May I, with Clubley and Johnston, met a batch of nine men coming from Belfast by the 11.30 train. There were then in the station over a hundred strike men, including Tighe and Emerson and a man called Noble, another of the labourers' union, who were leading them. When the Belfast men got out of the train they were surrounded by the strikers. I have read the affidavit by W. R. Johnston sworn herein on the 27th of June, 1899, and I corroborate his recollection of the circumstances attending the arrival of these men. During the confusion I got my hand injured by trying to retain a tool-bag belonging to one of the joiners who had come after the other nine men had been got into a waggonette by the strike men. On the following day I met the defendant Tighe, and in conversation he apologized for the rough and disorderly behaviour of his men in the station the previous day. None of the Belfast men were retained by us on this occasion." Johnston, in paragraph 3 of his affidavit says, "Ten men arrived, including joiners and plasterers. I took hold of one of the joiner's arms and went with him along the platform in company with Thain and Clubley who went along with the other men. There was a large collection of men who had come into the station in company with Emerson and Tighe, and considerable excitement and bustle took place along the station; we trying to get the men away and they trying to take the men away from us." Then Walters, in an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, says in paragraph 10: "On Wednesday morning, the 14th of June last, about 11 o'clock, I was at the Paragon Railway Station in Hull to meet seven men who were coming from Belfast sent by Mr. Forster. When in the station I saw several of the strike men watching, including the defendant Devine, to whom I said 'Good morning.' I then saw a lot of other men were coming on to the platform and I at once went to the station master and got him to send a railway policeman, who cleared these men off the platform and ordered them out of the station. As soon as Devine got out of the station he ran off as hard as he could in the direction of the men's club room, and in about a quarter of an hour some fifty or sixty men more arrived. I left the railway station and drove on to the Monument Bridge, where I found a police sergeant, who went for me to the central Police Station and took several policemen to the railway station, as I fully expected there would be a disturbance. I then went into the town. I returned to the station later on in order to catch a train for Leeds, and then found that the seven men had arrived and had been got away by my manager, Mr. Thain, and my clerk, Mr. Clubley. When at the platform barrier I met defendants Tighe and Emerson. They shook hands, and we walked on to the platform together. I said, 'This is like the meeting of Wellington and Blucher.' Emerson said, 'We got three of the men just landed, and we intend to have the lot. We've been talking them in the cab; we shall get from you all the men you've got before we've finished.' I said, 'I don't think you will,' to which Emerson replied, 'I am sure we shall.' Emerson also said, 'It is costing you some hundreds of pounds getting these men here, and you cannot stand that very long,' to which I replied, 'It is not costing me anything. I am acting as agent for the Yorkshire Federation in this business.' The seven men were eventually got away by these men."

I cannot act on any such view, for trades unions are legal bodies, and primâ facie their officers cannot be presumed to have authority to do or sanction anything other than what trades unions may lawfully do. There was one piece of evidence which was sought to be pressed against them, particularly the acts of the defendant Tighe. He is what is called "a walking delegate" of the Hull Builders' Association. He says in his affidavit, "What I do on behalf of my society is upon instructions received." Another defendant, Flannagan, the secretary, appears by the same solicitor. He has made no affidavit denying the truth of Tighe's statement. Tighe's affidavit was filed on behalf of the defendants generally. It is stated that Flannagan ought to be bound by Tighe's statement, and that he is a party to Tighe's illegal acts and sanctioned them. That seems too far to go from the fact that they appear by the same solicitor in this particular action. Another point relied on was that large numbers assembled at the railway station whenever the imported workmen arrived. It is put very forcibly in the affidavit of Bray, who says in paragraph 4: "I say that the importation of the non-union men to the city by the master builders' association has been matter of common notoriety ever since the arrival of the first batch of men in the early part of May last, and I say that the proceedings which have been taken on the part of the men on strike to meet these non-union men coming into the city and to induce and intimidate them from carrying out the engagements into which they have entered with the master builders in Hull prior to their arrival have been organized, and could only have been carried out by and through official action on the part of the several men's unions, of which the defendants are respectively officials." That would have been denied by all the defendants. Tighe, in his affidavit in reply, says: "The union men get to know about all these matters long before the officials do, and if the men, as alleged, did try to persuade the non-union men from working for their respective masters, I say that it was without the knowledge or consent of the officials of the union of which I am a member." It is said that that ought not to be believed. I confess I cannot come to that conclusion. It seems to me perfectly possible that it may have been as stated by Bray, and that it will so turn out when the cross-examination gives more investigation. Now I do not see my way to do that. The only defendants, therefore, against whom there is a case are Tighe and Emerson. I propose to grant an injunction against them similar to that which was granted in Charnock v. Court, 47 W. R. 634, [1899] 2 Ch. 35.* The costs to be costs in the action. I think I am entitled to grant an injunction because if at the trial it is found that Tighe and Emerson are the only persons who combined together, I can say that according to the authorities I am entitled to give judgment against them. As to the other defendants, that must depend on what takes place at the trial.

* Reported in 47 W. R. 634; the terms of the injunction there granted were "to restrain the defendants or their agents or person authorized by them from watching or besetting the landing-stage at Fleetwood, or any other place to which any person or persons employed or about to be employed by the plaintiffs or any of them may be brought."

Although a voluntary gift by a client to his solicitor or to a member of the solicitor's family while the confidential relation exists cannot be supported unless the client had competent and independent advice, the rule ought not to be applied in favour of a plaintiff who denies the relationship, and against a defendant who, except as a friend of the family, has only seen the plaintiff on a few occasions in company with persons who admittedly were his clients.

Action.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Annie Butler Barron, wife of William Barron, and formerly wife of Joseph Willis, sought to rectify or set aside a deed executed in 1891, to which she was a party, and also to obtain a declaration that the defendant Frederick Herbert Skinner could not take any benefit under the said deed, inasmuch as his father, the defendant William Moore Skinner, had acted as her solicitor in the preparation of the deed.

In October, 1889, the plaintiff was married to Joseph Willis. He was the only son of Thomas Willis, who died in April, 1890, and of Ann Willis, who was appointed by Thomas Willis his sole executrix and sole residuary legatee.

On the 29th of December, 1890, a deed was executed which was made between Ann Willis of the first part, Joseph Willis of the second part, the plaintiff (then his wife) of the third part, and the defendants Nicholas Willis, Isaac Dunn, and William Moore Skinner of the fourth part. It recited that the property of Thomas Willis consisted of the particulars mentioned in the first three schedules, and that the property mentioned in the fourth schedule belonged to Joseph Willis. It further recited that Ann Willis believed that it was her late husband's intention to revoke or partially revoke his will, and to dispose of his property in favour of his widow and son, and, with a view to carrying out in some measure the wishes of the testator, and also with the object of making provision for Joseph Willis and his wife and any future wife and the lawful issue of Joseph Willis, it had been agreed between Ann Willis and Joseph Willis by way of family arrangement that the properties mentioned in the schedules should be settled in manner thereinafter expressed. The trusts were during the joint lives of Ann Willis and Joseph Willis to pay him £100 a year, subject thereto to pay the income to Ann Willis during her life, and subject thereto there was a protected life interest given to Joseph Willis, and after his death the trust was for the widow of Joseph Willis during her life, with subsequent trusts in favour of the children or issue of Joseph Willis, and in default of issue a general power of appointment by deed was given to Joseph Willis and the plaintiff jointly, and subject thereto a general power of appointment by deed was given to the survivor, and subject thereto the property was settled in trust as to one half for Nicholas Willis and as to the other half for Frederick Herbert Skinner, son of the defendant William Moore Skinner, absolutely. Nicholas Willis was a cousin of Joseph Willis, and Frederick Herbert Skinner was a great friend of Joseph Willis, and was then under twenty-one years of age.

In the year 1891 differences arose between Joseph Willis and his wife mainly, if not entirely, by reason of the intemperate habits into which he had fallen. On the 3rd of October, 1891, a deed was executed by Joseph Willis, the plaintiff (his wife), and Ann Willis, which recited that the deed of 1890 did not in all respects carry out the wishes of the parties to the family arrangement, and that it had been agreed that for the purpose of varying the trusts of the same deed and of fully carrying out the intention of the parties, these presents should be executed, the said Ann Willis concurring therein to show her assent to the same; and the deed provided, first, that the provision for the widow of the said Joseph Willis during her life should be read and construed as a provision for the benefit of such widow so long only as she should remain the widow of the said Joseph Willis, and that the words "after the decease of the survivor" should be read and construed as "after the decease of the survivor or the marriage of the widow"; and by the same deed Joseph Willis and the plaintiff, in exercise of the joint power of appointment vested in them in case of failure of issue, appointed that the trust funds should be held in trust for such person and in such manner as Joseph Willis alone should by deed appoint, and in default of appointment, and so far as no such appointment should extend, then (excluding the power of appointment by a widow of the said Joseph Willis) upon the trusts declared by the principal deed of 1890. Joseph Willis died intestate and without issue in September, 1893.

By a deed dated the 2nd of August, 1894, between the plaintiff of the first part, Ann Willis of the second part, Frederick Herbert Skinner of the third part, and Nicholas Willis, Isaac Dunn, and William Moore Skinner of the fourth part, after reciting accurately the effect of the deeds of 1890 and 1891, and that it had been agreed by way of family arrangement that such further modification of the trusts as was thereinafter contained should be executed, it was witnessed, and it was thereby agreed and declared, and particularly the said Ann Willis, Nicholas Willis, and Frederick Herbert Skinner thereby agreed, declared, and directed that the direction contained in the settlement for payment or application of the income of the trust funds to or for the benefit of the widow of the said Joseph Willis during her life should have full force and effect, and that such income should be paid to the plaintiff during her life in the same manner as if clause 1 of the modification deed of 1891 had not been inserted therein, and in all other respects the deeds of 1890 and 1891 should be and were thereby confirmed.

All the three deeds of 1890, 1891, and 1894 were prepared by William Moore Skinner as solicitor, with the assistance of counsel.

Mrs. Ann Willis died in April, 1897. In November, 1897, the plaintiff married again, and on the 22nd of February, 1898, the above action was commenced. William Moore Skinner purchased the reversionary interest of his son in one moiety, but with full notice of all circumstances which were said to render the deed of 1891 invalid, and his lordship pointed out that he could not be in any better position than his son.

Hughes, Q.C., and Ashton Cross, for the plaintiff.

Eve, Q.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the defendants W. M. Skinner and F. Skinner.—The plaintiff has failed to show that W. M. Skinner stood in a fiduciary relation to her in regard to the deed of 1891, but on the assumption that there was a fiduciary relation he has fully discharged himself of the burden so cast upon him. As to the benefit that came to F. Skinner by the extinction of the plaintiff's power of appointment, she did not execute the deed of 1891 animo donandi as regarded F. Skinner, and cannot rely on this accidental result of an act done alio animo. Cases where the object of the transaction was to benefit the solicitor or a member of his family are not analagous, and do not govern this case.

Astbury, Q.C., and Stokes, for the defendant Willis.—The only gift under the deed of 1891, regard being had to the state of circumstances at the time it was executed, was to the plaintiff's husband, Joseph Willis. The property was thereby appointed in trust for such persons as Joseph should by deed appoint, and that is in substance a gift to Joseph. The time to be regarded is the time when the deed was entered into, and the non-exercise by Joseph of the power thereby given to him is immaterial. He did not as husband stand in a fiduciary relation to the plaintiff, and the onus probanbi is on her (Nedby v. Nedby, 5 De G. & Sm. 377), and she cannot sustain it. In the events which happened the ultimate trusts under the deed of 1890 took effect, and that deed is not challenged by the plaintiff.

F. A. Milne, for the defendant Dunn.

Hughes, in reply.—The plaintiff had no independent advice in the transactions resulting in the deed of 1891, and such advice was essential to its validity as against her. The court will not allow persons standing in a fiduciary relation to another to keep benefits from that other acting without independent advice: see Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273, 1 W. & T. Lead. Cas. (7th ed.), p. 247, and notes; Bridgeman v. Green, 2 Ves. sen. 627, Wilm. 58. [Astbury referred to the observations of Lord Brougham in Hunter v. Atkins, 3 My. & K. 113, at p. 135.] In particular a solicitor cannot take a gift for himself or a member of his family from a client without independent advice: Goddard v. Carlisle, 9 Price 169; Liles v. Terry, 44 W. R. 116, [1895] 2 Q. B. 679. [He also cited Rhodes v. Bate, 14 W. R. 292, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 252; Morgan v. Minett, 25 W. R. 744, 6 Ch. D. 638; Moxon v. Payne, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 881, 22 W. R. App. 15.] As to the relation of husband and wife, Milnes v. Busk, 2 Ves. jun. 488, p. 498, points to a fiduciary relation, notwithstanding the expressions of Lord Hardwicke in Grigsby v. Cox, 1 Ves. sen. 517. [COZENS-HARDY, J., referred to Pybus v. Smith, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 340.]

COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the above facts, proceeded: The plaintiff, by her counsel, alleges that Mr. W. M. Skinner was her solicitor in reference to the deeds of 1891 and 1894, or at least that he was acting as her solicitor and confidential adviser at the time when those deeds were executed; that he did not in fact explain to her that by the deed of 1891 she was voluntarily parting with a portion of her life interest and the general power of appointment which, in the events which have happened, she, as the survivor, would have been entitled to exercise under the deed of 1890, and that it was Mr. Skinner's bounden duty to send her to another solicitor by whom she might be advised as to the propriety of the transaction; and that under the circumstances the deed of 1891, except so far as rectified by the deed of 1894, cannot stand, for Mr. Skinner's son benefited by the release of the general power of appointment inasmuch as his reversionary interest was thereby rendered less liable to failure. The plaintiff was examined and cross-examined before me, and I am bound to say that I do not feel able to rely upon her testimony where she is directly contradicted by other witnesses. I do not propose to go in detail through the evidence, but the conclusions at which I have arrived upon the disputed facts are as follows: In the first place, I think that Joseph Willis and his mother, Ann Willis, were both desirous that the property which came from them should not go to "a strange man," by which, of course, was meant a second husband of the plaintiff, or to any member of her family, and this desire was made known to the plaintiff. She did not deem this desire unreasonable or improper, and she consented to give effect to it. Joseph Willis and his mother thought that the deed of 1890 did not, in respect to those matters, give effect to their real intentions, though such intentions had not been communicated to Mr. Skinner. He was angry at the suggestion that there was any mistake on his part, and unwilling that the deed should be modified. In the second place, I think the deed of 1891 was in substance a transaction between the plaintiff and her husband. In the third place, I think the nature and effect of the deed of 1891 were explained to the plaintiff on the 30th of September, 1891, and again on the 3rd of October, when it was executed by her and her husband, and that on that occasion Mr. Skinner suggested that both of them should go to some other solicitor. In the fourth place, I think the deed of 1894 was most carefully explained to the plaintiff prior to its execution, and I believe that she understood its effect, although she has now brought herself to believe that it was never explained to her and that she never understood it. In the fifth place, I think that Mr. Skinner did act as the plaintiff's solicitor in the matter of the 1894 deed, which is not complained of, but that he did not act for her in the matter of the 1891 deed. Whether at that time the relation of solicitor and client existed between the plaintiff and Mr. Skinner is a matter of more doubt, which I propose hereafter to deal with. In the sixth place, I think that no case has been made for setting aside or rectifying the deed of 1891, unless it can be impeached on the ground of some fiduciary relation.

It remains to consider the consequences which follow from these facts. Now, it has been long settled that a voluntary gift by a client to his solicitor or to a member of the solicitor's family, while the confidential relation exists, cannot be supported unless the client had competent and independent advice, and that it is not enough to show that the client understood what he was doing: see Goddard v. Carlisle and Liles v. Terry. If, therefore, the deed of 1890 had been challenged, I think the settlors might have set it aside, so far as the interest of Mr. Skinner's son is concerned, if not entirely. But no such case is made by the plaintiff. She claims under and relies upon the deed of 1890. It is also settled by authority, which binds me, although text writers seem to have adopted the opposite view, that the relation of husband and wife is not one of those to which the doctrine of Huguenin v. Baseley applies. In other words, there is no presumption that a voluntary deed executed by a wife in favour of her husband, and prepared by the husband's solicitor, is invalid. The onus probandi lies on the party who impugns the instrument and not on the party who supports it. This was clearly decided by Sir James Parker in 1852 in Nedby v. Nedby, and it accords with what Lord Hardwicke said in Grigsby v. Cox. It is, moreover, consistent with the authorities which have recognized the validity of mortgages by a wife to secure her husband's debts, although a similar mortgage by a son just after attaining majority to secure his father's debts would not be upheld: see Hudson v. Carmichael, 2 W. R. 503, Kay 613; Paget v. Paget, 46 W. R. 472, [1898] 1 Ch. 470; Baker v. Bradley, 4 W. R. 78, 7 De G. M. & G. 597; and Bainbrigge v. Browne, 29 W. R. 782, 18 Ch. D. 188. I think, therefore, that the deed of 1891, in so far as it is a transaction between the plaintiff and her husband, Joseph Willis, is a good deed. It was strongly urged by Mr. Hughes in his very able argument that, even assuming the law to be so, it does not operate further than to validate that part of the deed of 1891 which gave to Joseph Willis an overriding general power of appointment for his own benefit. But upon consideration, I do not think this distinction ought to prevail. The release of the general power of appointment which the plaintiff, if she survived her husband, would have had under the deed of 1890 was essential to give effect to his known desire. To reduce her life interest to an interest during widowhood and to leave her a power which she might exercise so as to enlarge this interest would have been absurd. The continuance of her general power of appointment was inconsistent with the idea that no strange man and none of her family should take the property. It was not intended that these people should be cut out if, and only if, the husband chose to exercise his new overriding power of appointment. I think the true arrangement made between the plaintiff and her husband in 1891 was carried into effect by means of an exercise of the joint power of appointment. A new general power of appointment was given to the husband alone, and the other general powers contained in the deed of 1890 were destroyed. This deed was prepared by Mr. Skinner as the husband's solicitor. It cannot be impeached except on the ground of Mr. Skinner's relation towards the plaintiff. In the view which I take this is not material, the transaction being one between the plaintiff and her husband, and not between the plaintiff and Mr. Skinner or Mr. Skinner's son. But I think it right to add this—I am not satisfied that, until long after the execution of the deed of 1891, Mr. Skinner ever was or acted as the plaintiff's solicitor. It is not unimportant to observe that he never made any charge against her, and, although solicitors may act gratuitously, it is not usual for them to do so. The plaintiff herself more than once said in the box that she did not employ Mr. Skinner as her solicitor, but I prefer not to rely solely upon her testimony on this or on any other point. I have seen Mr. Skinner, who gave his evidence very fairly. There are five occasions on which it is said that he acted as the plaintiff's solicitor: (1) On the 12th of September, 1890, she came with her husband, and there is an entry in his diary, "Attending Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Willis, discussing and advising." Considering that the plaintiff had nothing to settle, and that Joseph Willis was his client, I attach no importance to this. (2) On the 16th of October, 1890, the plaintiff and her husband had a long conversation at Mr. Skinner's house, but to this also I attach no importance. (3) In the spring of 1891 the plaintiff called upon Mr. Skinner and complained of her husband's conduct, and said she thought she should be compelled to separate, and asked what would be her position under the 1890 deed in that event. He told her it would be for the trustees to apply the income as they might think fit. I do not regard this as a business interview. It was a question asked by the plaintiff of one who was an intimate friend and also a trustee under the deed. (4) On the 9th of September, 1891, the plaintiff came with her mother-in-law, Mrs. Ann Willis, and the entry in Mr. Skinner's diary is, "Mrs. Ann Willis and Mrs. Joseph Willis. Conference as to the unhappy differences between Mr. Joseph Willis and his wife." This was a matter in which Mrs. Ann Willis took a deep interest. She was Mr. Skinner's client. (5) On the 12th of September, 1891, the plaintiff went with her husband to Mr. Skinner's office. I am not prepared to say that any or all of these attendances created or evidenced that fiduciary relation of solicitor and client between Mr. Skinner and the plaintiff to which such special disabilities are attached. The rule of law expressed in Liles v. Terry ought not to be applied in favour of a plaintiff who denies the relationship, and against a defendant who, except as a friend of the family, has only seen the plaintiff on a few occasions in company with persons who admittedly were his clients. If Mr. Skinner was not the plaintiff's solicitor, I think no relief can be claimed on the ground of his being a trustee of the deed of 1890. The result is that, in my judgment, the action fails, whether Mr. Skinner was or was not the plaintiff's solicitor. The plaintiff must pay the costs of the defendants.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Saffron Walden.

Prior and up to the date of the conviction hereinafter mentioned one Walter Peachey, then of the Royal Oak beerhouse, was the holder of a licence to sell beer to be consumed on and off the said premises, with respect to which premises such a licence had been in force continuously from a date anterior to 1869, until the forfeiture hereinafter mentioned.

On the 18th of February, 1899, Peachey was for the second time convicted of selling spirits without a licence, and thereupon by the operation of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, he forfeited his right to sell beer.

At a petty sessions (being a court of summary jurisdiction) held for the borough on the 25th of February, 1899, application was made on behalf of Messrs. Flinn & Sons, the owners of the Royal Oak beerhouse, for authority under section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874, to carry on until the next special sessions for licensing purposes the business of beersellers, being the same business as had previously to his convictions been carried on by Peachey at the Royal Oak beerhouse, but the justices finding as a fact that prior to such application being made Peachey had been convicted for the second time of the offence of selling spirits without a spirit licence, held that they had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the application under the section, inasmuch as the opening words of that section limit the right to make such applications to cases where a person is convicted for the first time, and that any application for a licence for the premises could only be entertained at the general annual licensing meeting for the borough.

However, upon a case stated for the opinion of the High Court, the court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) decided on the 8th of June, 1899, that the justices had jurisdiction and remitted the matter to them to hear and determine the application (see Ex parte Flinn & Sons, 47 W. R. 697, [1899] 2 Q. B. 154). Accordingly on the 17th of June, 1899, the same was heard by the justices upon the merits. The applicants appeared by counsel who contended that as the retail beer licence was in force on the 1st of May, 1869, the discretion of the justices was restricted to the four grounds specified in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, notwithstanding the forfeiture, and further that for the purposes of section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874, the licence was not dead.

The justices held, on the authority of Reg. v. Justices of Hertfordshire, 7 Q. B. D. 542, 50 L. J. M. C. 121, 29 W. R. Dig. 119; and Freer v. Murray, [1894] A. C. 576, that in order to bring the case within section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, the licence must not only have been in force on the 1st of May, 1869, but also continuously in force down to and at the date of the application, and that as the licence had by the forfeiture ceased to exist prior to the application their discretion was not limited to the four grounds, and after hearing evidence tendered as well on behalf of the applicants as of the police, who strongly opposed the application, they refused the application.

Flynn & Sons appealed from this decision.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether or not on the facts as stated, the justices were entitled to exercise their discretion at large as to granting the application or not, or whether they had power to refuse it only on one of the four grounds mentioned in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869.

Section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), provides: "Where any licensed person is convicted for the first time of any one of the following offences . . . and in consequence either becomes personally disqualified or has his licence forfeited, there may be made by or on behalf of the owner of the premises an application to a court of summary jurisdiction for authority to carry on the same business on the same premises until the next special sessions for licensing purposes, and a further application to such next special sessions for the grant of a licence in respect of such premises, and for this purpose the provisions contained in the Intoxicating Liquor Licensing Act, 1828, with respect to the grant of a temporary authority and to the grant of licences at special sessions shall apply as if the person convicted had been rendered incapable of keeping an inn, and the person applying for such grant was his assignee."

Section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27) provides: "All the provisions of the said Act"—that is, of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61)—"as to the terms upon which, and the manner in which, and the persons by whom, grants of licences are to be made by the justices at the said general annual licensing meeting . . . shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act, subject to this qualification, that no application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine not to be consumed on the premises shall be refused, except upon one or more of the following grounds . . ."

Section 19 provides: "Where on the 1st of May, 1869, a licence under any of the said recited Acts is in force with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine to be consumed on the premisss in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine not to be consumed on the premises may be refused in accordance with this Act."

Foote, Q.C. (H. O. S. Ellis with him), for the appellants.—The justices were wrong in holding that they had a general discretion to refuse the application. At the very most they were entitled to refuse it on the four grounds set out in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act of 1869. The court was merely a court of summary jurisdiction, and yet, although they were only a petty sessions court, they claimed to have as great or greater discretion than a court constituted for licensing purposes. They were under the opinion that the licence was dead, and that therefore the application was one for a new licence, and that they consequently had an absolute discretion in the matter. That was an erroneous view of section 15, because it says that if the licence is forfeited by conviction of the licensee the owner may apply. The licence in this case is a beerhouse licence, which has existed prior to and continuously since 1869, and, therefore, by section 19 of the Act of 1869, the renewal of the licence could only be refused on the four grounds of refusal specified in section 8. That is the first step, that the renewal could only have been refused on one of the four grounds. The next step is that the same principle applies to transfers of the licence: Simonds v. Justices of Blackheath, 35 W. R. 167, 17 Q. B. D. 765). It was there held that the transfers of these old beerhouse licences could only be refused on the four grounds, as in the case of renewals. And further, the same principle applies to these applications under section 15, though the rules as to transfers are not expressly made applicable. The section contemplates that though the licence is forfeited it is kept alive for the purpose of this application by the owner. The cases relied on by the justices are distinguishable, as in Reg. v. Justices of Hertfordshire the application was to a licensing court, and in Freer v. Murray the licence was dead at the time of the application, which was an application by a new tenant, and not, as here, an application by the owner under section 15. Here the licence was not dead, but was only forfeited. The justices here were not entitled to exercise any discretion at all, but were bound to grant this application as a matter of right. That may not be clear upon the wording of the section, and it is not necessary to argue it here, as our contention is that at the very utmost the justices could not go outside the four grounds of refusal; but they did so, and refused the application upon a ground which was not one of the four grounds. They had no evidence before them on which they could properly refuse, and the application ought to have been granted.

No respondents appeared.

DARLING, J.—In this case an application has been made by the owners of this beerhouse to a court of summary jurisdiction for authority to carry on the business, the right to carry on which has been forfeited by the holder of the licence immediately before that time. The justices were of opinion that, upon that application being made, their jurisdiction was not limited to the four grounds set out in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869; and they heard evidence, and upon that evidence, and not upon any of the four grounds, they refused the application of the owners of the house for an authority to carry on the business. I think they were wrong in so holding. With regard to the point which Mr. Foote raised, but did not expressly argue, as to whether this transfer to the owners is a matter of right or not, however the case may be as to that, I do not think it is necessary to express any opinion upon it; but I think in doing what the justices did, they were wrong, and that their business was at the most to ascertain whether this licence was forfeited or ought not to be granted upon one of those four grounds in section 8 of the Act of 1869. They did not affect to do that, or to find out whether the licence was in any way forfeited or ought to be forfeited upon one of those four grounds. They assumed that they had an absolute discretion to hear evidence as if they were at special licensing sessions. In that it seems to me they were wrong, and I think that, therefore, their decision must be reversed.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unfortunate that this case must be argued on one side only, but the justices have stated clearly the grounds on which they acted, and I think they have enabled us to see both their reasons for so acting and the authorities by which they thought they were bound. The licensee had forfeited his licence by reason of two convictions for selling spirits, whereas he was only the licensee of a beerhouse. Thereupon the justices were applied to, to substitute the owners of the beerhouse in his stead until the next special licensing sessions. The justices thought in the first instance that by reason of the very difficult language of the statute they were precluded from admitting the owners on the ground that they had come too late. That error was corrected by my brothers Day and Lawrance in the case of Ex parte Flinn & Sons, 47 W. R. 697, [1899] 2 Q. B. 154. Thereupon the matter went back to the justices to see whether it was a case in which they ought to grant the authority to the owners under section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1874, which would be a temporary authority to carry on the business. The justices were then of opinion that the licence was gone, and that this application was a new application, and that consequently their discretion was unfettered. They thought that they had a right to receive evidence as to the desirability or otherwise of the house, and that they were not limited to the four grounds which are generally applied in applications to keep alive a beerhouse licence. No doubt it is said the licence is forfeited. The licence would be forfeited but for the act of the owner in making the application. It is forfeited as regards the original licensee, but it remains capable of being kept alive if in due and very speedy course the owner makes an application to have it kept alive for the purpose of its being transferred to him. That, I think, is a reasonable construction of the section. Therefore the justices are bound to treat the application in substance as if it were an application for a transfer. Then if it is an application for a transfer, Simonds v. Justices of Blackheath decides that the justices are limited to the four grounds, the object being to protect the vested rights in the beerhouse. Then Reg. v. Justices of Hertfordshire decides that they may use the four grounds, at any rate on an application at special sessions. Therefore the matter is reduced to a very small compass. They are limited to the four grounds on a transfer; they may use the four grounds on a transfer; therefore they are, at any rate at special sessions, limited to, and may use, the four grounds. Mr. Foote stated that on an application for a temporary authority they cannot use the four grounds. I do not want in these licensing cases to decide anything outside the strict matter we have to decide; but my own strong opinion at the present time is that they can use the four grounds as an objection at this stage. That the four grounds can be used on an application at a special licensing sessions seems not to be disputed. I think they can also be used on the application for the temporary authority. In this case application was made for a temporary authority, and the four grounds, or any of them, if they exist, must be raised by objection and proved. Nobody has objected on any of these four grounds, and, at any rate, nobody has proved any one of the four grounds. Therefore the justices had nothing before them on which they could enforce the four grounds, and they should have granted the application.

Q. B. Div.
(Darling and Channell, JJ.) May 1, 1899.

GREEN (Appellant) v. THOMPSON (Respondent). (a.)

Master and servant—Apprentice—Infant—Stipulation in apprenticeship deed not for benefit of infant—Validity—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 6.

An apprenticeship deed contained a stipulation that the master should not be liable to instruct the apprentice or to pay her wages at times when the business of the master should be at a standstill through accident beyond the control of the master.

Held, that this stipulation did not render the contract as a whole unfair as against the infant, and that the apprenticeship deed was not invalid.

Case stated by justices of Derbyshire.

The appellant was a manufacturer of earthenware, carrying on business at Gresley; the respondent was an infant, who had been apprenticed to the appellant to learn a branch of a potter's business called decorating. The appellant summoned the respondent to answer a complaint under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, claiming an order for the respondent to perform her duties under the deed of apprenticeship.

By the deed of apprenticeship, to which the respondent, her mother, and the appellant were parties, the respondent bound herself apprentice to the appellant to learn the above-mentioned business "from the 6th of April, 1896, for the term of five years (excepting the usual holidays and days on which the said branch of the business of the master shall be at a standstill through accident beyond control of the master)." The appellant covenanted that he would during the term, except as aforesaid, cause the respondent to be instructed in the business and pay her wages as provided by the deed. The respondent and her mother covenanted that during the term, except as aforesaid, the respondent would honestly and faithfully serve the appellant.

It was proved that the respondent worked as an apprentice under the deed from its date until the 8th of October, 1898. On that day she absented herself from work, and remained absent thereafter. It was admitted by the appellant that, having regard to the words of the exception in the deed, if the works were stopped, not only by accident, but by strike, the respondent would not be paid wages or be taught during the time of such stoppage.

An objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that the apprentice deed was invalid for want of mutuality, and for containing a provision disadvantageous to the respondent, she being an infant, on the ground that it was unfair and inequitable to her that the appellant should not be liable or called upon to pay any wages to the respondent, or to teach her or to find her work so long as his business should be interrupted or be at a standstill through accident under peculiar circumstances which were wholly independent of any act of the respondent. It was contended that such circumstances might be of uncertain duration, and might extend over a lengthy period, and that the respondent was precluded during any such period from undertaking any employment and could earn nothing towards her maintenance, and was prevented from continuing to learn her own or any other trade. Meakin v. Morris, 32 W. R. 661, 12 Q. B. D. 352, and Corn v. Matthews, 41 W. R. 262, [1893] 1 Q. B. 310, were cited in support of the objection.

The justices upheld the objection, being of opinion that the deed was invalid for want of mutuality, and that the case came within the above-mentioned decisions, and they dismissed the complaint.

Hextall, for the appellant.

Dwyer, for the respondent.

In addition to the above-mentioned cases the following were referred to in the course of the arguments: Reg. v. Lord, 12 Q. B. 757; Leslie v. Fitzpatrick, 3 Q. B. D. 229, 26 W. R. Dig. 139; De Francesco v. Barnum, 39 W. R. 5, 45 Ch. D. 430; Fellowes v. Wood, 59 L. T. Rep. 513; Flower v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 42 W. R. 519, [1894] 2 Q. B. 65.

DARLING, J.—In this case the appeal must be allowed. Under this deed of apprenticeship the apprentice obtained the advantage of learning a trade, and during the time when she was so learning she was to be paid wages, but the payment of wages was not to be made when the business of the master was at a standstill through accident beyond his control. It is said that that provision makes the indenture void, because it contains terms disadvantageous to the infant. The magistrates have held that the deed is void on the ground of want of mutuality, but I think they meant by that that it was disadvantageous to the infant.

If Lord Coleridge, C.J., by his judgment in Meakin v. Morris really meant to hold that a contract with an infant is bad unless every single term contained in it is to the manifest advantage of the infant, I think that that is a wrong decision, and one not in accordance with the other cases. A deed of apprenticeship must necessarily contain some clauses which, standing by themselves, would be disadvantageous to the infant. The rule was laid down by A. L. Smith, L.J., in Corn v. Matthews as follows: "It seems to me that the law as regards these contracts by infants has been laid down to this effect, that if there be a stipulation in the contract entered into by an infant so to the detriment of the infant as to render it unfair that the infant should be bound by it, then the deed cannot be enforced at all. It seems to me that the authorities are all in conformity with that view, with possibly the exception of Leslie v. Fitzpatrick."

Now, is there any stipulation in this deed which can be said to be so so much to the detriment of the infant as to make it unfair that the infant should be bound by the deed? I cannot see how it can be said that the proviso that the infant was not to be taught or paid wages on days when the business was at a standstill through accident beyond the master's control makes the whole indenture one of detriment to the infant. Obviously, the whole of the contract must be looked at, and that is what Lindley, L.J., did in construing the deed in Corn v. Matthews where he said: "I attach great importance myself to the fact that a turn-out includes a lock-out. If the proviso were addressed to a state of things over which the master might have no control, such as a strike, I think the case would not be quite so clear, but in this case the master has it in his own power to call in aid that proviso to the detriment of the apprentice, and if for any reason the master locks out his men the apprentice can no longer earn wages. That strikes me, I confess, as a very serious matter in considering or construing the effect of a deed of this description."

I do not think that it can be said that this deed is solely in favour of the master, or that it is so disadvantageous to the infant as to make it unfair that she should be bound by it, and in my opinion, therefore, the decision of the magistrates was wrong and the appeal must be allowed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The cases make it quite clear that the question to be considered is whether the entire contract is to the disadvantage of the infant. One clause may make the contract less advantageous, but that does not necessarily make the whole contract disadvantageous. The present case is the case contemplated by Lindley, L.J., in Corn v. Matthews, and which he thought was not quite so clear as the case then before him. It seems to me that it is a reasonable thing to provide in the deed of apprenticeship that the apprentice is not to be taught when the works are at a standstill through no fault of the master. Then the deed goes on to provide that at such times the apprentice should not be paid wages. It would, no doubt, be more advantageous to the infant to receive wages, but I cannot say that the presence of that clause makes the contract, looked at as a whole, one to the detriment of the infant. The advantage to the infant under the contract is the obtaining of employment and instruction.

Inland revenue—Probate duty—Testator resident and domiciled abroad—Taking possession and administering the estate—Executor de son tort—55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 37—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 40.

The foreign executors of a testator who died domiciled abroad, and was the registered owner of shares and debentures in an English company, requested the company to transfer these shares and debentures into their names. The company were aware that the executors did not intend to take out probate in this country, but the transfer was made.

Held, that the company had taken possession and administered the estate of the deceased in this country, and constituted itself an executor de son tort, and become liable to probate duty and the statutory penalties.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (46 W. R. 193, [1898] 1 Q. B. 205) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.), reported 46 W. R. 193, [1898] 1 Q. B. 205.

The information is set out in the report in the Queen's Bench Division, 45 W. R. 606. Shortly the facts were these:

The appellants were an English company limited by shares incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, having their registered office in London, where the share and debenture registers were kept. The company's business of brewers was, however, carried on in America.

Henry Clausen, who died in 1893, was a duly registered share and debenture-holder in the company at the time of his death; he was an American citizen, resident and domiciled in the State of New York, and left a will whereby he appointed two persons, both of New York, his executors, to whom letters testamentary of his estate were granted by the court in New York.

The American executors requested the appellant company in England to pay to them the interest and dividends due, and also to transfer into their names the shares and debentures standing in the name of the deceased. The executors, to the knowledge of the appellant company, had not obtained and did not intend to obtain probate of the will in this country. The appellant company, however, paid over to the foreign executors the interest and dividends due, and also transferred into their names in the registers in this country one preference and one ordinary share and one debenture.

It was held by the Divisional Court that the appellant company had not taken possession and administered the deceased's estate so as to constitute itself executor de son tort and render itself liable under 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 37: "If any person shall take possession of and in any manner administer any part of the personal estate and effects of any person deceased, without obtaining probate of the will or letters of administration of the estate and effects of the deceased within six calendar months after his or her decease, . . . every person so offending shall forfeit the sum of £100," and also a further sum at the rate of 10 per cent. on the amount of the stamp duty payable on the probate or letters of administration. 44 Vict. c. 12, s. 40: "If any person who ought to obtain probate or letters of administration, . . . or who is required to deliver such account as aforesaid, shall neglect to do so within the period prescribed by law for the purpose, he shall be liable to pay to her Majesty double the amount of duty chargeable. . . ."

The Court of Appeal, however, reversing this judgment, held that the appellant company had intermeddled with the estate and rendered itself liable to the payment of probate duty.

Moulton, Q.C., and Asquith, Q.C. (A. M. Bremner and Gore Browne with them), for the appellants.—The Stamp Act, 1815, imposes a penalty, but both taking possession and administration are requisite, and the appellants did neither. The Act refers here to actual administration and actual possession. Taking possession has a perfectly definite meaning. No company takes possession of its own shares by registering a transfer. [Lord WATSON referred to section 57 of the Crown Suits Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104).] The appellants could not have taken out probate or administration. Fernandes' Executors case, 18 W. R. 411, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 314, is distinguishable. [The LORD CHANCELLOR referred to Padget v. Priest, 2 T. R. 97, in the course of the argument.]

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the respondent.—The appellants took possession and administered. [They referred to Attorney-General v. Hope, 1 C. M. & R. 530; Attorney-General v. Brunning, 7 W. R. 308, 4 H. & N. 94; Attorney-General v. Bouwens, 4 M. & W. 171; Hunt v. Stevens, 3 Taunt. 113; Jones v. Howells, 2 Hare 342; and Hicks v. Keat, 3 Beav. 141.] The appellants are liable to probate duty for the full value of the estate in England.

Asquith, Q.C., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I suggest to your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is perfectly right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

It appears to me that the question lies in a somewhat narrow compass. A good deal appears to have turned, in the course of the argument, upon the peculiar nature of the property to which the act here complained of as an act of administration related. But, apart from that question of the peculiarity of the form of property, let me deal with the case first as if those considerations did not arise. The property —I will explain presently what I mean by the word "property"—is in England and belonged to a person who is now dead. That property could only properly be taken possession of or administered by a person who by law was qualified to deal with it. It is idle to suggest that in the Taxing Acts, where they are dealing with English finance, the words "executor" or "administrator," which terms we use popularly as applicable to a person who fills that character, to whatever country he belongs, are used in any other sense than as meaning an English executor or an English administrator dealing with our own financial system. Undoubtedly the persons who are concerned in this case, having the control and dominion over the property in question, did an act whereby the title to the property belonging to the deceased person became vested in somebody else, and they are not either "executors" or "administrators" in the sense in which those words are used in the Taxing Acts. Primâ facie therefore they are executors de son tort, and primâ facie, as it appears to me, they have taken possession of and administered the property in respect of which this question arises. I do not suppose that if the case had arisen in this way, that it had been something which was capable of a physical handling, and that the company had handed over that thing to persons who claimed to be possessed of it by reason of the will of some one in New York, any doubt could have arisen that they, in so handing over those subjects of property capable of a manual treatment, were executors de son tort and liable probably under each one of those sections which have been brought before us.

Then that brings us to the question whether the point, which I have reserved for consideration, when I use the word "property" makes any difference here. In one sense it is true that you get into a difficulty by treating the word "property" as meaning something necessarily connected with physical possession, and capable therefore of being treated by manual delivery; but if one comes to analyze its meaning, it is manifest that a great many things, such as choses in action, with which we are dealing, are in the ordinary sense of the word, "property," and capable of being treated, not indeed by physical handling, but by documents of title and instruments recognized by the law as transferring the title, the incorporeal right to sue (that is what is strictly comprehended in such phrases)—documents which are capable of being enforced and treated as subjects of property.

The condition of things here is this: Here is an incorporated company, and the deceased person is entitled to his aliquot share of the profits earned by that company. He dies, and, according to the constitution of the company, when a shareholder is dead the only person who is to be recognized as having a right to deal with his share is—I will put in the word which by implication is manifestly there—an English executor or an English administrator. The company, therefore, being now in possession of the share of the profits which belonged to the deceased person, are bound to see that they do not hand it over, or hand over anything that represents it, to any person who is not entitled to deal with it. That is their duty according to their constitution and according to law, because they are in possession of something which is available as assets of the testator's estate, bonâ notabilia, in this country. Then what do they do? They think proper to create a title in a person who has no authority to receive it on behalf of the dead person, even according to the constitution of their own company. I cannot doubt that if we were dealing—that is the reason why I quoted the case of Hiort v. Bott, 22 W. R. 414, L. R. 9 Ex. 86, to Mr. Asquith at the conclusion of his argument—if we were dealing with an action of trover, and you had improperly indorsed the document of title to goods, although you had done it innocently, and thereby enabled one person to obtain property which in truth belonged to another, you would be liable for damages in trover by reason of that erroneous indorsement. It was so held in the case I have mentioned, in the Court of Exchequer, and also in another case in this House (Hollins v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 757, 23 W. R. Dig. 238). That is the state of the law. Well then, suppose this same transaction to have so taken place that innocently the appellants had been induced to do this, notwithstanding the innocence of intention, it might well have been that they would have erroneously and improperly created a title in somebody else, the result—the natural and intentional result—of which was to enable a stranger to take possession of property which did not belong to him but belonged to somebody else; then the question might have arisen whether, even in that event, the company would not have been liable.

But your lordships are not called upon to decide that extreme case, because here it is manifest, from the record before us, that the company have acted with their eyes open—I do not mean to make any reflection upon them, for they appear to have taken a very natural and sensible course in order to have the question of law tried; but in order to have the question tried it is to be assumed against them that they have acted with full knowledge of the facts, and that full knowledge of the facts imported this: that they knew that by the entry in their register which they made, they enabled property to be diverted from one person who, in this country, was by law entitled to it, to another person who had no such title at all.

Under these circumstances, I feel very great difficulty in understanding what is meant by some of the expressions used in the court below. "All I can say," says Wills, J., "is, that it appears to me that the defendants have not really intermeddled with the administration of this estate." In what way could a person, dealing with this particular class of property, otherwise intermeddle with this estate? The appellants have done that which, as I say, has created a new title in somebody else. The peculiar character of the property is such that it does not admit of its being manually and physically handed over; but they have done a legal act, and by virtue of that legal act they have enabled it to be dealt with by somebody else, and made available by him for any purpose he desires. It seems to me, therefore, that the words of the learned judge are a little difficult to understand. Then, the learned judge goes on: "They have simply done that which the common law of England gives them the right to do—namely, to pay an executor." They have done nothing of the sort. The learned judge must forgive me for saying, when he says they have paid the executor, they have done no such thing. They have paid a person whom the learned judge calls an executor, but who is not an executor within the meaning of this Act; and when the learned judge says that they "have simply done that which the common law of England gives them the right to do—namely, to pay an executor without asking him for proof of his title by the production of the probate"—I am afraid he forgets for a moment that what was done here was done with the full knowledge that the person whom they paid, not only was not an executor, but had given distinct notice that he never intended to become an executor within the meaning of the English law. Therefore I have considerable difficulty in following the learned judge's argument.

I find that the other learned judge, Grantham, J., says: "This company are not administering the estate in any way; they are not the persons who ought to administer the estate"—in those latter words I quite agree—they ought not; but as to whether they did administer the estate or not, I have already dealt with that point—"they are not the persons who ought to take out probate, and therefore under those circumstances I cannot see how they can be liable." To my mind the scheme of the Act—in fact, of the whole of the Acts—is very plain indeed, and I think the words, of which we have heard so much—namely, the "person taking possession of and administering" the estate—are very sensible words, and very clear words, to indicate what the Legislature meant. They are dealing with a subject-matter which involves this: that in this country no person is entitled to deal with an estate unless he is one of the persons who are by law entitled to deal with it—namely, in the case of personal property an executor or an administrator—and the law says that if a person without being so entitled takes possession of and administers it certain consequences shall follow.

I have already, for another purpose, called attention to the fact that the mere indorsement of a warrant for delivery of goods has been treated as a conversion, and it really would be frittering away the meaning and substance of language to suppose that where the person happens to be actually in possession of the document, the title which enables the estate to be dealt with, he does not take it because it is already in his possession. If he alters the character in which he holds it and gives the property in it to one person rather than another, it appears to me that the moment he has done that, he has "taken possession of and administered" it in the sense which this Act of Parliament is intended to involve.

It appears to me, therefore, that the appellants are clearly within those words, and are liable to the duties and the penalties indicated by this section. I do not think that the matter admits of elaborate exposition. We have had a long argument upon the subject, but it all comes to this: That because this particular form of property is conveyed in a particular way, so that under particular circumstances you have not what I may call a physical act of handing over the property, but you have merely a signature in a book, if you alter in the register the name of the person entitled to the goods, then, although that has the effect of creating a new title and giving the complete command over the property with which you are dealing, that (it is said) is not "taking possession of or administering" within the meaning of the law. It appears to me, that so to treat it would be entirely to alter the ordinary use of language, and to suppose it to be fenced round with technicality, from which I think it is happily free. In my opinion there was here a "taking possession," and there was an "administering" within the meaning of the law, and therefore the persons who have done that are liable to these penalties and liable to the payment of this duty. Accordingly I move your lordships that the judgment be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord WATSON.—In my opinion the appellants in this case have not only taken possession of part of the estate of the deceased, but have proceeded to administer it. I think they have taken possession of it in this sense: that, having a share in their hands for certain purposes, they did take possession of it for other purposes which were not legitimate, and which they had no authority to take at their own hand, and could not have taken legitimately without the express authority of the executors named after they had obtained letters of probate. The result of it is that, having taken that possession, they have used it for this purpose: for performing the first act of administration which executors having probate would have performed for themselves, with a view to, and as the first step towards, their administration.

I do not think that section 57 of the Act 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104 requires or prescribes that the persons, who are there described as "taking possession of and administering" the estate of a deceased, require, in order to bring them within the sweep of the clause, to be persons who could, if they had chosen, have taken out probate at their own hand. I do not think that is in the least necessary. It may be that certain persons who are within the purview of the clause are persons who might have taken out probate, but do not, within the period prescribed by the Act. If so, they are within the scope of these enactments; but they cannot remove themselves beyond the reach of these enactments by simply showing that they are persons who are interfering without any legitimate title, and who could not have possessed themselves of a legitimate title.

The clause gives them a defence within a certain period if they have a title to take out probate. They are entirely without that defence if they act as executors without having that title. That is the position of the present appellants; and in my judgment the order of the Court of Appeal is in strict compliance with the Act, and ought to be affirmed.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and as the House is affirming a decision of the Court of Appeal I shall only add a few words to what has been said by your lordships in giving the grounds of judgment.

It is to be observed that this company have transferred a share and a debenture which belonged to the deceased owner in America, not only without having any title presented to them by an executor who has obtained probate in this country, but they have done so after a distinct intimation that there was no intention on the part of the persons who obtained the transfer to apply for English probate, and, in fact, knowing that they meant not to do so. This last circumstance is of importance, because it displaces entirely the application of those cases in which persons who were debtors to a deceased have been found entitled to deal with an executor nominate, although he had not taken out probate, on the assumption that that executor did mean to take out probate, and, therefore, that the transaction between the parties would be valid so far as concerns the probate duty. It is clear that there was no such intention here; and therefore those cases, which make the action good in respect of bona fides, have no application.

In that state of matters, if this question had arisen in regard to a movable estate of a different character from a share in a joint-stock company—for example, in regard to goods or furniture of value in the hands of a custodian or warehouseman—I cannot suppose that any argument such as has here been raised on the part of the appellants could have been maintained. Suppose a person in possession of furniture thinks fit to act upon a foreign nomination of an executor without probate being taken out, he hands away the goods or delivers the furniture to that person who has no title as an executor in this country. What is the position of matters in that case? It appears to me that the custodier has himself changed the possession which he had. He had possession for the deceased; he has taken the possession himself, and, having got possession, he has transferred that possession to some one else. It is quite true that in that case he has not taken possession for his own behoof, and never intended to use the possession for his own behoof. It is also true that the possession was of a temporary character only; but although both those elements are present, it is nevertheless a conversion: there is on his part a taking possession of, and intermeddling with, these goods and a dealing with them, or administering them, in the act of handing them over to a third party who had no right or title to them.

I think it would be very unfortunate if there was a different law applicable to shares in a joint-stock company or choses in action in this country. There is no real difference in principle. It is clear that, without the act of the intervener, without the act of what I call the intromitter, in a case of that kind, whether as regards goods or company shares, the possession could not have been changed, and a fresh title in another party could not have been created.

Therefore I concur with your lordships in thinking that this company, in agreeing by their own hands to transfer to a third party, who had no title to it as executors, the property of the deceased, were "taking possession of and administering" that estate. It may be that the expression "take possession of" admits of the criticisms made upon it at the bar as applicable to a company's shares; but in substance it is impossible to show that that case is different from the other case which I put with regard to movable subjects, of which a transfer of this kind is made. I am therefore of opinion with your lordships that there was here a "taking possession" on the part of this company. The right could never have been transferred if they had not interposed or intervened and, to that extent, intromitted in this estate. I think, therefore, that the result was that they became executors de son tort.

Something has been said about an information not lying in a case of this kind. For my part I think it is right to say that the decided cases which have been cited seem to me fully to warrant such an information. Those cases, no doubt, were of this class, where an executor who had a title had given an insufficient return, and the Crown required by an information that the estate, which had been under-estimated, should in the new proceeding be estimated at its proper value and duty paid upon it. There were no special enactments in the statute that hit that particular case and so warranted an information; those cases proceeded upon the broad principle that, the executor being liable to make a larger return, an information would lie, although there was no provision that it should do so in the statutes. It appears to me that an executor de son tort, a person who has intermeddled with an estate and so made himself liable to duty, is in no better position than an executor who had a right but who had given an insufficient return. I think, therefore, that the principle of those cases applies to the case we now have to decide; and therefore I am of opinion that an information lies, and that effect should be given to it, and that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed. It seems to me, further, that by the terms of section 40 of the Crown Suits Act probate duty is made a debt due by the person who intromits with the deceased's estate, as was here done.

Lord DAVEY.—I also concur in the judgment proposed, and I will put the grounds very shortly. In my opinion the company, by the action which they took of altering the name in the register, taking the shares out of the name of the deceased shareholder and putting them in the names of two gentlemen who requested them to do so without the authority of an executor or administrator duly authorized to give such directions by the laws of this country, did appropriate to themselves, and appropriated in their hands, and took upon themselves to exercise the control and dominion over both the share and the debenture and the dividends. I think in principle the same considerations must apply to all the three. If a man who owes money to a deceased person takes upon himself to pay that money to some one who has no authority to receive it, I think he takes upon himself an act which is an appropriation in his own hands, and a right to exercise control and dominion over the debt. I am therefore of opinion that the company did take possession of and administer these shares, debentures, and dividends within the meaning of the section of the Act of Geo. 3 which has been referred to.

I also think on section 40 that an executor de son tort is a person who ought to obtain probate or letters of administration. It is quite true that an executor de son tort is not entitled of his own right to take out probate or to obtain letters of administration; but the section in the Act does not say a person who is entitled to take out probate or obtain letters of administration—it says a person who "ought" to do so. Now, a person who takes upon himself to administer an estate is a person who ought to obtain proper authority to do so before he takes upon himself to administer the estate; and I do not think it is giving too large a meaning or extension to the words of this section to say that an executor de son tort is a person who ought to obtain letters of administration before he intermeddles with the estate, and that, therefore, he is liable to the penalties imposed by section 40 of the Customs Act of 1881. Mr. Asquith argued at first that he could not do so; but the Solicitor-General pointed out a section which would enable the court, if it had thought fit in this case, at any rate as the persons appointed executors under this will were out of the United Kingdom, to appoint the company or their nominees, or some person on their behalf, as the administrator of the deceased, either permanently or temporarily; and before they took upon themselves to intermeddle with the estate, and to take possession of and administer the estate, I think they were bound to have made such an application—an application for the appointment of an administrator under section 40. Therefore, without any straining or doing violence to the words of this section, they are persons who ought to have taken out letters of administration.

Lord LUDLOW.—I entirely concur with what has been said by your lordships, and I feel that I can add nothing.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Oct. 25.

FLATAU v. CULLEN. (a.)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Fixed costs—Substituted service of writ—Ord. 3, r. 7—Ord. 65, r. 27 (38)—Central Office Practice rule 18.

On a taxation of costs under ord. 3, r. 7, the plaintiff claimed £2 10s. for costs of substituted service of the writ. The master allowed £1 only on the ground that by the practice adopted at chambers that was the sum invariably allowed.

Held, that the practice could not be justified.

Appeal from the refusal of Lawrance, J., to order a review of taxation of costs.

The writ of summons in the action was issued on the 5th of July, 1899, and was indorsed under ord. 3, r. 7, with a claim for £410 alleged to be due under a guarantee, "and £3 3s., or such sum as may be allowed on taxation, for costs; and if the amount claimed be paid to the plaintiff or his solicitor within four days from the service hereof, further proceedings will be stayed."

Some difficulty having arisen with regard to the service of the writ, an order for substituted service was obtained, and such service was effected on the 10th of July. On the same day the defendant's solicitor called on the plaintiff's solicitors for the purpose of paying off the claim. The plaintiff's solicitors demanded, in addition to the £410 and the £3 3s., the further sum of £2 10s. for the costs of the substituted service. The defendant's solicitor objected to the demand for £2 10s., but paid the whole sum demanded under protest, and took out a summons for taxation of the plaintiff's costs.

The plaintiff's solicitors carried in a bill for £6 4s. 8d., certain further costs having been incurred in the meantime. The master followed the practice which had been adopted at chambers of invariably allowing £3 3s. for a writ indorsed with a liquidated claim, and £1 for substituted service of a writ; and he accordingly taxed the costs at £4 3s., and he ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of the taxation, which he fixed at £3 3s.

The plaintiff applied for a review of taxation.

Lawrance, J., refused to make an order, but gave leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

Foote, Q.C., and Emanuel, for the plaintiff.—The practice which has been adopted by the masters is bad; it amounts to a refusal to tax. If the sum allowed for the costs of a writ indorsed in accordance with ord. 3, r. 7, is in every case to be £3 3s., the provision contained in that rule that the defendant may have the costs taxed is nugatory. Ord. 65, r. 27, sub-r. 38, says that where a party is entitled to sign judgment for his costs, the taxing officer may allow a fixed sum for the costs of the judgment, and rule 18 of the Central Office Practice Rules prescribes such fixed charges. But in the present case there is no judgment, and therefore these rules do not apply. Rule 18 prescribes that in the case of judgments for not more than £50 there shall be, in addition to the ordinary costs of judgment, a fixed charge of £1 for each order for substituted service. This rule is justified by section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. But the masters have no power to lay down a rule that in all cases the charge for substituted service shall be only £1.

Montague Lush, for the defendant.—It must be admitted that the practice of invariably allowing £1 for substituted service cannot be supported. But the plaintiff was not entitled to have anything allowed him on taxation for the costs of substituted service; for the costs which the defendant may, by ord. 3, r. 7, have taxed are the costs claimed on the writ, and here no costs were claimed on the writ for substituted service.

A. L SMITH, L.J.—The defendant took out a summons to have these costs taxed under ord. 3, r. 7, and the master has taxed them under that rule, no objection having been taken that this rule did not apply. I pass over the allowance of three guineas for the writ, and come to the item for substituted service. The plaintiff said the cost of that was £2 10s., but the master only allowed him £1. The master did not really tax the item, or go into the question whether the order was necessary, but said he would allow £1, because that was the sum which by the practice now adopted at chambers always was allowed in every case for substituted service of a writ. The plaintiff now says that this practice is bad, and that the master has no power to tax the cost of substituted service in that way—viz., by allowing a fixed charge. I see no answer to that. In my opinion the practice cannot be justified. The case must therefore go back for a review of taxation.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. During the argument it occurred to me that this might be a taxation which really did not come within ord. 3, r. 7, at all, for the costs to be taxed under that rule are costs which have been claimed on the writ. But the answer to that seems to be that both parties have treated the case as being within that rule, and the taxation has proceeded throughout without objection on that basis.

Practice — Discovery — Interrogatories — Objections to answer—Ord. 31, rr. 1, 6.

Each question in an interrogatory must be taken by itself and the reason for refusing to answer stated. It is no ground for refusing to answer an interrogatory that objection may be taken to a portion of it.

In an action for slander the plaintiff administered interrogatories asking whether the defendant had spoken the words complained of and in whose presence.

Held, that the interrogatories were not unreasonably wide, fishing, or oppressive, and that the defendant was bound to answer them.

This was an action to recover damages for slander. The plaintiff in his particulars stated that the slander was spoken in the hearing of two named persons and "other persons whose names are unknown to the plaintiff." The plaintiff delivered the following interrogatories to the defendant: "(1) Did you, on or about the 1st of March, 1899, speak the following words of the plaintiff"—setting out the slander alleged—"or words to that effect? (2) Were the said words spoken in the presence of W. and of H. and other persons or any or which of them?"

The defendant objected that these interrogatories were of a fishing character and sought to discover his evidence; and also that they were unreasonably wide, oppressive, and in part irrelevant.

Lawrance, J., sitting at chambers, reversed an order of the master that the defendant should file a further and better answer.

The plaintiff, by leave, now appealed.

[LINDLEY, M.R.—We will consult with our colleagues in the other division of the court, and will deliver judgment later in the day.]

On their lordships' return to court after the midday adjournment, judgment was delivered as follows:

LINDLEY, M.R.—We have consulted our colleagues in the other division of this court and they take the same view which we do and which we expressed in the course of the argument—viz., that the grounds assigned by the defendant for not answering these interrogatories are wholly insufficient and that he must put in a further and better answer.

Lawrance, J., took a different view upon the ground, as I understand, that these interrogatories were fishing or oppressive or unnecessary, But looking at the statement of claim and at the interrogatories we cannot think that they are fishing or that they seek to discover the evidence which the defendant intends to adduce in support of his case or that they are unreasonably wide, oppressive, or irrelevant. This is an action of slander, the alleged slander is set out in the statement of claim, and there is this further statement under the head of "Particulars," that the words alleged were uttered in the presence of two persons who are named. The interrogatory which was allowed by the master is this: "Did you on or about the 1st of March, or when, speak the following words of the plaintiff" (then the words are set out) "or words to that effect?" What objection there can be to that I am at a loss to conceive. In the general order relating to interrogations there is nothing which will justify the defendant in refusing to answer this interrogatory. There are certain well-known grounds upon which a defendant may decline to answer interrogatories which the plaintiff has obtained leave to administer—for example, that the answer would tend to incriminate himself—but the grounds which are stated here are utterly insufficient. They are really no grounds at all. Of course, if the interrogatories were fishing, or were, as the defendant says, oppressive, there would be something in his objection, but there is nothing of the kind.

The second interrogatory is this: "Were the said words spoken in the presence of two named persons and other persons or any and which of them?" The defendant need not trouble himself much about "any or which of them." The substance of the interrogating is this: "Did you say these words in the presence of these persons, or what others that you know of?" There is no harm in that. It was urged that the defendant might possibly object to some portion of the interrogatory, "or any and which of them," and that for that reason he is justified in refusing to answer at all. That is a line of defence which is quite new to me, and it is utterly unwarranted, both in practice and on principle. Each question must be taken by itself, and if the defendant objects to answer any question he must say why. He cannot decline to answer one question because there is some other question which he may object to. In my opinion the learned judge has taken a view far too favourable to the defendant, and too lenient in point of principle. The appeal must be allowed, and the order of the master restored. The costs will be the plaintiff's in any event.

JEUNE, P.—I quite agree. I think it is clear that for some time past interrogatories of this kind have been allowed. If there is any question of incriminating the defendant, he is at liberty to take that objection, but it seems to me idle to object to a question because at the end there is added "or words to that effect." The object of the addition is merely to prevent the defendant from swearing by the card, and if he has not used the words alleged or anything in substance like them, he is in no way oppressed, nor is oppression practised on him, because he can say that he did not use those words or words which, though not exactly the same, are to that effect.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &c., OF NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Affidavit of documents—Claim of privilege—Sufficiency of affidavit.

Where a defendant in making an affidavit of documents claims that certain documents in his possession are privileged from inspection on the ground that they relate solely to his own case and do not tend to support the plaintiff's case, it is not necessary for him to state further that they do not tend to impeach his own case.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) for inspection of documents in an information by the Attorney-General claiming a declaration that the foreshore of the River Tyne within certain limits was vested in the Crown.

The defendants to the information were the corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, who claimed to be entitled to the whole of the foreshore of the River Tyne within the limits of the port of Newcastle, including the part claimed by the Crown; the town clerk of Newcastle, was also made a defendant for the purpose of discovery.

In an affidavit in answer to interrogatories filed for the examination of the defendants as to documents in their control or possession, the town clerk stated that the defendant corporation had in their possession, custody, or power the documents mentioned in the first and second parts of the schedule to the affidavit, but that they objected to produce the documents mentioned in the second part of the schedule on the ground, inter alia, that such documents related solely to the title of the defendant corporation, and did not in any way tend to prove or to support the title of the informant.

On an application by the informant the Divisional Court made an order for a further and better affidavit of documents by the town clerk, and for the production of all documents mentioned in such affidavit, except such as the deponent should state to relate solely to the case of the defendant corporation, and to contain nothing impeaching the case of the defendant corporation or supporting the case of the informant.

The defendants appealed.

Robson, Q.C., and William Graham (Stuart Moore with them), for the defendants.—The defendants' affidavit is sufficient; it is not necessary that it should state that the documents for which they claim privilege from inspection do not contain anything tending to impeach their own case: Morris v. Edwards, 15 App. Cas. 309, 39 W. R. Dig. 162.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.—Morris v. Edwards was an action of ejectment. In all other actions a defendant in claiming that documents are privileged from inspection must state in his affidavit that the documents in question do not contain anything tending to impeach his own case: Combe v. Corporation of London, 1 Y & C. Ch. 631; Minet v. Morgan, 21 W. R. 467, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 361; Corporation of Hastings v. Ivall, 21 W. R. 899, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1017; Attorney-General v. Emerson, 31 W. R. 191, 10 Q. B. D. 191.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I remember that at one time the practice used to be that, where a defendant claimed that any documents in his possession were privileged from production, he stated in his affidavit that they did not contain anything tending to impeach his own case. It was held in several cases that such a statement was necessary: Minet v. Morgan, Combe v. Corporation of London, Corporation of Hastings v. Ivall, and Attorney-General v. Emerson. There are, on the other hand, cases, such as Emmerson v. Ind, Coope, & Co., 34 W. R. 778, 33 Ch. D. 323, which go to show that such a statement is not necessary in all cases. It would be very hard in an action of ejectment that the defendant, in order to avoid production of his title-deeds, should be obliged to say in his affidavit that there was no flaw in them. But it is pointed out that this case is not one of ejectment, and, if I had merely to give my own opinion, I should be inclined to say that the defendants in this case ought to state that the documents which they decline to produce do not contain anything tending to impeach their own case. But I cannot get over what was said in the House of Lords in Morris v. Edwards. That was an action of ejectment, but the decision is not based on that ground. The judgments say broadly and generally that an affidavit of documents need not state that the documents for which the defendant claims privilege do not contain anything tending to impeach his own title. I therefore think that the order of the Divisional Court must be varied by striking out the words "impeaching the case of the defendant corporation or."

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question is whether it is sufficient that the defendants' affidavit of discovery should say that the defendants object to produce certain documents on the ground that they relate solely to the case of the defendant corporation and do not in any way tend to prove or support the case of the informant, or whether it ought to state further that they do not contain anything which tends to impeach the defendants' case. The case of Morris v. Edwards in the House of Lords shows conclusively that an affidavit may be sufficient without containing that further statement. I do not think that it was originally necessary either at common law or in Chancery to make any such statement at all. Discovery was always said to relate to the case of your opponent, and you were not bound to disclose documents relating to your own case. But a series of decisions have been cited in which it appears to be laid down that an affidavit of discovery ought to contain a statement that the documents for which privilege is claimed do not contain anything which tends to impeach the case of the deponent. I think, however, it is clear, when the authorities are looked at, that the rule as stated by the Solicitor-General is too wide. There are clearly some cases in which a party is not bound to produce documents for inspection, although they may contain something impeaching his own case. So far as Morris v. Edwards negatives the proposition that it is always necessary to state that the documents for which privilege is claimed do not contain anything which impeaches the defendants' title, I should have come to the same conclusion. It may be that, when the line is rightly drawn, the true rule would be this—you ought to produce documents which impeach your own title, if at the same time they go to support the affirmative title of your opponent. I think the affidavit in this case is sufficient without the addition ordered by the Divisional Court.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first point is whether the agreement of the 18th of November, 1895, comes within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, so as to get rid of any necessity for the full amount of the shares being paid up in cash. It was determined by the House of Lords in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125, that the words in that section, "unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed," meant "unless the mode of payment shall have been otherwise determined by a contract made in writing and filed." In my opinion the contract which required to be filed was the agreement of the 18th of November, and it seems to me to be beyond all questions that that agreement does determine the mode of payment otherwise than in cash.

The next point is whether the agreement of the 18th of November sufficiently shows the consideration. In the case of In re Karaskhoma Exploring and Prospecting Syndicate, 46 W. R. 37, [1897] 2 Ch. 451, which was cited before us, no consideration was shown at all in the contract. It is said that the consideration ought to be shown with more particularity than it is in the present case. But the statute says nothing about particularity, and in my opinion all that is required to be shown is the nature of the consideration, and not the details. I agree with the judgment of Romer, J., in this case, and not with that of Kekewich, J., in the case of In re Maynards, 46 W. R. 346, [1898] 1 Ch. 515.

THOMSON v. LORD CLANMORRIS. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Company—Prospectus—Untrue statements — Compensation for damage — Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 3.

An action for compensation for loss or damage sustained by a shareholder in a company by reason of untrue statements in a prospectus under section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, is not an action "for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved" within the meaning of section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, and consequently need not be brought within two years after the cause of action accrued.

This was an action brought by Joseph Thomson, a shareholder in the British Goldfields of West Africa (Limited), now in liquidation, against the directors and promoter of the company. The plaintiff claimed £100, with interest and costs, as compensation for the loss and damage sustained by him by reason of alleged untrue statements in the prospectus of the company (issued the 22nd of August, 1895), under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3, which provides that every director at the time of the issue of the prospectus or notice and every promoter "shall be liable to pay compensation to all persons who shall subscribe for any shares, debentures, or debenture stock on the faith of such prospectus or notice, for the loss or damage they may have sustained by reason of any untrue statements in the prospectus or notice . . . unless it is proved with respect to every such untrue statement . . . that he had reasonable ground to believe and did . . . believe that the statement was true." The plaintiff, it appeared, applied for his shares in the company (100 in number) on the 28th of August, 1895, when he paid £12 10s. On the 29th of August, 1895, he paid a further £37 10s., on the 17th of December, 1895, a further £25, and he paid the final call of £25 in December, 1898. The plaintiff commenced this action on the 9th of December, 1898. The defendants denied the plaintiff's allegations, and also pleaded that the action had not been commenced within two years after the plaintiff's cause of action (if any) arose, and that it was therefore barred by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, which provides " . . . all actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved by any statute now or hereafter to be in force . . . shall be commenced and sued by the party grieved within two years after the cause of such actions . . ."

Warrington, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty, for three of the directors.

They referred to Robinson v. Currey, 30 W. R. 39, 7 Q. B. D. 465.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, applies only to damages by way of punishment, but the Act of 1890 merely gives a remedy by means of compensation. This action is not therefore barred by the former statute. [He also referred to Robinson v. Currey.] Moreover the plaintiff could not ascertain the measure of the damage until the winding up, and the cause of action does not arise until that can be ascertained.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is one of those cases with which the court has become very familiar. It is a case in which complaint is made of untrue statements in a prospectus issued to the public. There has, however, I believe, been only one case so far which has been decided on the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, that is the case of Greenwood v. The Leather Shod Wheel Co., 80 L. T. Rep. 462, 43 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 314, W. N. (1899), p. 26, 47 W. R. Dig. 33. In that case, in a considered judgment, I stated what I thought was the meaning of the Act of 1890, and it is now left for the consideration of a higher court; it would therefore be waste of time for me to repeat what I there said. In my opinion the Act means what I there stated it to mean. The question now is whether on that construction of the Act the plaintiff has made out that the defendants fall within it, or, to put it in another way, whether the defendants have proved such a defence as to show that they are outside the liability imposed on them by section 3 of the Act. I now have this prospectus before me. [His lordship then carefully considered the prospectus and found that there was one important statement in it at least which was untrue, and which the defendants did not believe to be true, and continued:] Mr. Thomson must be taken to have subscribed for shares on the faith of this as much as any other statement in the prospectus. He may have been foolish, but there is no reason why he should not have his remedy.

Then comes a point of law which is a new one, and which is not cleared up by the case of Robinson v. Currey, the only case on the meaning of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, which has been brought before me. The Act of 1890, by section 3, says that every person who is a director or promoter of the company at the time of the issue of the prospectus shall be liable to pay compensation to all persons who shall subscribe for any shares on the faith of such prospectus, for the loss or damage they may have sustained by reason of any untrue statement. It should be observed that the right of action is given, not to recover damages, but for compensation —that is, for something which would give back to the person subscribing for shares what he has lost by reason of the untrue statement in the prospectus. Then section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, provides that all actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved by any statute now or hereafter to be in force must be brought within two years after the cause of action. The question is, Is this action within that section? The period is short, shorter than that limited for actions for debt or on a covenant. Is it therefore reasonable to hold that an action of this kind should be so limited? I am of opinion that that section deals with damages or sums of money in the nature of a penalty, and not with such sums of money as we are dealing with here, which are claimed as compensation for the loss suffered through subscriptions for shares induced by misrepresentations in a prospectus. But besides that, I think I ought not to hold that the Legislature in the Act of 1890, giving a new remedy to a new class of persons, intended at the same time, without any clear expression thereof, to say that actions under that Act should be brought within the specially limited period of section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42. As this case may go to the Court of Appeal I will deal with one other point. Supposing the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, applies, when did the cause of action in this case commence? It does not commence with the issue of the prospectus or the application for shares. The Act of 1890 deals with compensation for loss or damage sustained by a subscriber for shares. As soon as he applies for shares it is true he is liable to pay, but he cannot sustain loss or damage until he has actually paid the money. From that time therefore the cause of action commences, so that in this case the last £25, which was not paid until December, 1898, would not be within section 3 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, even if it applied. As I hold that it does not apply, there must be judgment for the plaintiff for £100, with interest and costs; and I may add that even if he could only have brought his action for the £25 I would have given him the whole costs of the action.

Motion.

Robert Watson & Co. (Limited) was a limited company incorporated on the 25th of August, 1887, under the Companies Act, 1862, and formed for the purpose of taking over the business carried on by a firm trading under the style of Robert Watson & Co.

By the first of two agreements, both dated the 30th of September, 1887, the firm, as vendors, agreed to sell and the company agreed to purchase "all and singular the lands then belonging to the said firm whether situate in India, England, or elsewhere, the moneys, bills, notes, and other negotiable instruments and securities for money, the book and other debts and things in action belonging to the same firm and the full benefit of all contracts to which the same firm was entitled in connection with the business theretofore carried on by them, and all and singular other the property and assets of every description including the goodwill of the said business and the right to use the trade-marks or other marks of a like nature used in connection with the said business and to use the name of Robert Watson & Co. as part of the name of the company," and it was thereby agreed that part of the consideration of the said sale should be the sum of £300,000, of which £70,000 was to be paid in cash and £230,000 was to be satisfied by the issue of twenty-three shares of the nominal value of £15,000 each to the persons and in the proportions therein specified, and that the sum of £10,000 and no more was to be deemed to be paid up on each of such shares, and it was also agreed that the company should before the issue of the said twenty-three shares enter into a separate agreement embodying the relevant provisions thereof and should register the same.

The second of the said agreements was made between the company of the one part and the vendors of the other part, and after a recital that by the above-mentioned agreement "the vendors agreed to sell and the company agreed to purchase the property in the agreement now in recital mentioned for the consideration and on the terms and conditions therein expressed and contained, and among others that the company should enter into the agreement hereinafter contained," it was thereby agreed "that in fulfilment of the said condition in that behalf, and in consideration of the said sale, and in part payment of the purchase-money payable in respect thereof" the company would immediately after the registration thereof (which registration the company thereby forthwith undertook to effect) issue and allot twenty-three shares of the nominal value of £15,000 each in the company to the several persons, and in the several proportions therein specified, and that each of the said twenty-three shares should be registered and held by the holder thereof for the time being as having the sum of £10,000 paid up thereon.

The second agreement was duly filed on the 30th of September, 1887, and the twenty-three shares were subsequently issued and allotted in pursuance thereof. No other agreement had been filed.

In 1892, each of the original shares of £15,000, on which £10,000 had been paid, was subdivided into ten shares of £1,500 each, on each of which the sum of £1,000 was credited as paid.

In view of the recent decisions on the subject the company became apprehensive lest the filed contract should not be a sufficient contract, and now moved the court for an order (if necessary) directing the filing of the first above-mentioned agreement or alternatively of a memorandum in writing in a form to be approved by the court.

The respondent was the holder of ten shares in the company, representing one of the original shares issued and allotted in pursuance of the filed agreement.

The company was in a thoroughly solvent condition.

Warrington, Q.C., and Armitstead, for the applicants.—The nature of the consideration must appear in the filed contract: In re S. Frost & Co. (Limited), 47 W. R. 27, [1898] 2 Ch. 556, on appeal, ante, p. 39, [1899] 2 Ch. 207. Now here the recital states that the transaction was a sale, the character of the transaction is stated, and that involves in itself a statement of the nature of the consideration. No one by reading the contract in In re S. Frost & Co. (Limited) would get any more information as to the consideration than he would by reading this agreement.

The Kharaskhoma case, 46 W. R. 37, [1897] 2 Ch. 451, and In re Maynards (Limited), 46 W. R. 346, [1898] 1 Ch. 515, were also referred to.

C. T. Musgrave, for the respondent.—The contract must express the consideration, and if the real nature of the consideration is disclosed, that may be sufficient, although the details can be ascertained only by other evidence: In re African Gold Concessions and Development Co., Markham and Darter's case, 47 W. R. 509, [1899] 1 Ch. 414, affirmed on appeal, [1899] 2 Ch. 480.

KEKEWICH, J.—My anxious desire is to follow the guide afforded by the Court of Appeal in In re S. Frost & Co (Limited), and not the less so because they did not adopt the view which I took in In re Maynards (Limited). The difficulty is to know, when applying it to any particular document, what their view was. Now, in all these cases—in the Kharaskhoma case, in In re S. Frost & Co. (Limited), both in the court below and on appeal, and in Markham and Darter's case—the judgments make it clear that there must be stated on the face of the contract the "nature" of the consideration, or the "kind" or "sort" of the consideration, or, as Wright, J., calls it, the "real nature" of the consideration, and the difficulty is to know what is meant by that phrase—I say "by that phrase" because, though the language used is a little different, there was the same phrase throughout.

This contract says that "the vendors agreed to sell and the company agreed to purchase the property in the agreement now in recital mentioned for the consideration and on the terms and conditions therein expressed and contained." Now, unless the argument of the applicants' counsel in support of the filed contract is sound, that is not in itself sufficient, because in In re S. Frost & Co. (Limited), on appeal, Vaughan Williams, L.J., says, [1899] 2 Ch., at p. 216—and the other judges did not differ from him—"It is not a sufficient statement of the consideration if the only statement is such as to refer one to some other contract in which the consideration will be found set out." It is not, therefore, enough to say "the property in the agreement now in recital mentioned." But the applicants' counsel says that the nature of the consideration points not to the nature of the property, but to the form or character of the transaction, and that here the transaction is one of purchase and sale. This was not an exchange or anything of that sort. It was a sale, and he says that that is all you want to know. If that contention is not sound, then his argument breaks down. I do not think that the meaning contended for is within the contemplation of the statute or the decided cases.

In In re Frost & Co. (Limited) the Court of Appeal agreed with Romer, J., except upon the point dealing with the Statute of Frauds, with which I have nothing now to do. Romer, J., said: "Now, fairly viewed, is the consideration stated on the face of the filed document in the case before me? I think it is. The document shows that the consideration was (stating it shortly) that the vendor had agreed by a previous contract therein mentioned (but not filed) to sell and lease to the company certain leasehold premises, and to sell the goodwill of the business carried on by the vendor on those premises, together with the machinery, plant, horses, vans, carts, fixtures, and fittings used in connection with those businesses as therein mentioned. That is a short, but, to my mind, sufficient statement of the consideration, and I do not think it was essential that the full particulars of the leasehold businesses and plant should be detailed in the filed contract"; and then he goes on to point out (what subsequently received the approval of the Court of Appeal) that if the other view be held you must set out an inventory of the property. He evidently had in his mind the distinction between a general description and a detailed inventory of the property. He said that the former was sufficient, but that the latter could not be required without an absurdity. Illustrations of the sort of particularity required are given by Chitty, L.J., in the Kharaskhoma case. For instance, he says: "If the consideration is a concession in South Africa, the person who reads the registered document will see that it is a concession in South Africa, and will form his own opinion about it. So if it is furniture supplied to an hotel company he may be able to go at once and see what that furniture is, or he may not, because after a lapse of time the furniture may be worn out. Again, if it is the sale of a goodwill and stock-in-trade the consideration stated being the goodwill and the stock-in-trade, he sees the nature of the consideration, and he sees it stated." In all these cases an inquiring person can find out for himself what was the consideration, including the general nature of the subject-matter of the consideration, for he sees it stated in the filed document. Now, in the document before me, such a person does not see what is the nature of the consideration according to those authorities. The consideration is only stated to be the sale and purchase of property, which may be freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, or anything else that may be fairly described as property. I do not think that the Court of Appeal intended their decision in In re S. Frost & Co. (Limited) to mean that there need be no statement at all as to the nature of the property dealt with. In this case the general nature of the property can only be determined by referring to another document which is not filed, and with respect to that I only repeat what I said before —that what Vaughan Williams, L.J., said is in point, and it was concurred in by the other lords justices. In my opinion, therefore, the filed document is insufficient.

CORNWALL v. HENSON. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Payment by instalments—Purchaser's repudiation of contract before last instalment —Acts amounting to—Right to recover money paid—Specific performance.

The plaintiff was the purchaser and the defendant was the vendor of certain land under a written agreement providing for payment of the purchase-money by certain instalments. By this agreement if the purchaser made default in payment of any instalment for thirty days the whole price was to become immediately due, but provision was made for this time being extended by agreement; and in the event of default being made for thirty days in payment of the whole of the unpaid instalments with interest the vendor was empowered to resell. The plaintiff took possession under this agreement and paid all the instalments except one, but then disappeared and never made any further payment to the defendant. More than a year afterwards the defendant let the property to B. with an option to purchase, and B. was now in possession. The plaintiff thereupon made an offer to the defendant to "make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased," which offer was refused.

This was an action for specific performance of the above agreement and damages, or alternatively damages for breach of contract and repayment of the purchase-money with interest. The claim for specific performance was practically abandoned at the hearing.

Held, that the plaintiff in fact abandoned the land and repudiated his contract; and further that the plaintiff having made such default as precluded him from demanding the transfer of the property, the defendant was justified in treating this as an abandonment, and in acting thenceforward as the true owner, both at law and in equity, of the property; and the plaintiff having himself repudiated this contract after having possession of the property under the contract, and there being no circumstances from which the court could imply a promise by the defendant to repay the money paid by the plaintiff, neither the claim for damages nor that for the repayment could be sustained.

By an agreement dated the 11th of August, 1892, and made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to buy 5¼ acres of land at Pitsea, in Essex, for £150.

Clause 2 was as follows: "The purchaser has already paid to the vendor the sum of £40 on account of the said purchase-money of £150, and will pay the balance by equal quarterly instalments of £9 3s. 4d. each on the 29th day of September, the 25th day of December, the 25th day of March, and the 24th day of June in every year, the first of such quarterly payments to be made on the 25th day of December, 1892. The purchaser will also pay to the vendor with each such quarterly payment on account of principal such a further sum as shall be equivalent to interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the amount of principal remaining unpaid for the quarter then past, but if the purchaser shall make default in payment of any of such instalments of principal or interest or any part thereof for thirty days after the same shall have become due, the whole of the unpaid instalments of the said purchase-money with the interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable." Thus far the clause was in print, but the following words were added in writing: "I agree to grant a further extension on application of the purchaser at an increase of interest as shall be determined by both parties." The purchaser was by clause 3 to have possession as on the 1st of July, 1892, and he was by clause 6 to make and maintain certain boundary fences and hedges and also to complete and repair part of a certain road abutting on the land. By clause 8 the vendor, in the event of default being made for thirty days in payment of the whole of the unpaid instalments with interest, was to be at liberty to resell and to retain out of the proceeds of sale unpaid instalments with interest, and the net balance of the proceeds was to to be paid by the vendor to the purchaser.

The plaintiff entered into possession and cultivated the land for a considerable time, but he did not make it pay. The plaintiff was generally in arrear with his instalments, and from time to time the defendant allowed a postponement, interest being charged and paid at £5 per cent. The last instalment paid by the plaintiff became due on the 24th of June, 1895, and was paid with interest on the 27th of August, 1895. This left only one instalment due, but from August, 1895, no further payment was made by the plaintiff to the defendant.

Much correspondence took place, in which the defendant called upon the plaintiff to pay, and on the 23rd of October, 1896, the plaintiff wrote a long letter to the defendant asking him to reply to a particular address in Jamaica-road, Bermondsey. Shortly after that date the plaintiff disappeared, and letters addressed by the defendant to him at Jamaica-road were returned through the Dead Letter Office. Inquiries made by the defendant at former addresses and from his relations led to no result. The field was in a derelict state, the fences were broken down, nothing was produced by the land, the road was not made, and rates and tithe were unpaid. The land was not worth the total amount of the instalments paid by the plaintiff.

Under these circumstances the defendant took possession and advertised the property for sale, and, not being able to effect a sale, he on the 7th of March,

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1898, agreed to let the property to a Mr. Burns with liberty to erect a house and with the option to purchase at any time during the term. Burns accordingly erected a house, and was still in possession at the trial of the action. The plaintiff now appeared upon the scene and expressed his pleasure at finding a house erected, and on the 13th of June, 1898, he wrote to the defendant that he was prepared to "make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased." Correspondence took place, but nothing resulted from it, and on the 13th of July, 1898, this action was commenced, the plaintiff claiming specific performance of the agreement of August, 1892, and damages instead of or in addition to specific performance, or alternatively damages for breach of contract and repayment of the purchase-money with interest.

COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts as above set out, said: At an early stage it appeared to me to be reasonably clear, and it was assented to by the plaintiff's counsel, that specific performance could not be granted. The plaintiff in an action for specific performance must allege and prove that he is and always has been ready and willing to perform his part of the bargain. It would be monstrous after such delay to grant a decree for specific performance which would involve turning Burns out of possession, and giving the land with the house upon it to the plaintiff. Although the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, it is contended that he can claim damages against the defendant. It is necessary to consider what is the legal position of the plaintiff. It is often stated that the effect of a contract for sale of land is to make the purchaser from that moment in equity owner of the land. I think, however, that this statement is too wide. The doctrine is subject to one obvious qualification—namely, that the contract is one of which the court under the circumstances will decree specific performance. For instance, if the vendor is not in a position to obtain a decree for specific performance, whether by reason of some defect in title or by reason of some collateral misrepresentation, the purchaser never was, in the view of the court, owner in equity of the property. So, too, if by reason of delay or other circumstances the court declines to grant to the purchaser specific performance, the purchaser is not treated as being in equity owner of the property. It is settled law that where a purchase goes off by reason of some default on the part of the vendor, the purchaser has a lien upon the property for any part of his purchase-money which has been paid: see Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. Cas. 672. The same principle applies where the court declines to grant a decree for specific performance in favour of the purchaser, on the ground of his delay if there has been no part performance, and if there is not on the part of the purchaser anything which can amount to evidence of abandonment or repudiation of the contract (see Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R. Dig. 173, and [1899] 1 Ch. 5, 47 W. R. Dig. 200, where a purchaser failed to obtain specific performance, but was nevertheless declared entitled to a lien for his deposit). The question which I have to decide is, in the words of Cotton, L.J., in Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, at p. 804, 27 Ch. D. 89, whether there are here "acts on the part of the purchaser which not only amount to delay sufficient to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance, but which would make his conduct amount to a repudiation on his part of the contract." Upon the whole, I think that the plaintiff by his conduct has shown that he in October, 1896, thought it not worth his while to have anything further to do with the land, and in fact abandoned the land and repudiated the contract. I think, further, that the plaintiff having made such default as precluded him from demanding the transfer of the property, the defendant was justified in treating this as an abandonment and in acting thenceforward as the true owner, both at law and in equity, of the property. It was in this character that he granted a lease to Burns with an option to purchase. I do not think, under these circumstances, it would be right for me to give the plaintiff a lien upon the property for the money he has paid, or an order against the defendant to repay this sum: see Dinn v. Grant, 5 De G. & Sm. 451. The defendant's rights cannot be limited to the exercise of the power of sale conferred by the contract when once it is held that the plaintiff is no longer owner in equity of the land or entitled to a lien upon it. The lease to Burns was a lawful exercise of ownership. It is, I think, plain that the plaintiff cannot obtain damages for breach of the contract which he has himself repudiated, nor do I think he can recover back the money which he has paid, as money had and received to his use. There has not been a total failure of consideration. The general rule of law is that where a contract has been in part performed no part of the money paid under such a contract can be recovered back: see Whincup v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 439, L. R. 6 C. P. 78. The plaintiff has been for a time in possession of the property under the contract, and there are no circumstances from which I can imply a promise by the defendant to repay this money to the plaintiff, especially when the land is not now worth this money. Reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff on Palmer v. Temple, 9 A. & E. 508; but in that case there had been no part performance of the contract, possession had not been taken, and, moreover, it is not easy to reconcile the observations in that case with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Howe v. Smith. I ought perhaps to mention that the defendant, on receipt of the plaintiff's letter on the 13th of June, 1898, made an offer to convey subject to the rights of Burns under his tenancy and subject to the payment of a sum of £25. I regret that this offer was not accepted. But I do not think I ought to treat that offer as an admission by the defendant that the plaintiff's rights under the contract still subsisted. Except on the footing that the contract was at an end and that the plaintiff was not owner in equity of the land, Burns's lease with the option of purchase was improper and invalid. The result is that I am not able to find any legal foundation for the plaintiff's claim for damages or for the return of the instalments he has paid. I must, therefore, dismiss the action, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

By an agreement dated the 11th of August, 1892, and made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to buy 5¼ acres of land at Pitsea, in Essex, for £150.

Thus far the clause was in print, but the following words were added in writing: "I agree to grant a further extension on application of the purchaser at an increase of interest as shall be determined by both parties." The purchaser was by clause 3 to have possession as on the 1st of July, 1892, and he was by clause 6 to make and maintain certain boundary fences and hedges and also to complete and repair part of a certain road abutting on the land. The same principle applies where the court declines to grant a decree for specific performance in favour of the purchaser, on the ground of his delay if there has been no part performance, and if there is not on the part of the purchaser anything which can amount to evidence of abandonment or repudiation of the contract (see Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R. Dig. 173, and [1899] 1 Ch. 5, 47 W. R. Dig. 200, where a purchaser failed to obtain specific performance, but was nevertheless declared entitled to a lien for his deposit). The question which I have to decide is, in the words of Cotton, L.J., in Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, at p. 804, 27 Ch. D. 89, whether there are here "acts on the part of the purchaser which not only amount to delay sufficient to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance, but which would make his conduct amount to a repudiation on his part of the contract." Action.

By an agreement dated the 11th of August, 1892, and made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to buy 5¼ acres of land at Pitsea, in Essex, for £150.

Clause 2 was as follows: "The purchaser has already paid to the vendor the sum of £40 on account of the said purchase-money of £150, and will pay the balance by equal quarterly instalments of £9 3s. 4d. each on the 29th day of September, the 25th day of December, the 25th day of March, and the 24th day of June in every year, the first of such quarterly payments to be made on the 25th day of December, 1892. The purchaser will also pay to the vendor with each such quarterly payment on account of principal such a further sum as shall be equivalent to interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the amount of principal remaining unpaid for the quarter then past, but if the purchaser shall make default in payment of any of such instalments of principal or interest or any part thereof for thirty days after the same shall have become due, the whole of the unpaid instalments of the said purchase-money with the interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable." Thus far the clause was in print, but the following words were added in writing: "I agree to grant a further extension on application of the purchaser at an increase of interest as shall be determined by both parties." The purchaser was by clause 3 to have possession as on the 1st of July, 1892, and he was by clause 6 to make and maintain certain boundary fences and hedges and also to complete and repair part of a certain road abutting on the land. By clause 8 the vendor, in the event of default being made for thirty days in payment of the whole of the unpaid instalments with interest, was to be at liberty to resell and to retain out of the proceeds of sale unpaid instalments with interest, and the net balance of the proceeds was to to be paid by the vendor to the purchaser.

The plaintiff entered into possession and cultivated the land for a considerable time, but he did not make it pay. The plaintiff was generally in arrear with his instalments, and from time to time the defendant allowed a postponement, interest being charged and paid at £5 per cent. The last instalment paid by the plaintiff became due on the 24th of June, 1895, and was paid with interest on the 27th of August, 1895. This left only one instalment due, but from August, 1895, no further payment was made by the plaintiff to the defendant.

Much correspondence took place, in which the defendant called upon the plaintiff to pay, and on the 23rd of October, 1896, the plaintiff wrote a long letter to the defendant asking him to reply to a particular address in Jamaica-road, Bermondsey. Shortly after that date the plaintiff disappeared, and letters addressed by the defendant to him at Jamaica-road were returned through the Dead Letter Office. Inquiries made by the defendant at former addresses and from his relations led to no result. The field was in a derelict state, the fences were broken down, nothing was produced by the land, the road was not made, and rates and tithe were unpaid. The land was not worth the total amount of the instalments paid by the plaintiff.

Under these circumstances the defendant took possession and advertised the property for sale, and, not being able to effect a sale, he on the 7th of March,

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1898, agreed to let the property to a Mr. Burns with liberty to erect a house and with the option to purchase at any time during the term. Burns accordingly erected a house, and was still in possession at the trial of the action. The plaintiff now appeared upon the scene and expressed his pleasure at finding a house erected, and on the 13th of June, 1898, he wrote to the defendant that he was prepared to "make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased." Correspondence took place, but nothing resulted from it, and on the 13th of July, 1898, this action was commenced, the plaintiff claiming specific performance of the agreement of August, 1892, and damages instead of or in addition to specific performance, or alternatively damages for breach of contract and repayment of the purchase-money with interest.

Astbury, Q.C., and Harry Greenwood, for the plaintiff.

Frederic Thompson, for the defendant.

COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts as above set out, said: At an early stage it appeared to me to be reasonably clear, and it was assented to by the plaintiff's counsel, that specific performance could not be granted. The plaintiff in an action for specific performance must allege and prove that he is and always has been ready and willing to perform his part of the bargain. It would be monstrous after such delay to grant a decree for specific performance which would involve turning Burns out of possession, and giving the land with the house upon it to the plaintiff. Although the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, it is contended that he can claim damages against the defendant. It is necessary to consider what is the legal position of the plaintiff. It is often stated that the effect of a contract for sale of land is to make the purchaser from that moment in equity owner of the land. I think, however, that this statement is too wide. The doctrine is subject to one obvious qualification—namely, that the contract is one of which the court under the circumstances will decree specific performance. For instance, if the vendor is not in a position to obtain a decree for specific performance, whether by reason of some defect in title or by reason of some collateral misrepresentation, the purchaser never was, in the view of the court, owner in equity of the property. So, too, if by reason of delay or other circumstances the court declines to grant to the purchaser specific performance, the purchaser is not treated as being in equity owner of the property. It is settled law that where a purchase goes off by reason of some default on the part of the vendor, the purchaser has a lien upon the property for any part of his purchase-money which has been paid: see Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. Cas. 672. The same principle applies where the court declines to grant a decree for specific performance in favour of the purchaser, on the ground of his delay if there has been no part performance, and if there is not on the part of the purchaser anything which can amount to evidence of abandonment or repudiation of the contract (see Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R. Dig. 173, and [1899] 1 Ch. 5, 47 W. R. Dig. 200, where a purchaser failed to obtain specific performance, but was nevertheless declared entitled to a lien for his deposit). The question which I have to decide is, in the words of Cotton, L.J., in Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, at p. 804, 27 Ch. D. 89, whether there are here "acts on the part of the purchaser which not only amount to delay sufficient to deprive him of the equitable remedy of specific performance, but which would make his conduct amount to a repudiation on his part of the contract." Upon the whole, I think that the plaintiff by his conduct has shown that he in October, 1896, thought it not worth his while to have anything further to do with the land, and in fact abandoned the land and repudiated the contract. I think, further, that the plaintiff having made such default as precluded him from demanding the transfer of the property, the defendant was justified in treating this as an abandonment and in acting thenceforward as the true owner, both at law and in equity, of the property. It was in this character that he granted a lease to Burns with an option to purchase. I do not think, under these circumstances, it would be right for me to give the plaintiff a lien upon the property for the money he has paid, or an order against the defendant to repay this sum: see Dinn v. Grant, 5 De G. & Sm. 451. The defendant's rights cannot be limited to the exercise of the power of sale conferred by the contract when once it is held that the plaintiff is no longer owner in equity of the land or entitled to a lien upon it. The lease to Burns was a lawful exercise of ownership. It is, I think, plain that the plaintiff cannot obtain damages for breach of the contract which he has himself repudiated, nor do I think he can recover back the money which he has paid, as money had and received to his use. There has not been a total failure of consideration. The general rule of law is that where a contract has been in part performed no part of the money paid under such a contract can be recovered back: see Whincup v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 439, L. R. 6 C. P. 78. The plaintiff has been for a time in possession of the property under the contract, and there are no circumstances from which I can imply a promise by the defendant to repay this money to the plaintiff, especially when the land is not now worth this money. Reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff on Palmer v. Temple, 9 A. & E. 508; but in that case there had been no part performance of the contract, possession had not been taken, and, moreover, it is not easy to reconcile the observations in that case with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Howe v. Smith. I ought perhaps to mention that the defendant, on receipt of the plaintiff's letter on the 13th of June, 1898, made an offer to convey subject to the rights of Burns under his tenancy and subject to the payment of a sum of £25. I regret that this offer was not accepted. But I do not think I ought to treat that offer as an admission by the defendant that the plaintiff's rights under the contract still subsisted. Except on the footing that the contract was at an end and that the plaintiff was not owner in equity of the land, Burns's lease with the option of purchase was improper and invalid. The result is that I am not able to find any legal foundation for the plaintiff's claim for damages or for the return of the instalments he has paid. I must, therefore, dismiss the action, but, under the circumstances, without costs.

LLANDUDNO URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WOOD. (a.)

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The public have no right without the consent of the Crown or its lessees to enter upon the foreshore of the sea, when dry, except for the purposes of navigation and fishing; and therefore no one is entitled to hold meetings or deliver addresses on any part of the foreshore without such consent. An injunction is a formidable legal weapon which the court will refuse to grant where the injury or inconvenience caused by the trespass is trivial.

The plaintiffs, the Urban District Council of Llandudno, brought this action to restrain the defendant, the Rev. John Wood, from delivering addresses upon the foreshore at Llandudno, of which, as successors of improvement commissioners, they were lessees from the Crown under a lease which would expire in 1901. Between the foreshore and the town there was a promenade, concerning which the plaintiffs had, under their Improvements Acts, power to make and had made bye-laws. One of these bye-laws prohibited any person delivering any public address.

In June, 1898, the defendant requested the plaintiffs to allow him to hold religious services on the promenade and foreshore. The plaintiffs replied expressing their regret that they could not accede to this request as they had granted a similar privilege to the organisation which had been in the habit of visiting Llandudno in past years, and proposed to come again that season. This organization was one for holding children's services.

Notwithstanding this refusal the defendant held religious meetings upon the promenade until the plaintiffs took proceedings against him before the magistrates, who fined him for breach of the bye-laws. He thereupon held the meetings upon the foreshore, conducting them from a box on which he stood. Part of his addresses were attacks upon the clergy of the Church of England for their ritualistic practices. He was told by the officers of the council to desist, but refused, asserting his right to do what he was doing. Thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action, by which they claimed: (1) A declaration that the defendant was not entitled, without the consent of the plaintiffs, to hold meetings or deliver addresses, lectures, or sermons on any part of the beach or foreshore so in lease to the plaintiffs, and (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant from doing so.

Eve, Q.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for the plaintiffs.—The rights of the public over the foreshore are very limited. At most they have a right of passage. They have no right, for instance, of bathing: Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 268 (see observations of Erle, C.J., in Mace v. Philcox, 12 W. R. 670, 15 C. B. N. S. 600). Even if the public have a right of passage over the foreshore, they have no right to assemble and hold meetings there: Ex parte Lewis, 37 W. R. 13, 21 Q. B. D. 191.

They also referred to Callis on Sewers (2nd ed.), p. 54, and Attorney-General v. Wright, 46 W. R. 85, [1897] 2 Q. B. 318.

The defendant appeared in person.

Aug. 2.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—I may observe that the organisation referred to in the letter of the plaintiffs of June, 1898, is not antagonistic to the defendant; and that there is ample space on the extensive shore for more than one service. The defendant has since held services on the shore until he was restrained by an interlocutory injunction. The evidence satisfies me that there was no breach of the peace, no disorder worth mentioning, and no inconvenience except of the most trivial kind to any of the public resorting to the shore. It is, however, contended on the part of the plaintiffs that they are entitled as lessees to the possession of the foreshore, and that the public have no right at common law to enter upon the shore, when dry, except for the purposes of navigation or fishing. I think I am bound by the decision of the majority of the judges of the Court of King's Bench in 1821 in Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 268, to hold that, in strict law, this proposition is well founded. The public are not entitled to cross the shore even for purposes of bathing or amusement. The sands on the seashore are not to be regarded as in the full sense of the word a highway. A more extensive right may possibly have been gained by prescription or by custom either by individuals or by the permanent or temporary inhabitants of Llandudno, but the existence of this more extensive right must be proved, and will not be presumed in the absence of proof. The plaintiffs have therefore, primâ facie, a right to treat every bather, every nursemaid with a perambulator, every boy riding a donkey, and every preacher on the shore at Llandudno as a trespasser. In the present case there is no evidence from which I can find the existence of a legal usage or custom entitling the defendant to deliver sermons or addresses on the shore at Llandudno. The defendant seems to imagine that his position as a clergyman of the Established Church, bound to preach the Gospel both in season and out of season, gives him some special and peculiar rights. It is needless for me to say that this contention cannot for one moment be maintained. I must treat the defendant precisely as I should treat a Roman Catholic priest, a Methodist preacher, or a Salvation Army captain. This court has nothing to do with the truth or falsehood of the doctrines which the defendant has preached. I feel bound to say that I consider this action wholly unnecessary, and one which ought not to have been brought. It is no part of the duty of the council, as lessees from the Crown for an unexpired term of two years, to prevent a harmless user of the shore. There are persons who derive satisfaction from listening to the addresses of the defendant, and the defendant derives satisfaction from delivering these addresses. I cannot conceive why they should be deprived of this innocent pleasure. Nobody is obliged to listen; nobody is molested. This action is an attempt to assert rights which the Crown would never have thought of putting forward, and which are in no way necessary for the peace and good order of the town of Llandudno. Charges have been made against the defendant in the pleadings and in the evidence for which there is no justification. I cannot refuse to make a declaration that the defendant is not entitled without the consent of the plaintiffs to hold meetings or deliver addresses, lectures, or sermons on any part of the foreshore in lease from the Crown. But I decline to go further. I decline to grant an injunction. That is a formidable legal weapon which ought to be reserved for less trivial occasions, and I make no order as to costs.

MONCKTON v. PAYNE. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Copyhold manor—Admittance—Arbitrary fine—Fine assessed and demanded more than six years after defendant's admittance—Accrual of lord's cause of action—Statutes of Limitation (21 Jac. 1, c. 16; 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3).

P. was admitted tenant of a copyhold manor by M. on the 5th of April, 1892. M., as lord of the manor, could by right of custom claim an arbitrary fine from any tenant so admitted by him, such fine to be assessed by the lord, and to be reasonable and to be duly demanded.

On the 2nd of September, 1898, the fine, which had not been assessed until February of that year by M., was duly demanded; and, not being paid, the writ in the present action to recover the fine was issued on the 13*th of April,* 1899, whereupon P. pleaded in defence the Statutes of Limitation.

Held, that, as it was the admittance by the lord that gave him the right to demand the fine, the action could not be maintained, since the lord's cause of action accrued on the 5th of April, 1892, or more than six years before the action was brought.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff as lord of the manor of Duddington, Northamptonshire, to recover from the defendant, a widow, the sum of £24 demanded as the assessed fine due from her on admission as tenant to a copyhold hereditament held of the manor. The plaintiff moved for judgment under order 14, but the master gave leave to defend on the question whether the Statutes of Limitation were a bar to the lord's right of action.

The facts admitted or proved were as follow: In 1884 the husband of the present defendant died, and by his will he devised to his wife his interest in certain licensed premises known as the Royal Oak Inn, Duddington, held by him as tenant of the manor at a rental of £16 per annum. By custom of the manor, the lord was entitled to levy a reasonable fine, to be assessed by himself on every tenant he admitted as a copyhold tenant of the manor. The amount of the fine when so assessed and not objected to as excessive by the tenant before the court holden for the manor, had then to be demanded by the steward, who was to require payment to be made at a place to be named within the precincts of the manor on a particular day. At a court held for the said manor on the 5th of April, 1892, the defendant was duly admitted tenant of the Royal Oak Inn, where since her husband's death she had continued to carry on business and had regularly paid the rent of to the plaintiff. There was no evidence that the question of the fine was then raised, and nothing was done by the plaintiff in the matter until at another court holden in February, 1898, the amount of the fine was assessed by the lord at £24, or one and a half years' rent, and it was agreed by the parties that this sum was a reasonable and proper amount. On the 2nd of September, 1898, the steward duly gave the defendant formal notice of the amount of the fine, and demanded payment. The demand being refused for the reason already mentioned, the writ was taken out in these proceedings on the 13th of April, 1899, and the action in due course came on for trial.

R. M. Bray, Q.C. (with him Clavell Salter), for the plaintiff.—The Statutes of Limitation are no defence to the plaintiff's right to sue for this fine, because his right of action did not arise until the 2nd of September, 1898. Although a fine became due when the defendant was admitted tenant in 1892, this being an arbitrary fine—i.e., a fine which the lord himself was to fix the amount of, the amount of the fine was uncertain until so assessed by the lord in February, 1898. Even then the right to sue for the fine was imperfect, for it was not a debt which could be recovered until there had been a demand and a refusal to pay, and the sum in question was not demanded by the steward until the 2nd of September, 1898. The lord's right therefore did not accrue until 1898, for until some date in that year the three steps necessary to be done by the lord before he could recover payment—namely, the admission, the assessment of the fine, and the demand, were not each and all complete. As a fact, therefore, the action was brought within one year of the date that it could have been commenced. In Hayward v. Raw, 6 H. & N. 308, 9 W. R. C. L. Dig. 20, it was held that a lord of a manor could not recover a fine unless it was reasonable and had been assessed, and payment demanded from the tenant. See also Miller v. Dell, 39 W. R. 342, [1891] 1 Q. B. 468.

C. B. Matthews, for defendant.—The right to demand a fine by the lord is on the same footing as the right to enforce any other money debt. In Whitfield v. Hunt (1781), cited in a note to a case on p. 727*b* in 2 Doug., it was held that a general indebitatus assumpsit will lie for a copyhold fine: see also Hobart v. Hammond, Coke's Rep., Part IV., 27*b*, p. 348. The lord's right of action accrued on the 5th of April, 1892. In Coburn v. Colledge, 45 W. R. 488, [1897] 1 Q. B. 702, which was the case of work done by a solicitor in the course of his profession, the cause of action was held to have accrued immediately after the completion of the work he was instructed to do, and that the Statute of Limitations ran from such date and not from one month after the delivery by him of his signed bill of costs. So here, the admittance by the lord was the act that entitled him to claim a fine, and from that date the statute began to run. The assessment and the demand were conditions preceding the right to sue, just as the delivery of the signed bill of costs in the case cited, but they were not the "cause of action." Otherwise a tenant would be at the lord's mercy, and liable to pay a fine at any time that the lord chose to demand it. He had no power to put an end to his liability, and the state of things would be absolutely opposed to the whole spirit of the statute, which was passed to compel the lord to exercise his right within a definite time: see also In re Bethell, 35 W. R. 330, 34 Ch D. 561. There is also another defence to this action. By the custom of the manor the lord must demand payment to be made at a place to be named, within the precincts of the manor, and no such place for payment was mentioned. I submit, therefore, on numerous very ancient authorities which can be cited, that there has never been a proper demand. [Clavell Salter objected to the second defence being argued. There were no pleadings, and the master's order gave the defendant leave to defend only on the question of time. The objection was held good.]

Clavell Salter in reply.—There is a distinction between a fine and an arbitrary fine—i.e., one the amount of which is not fixed by the custom of the manor, but assessed by the lord. I should not argue if the fine were fixed the mere fact that it had not been formerly demanded might not be sufficient to bar the statute, for after admittance a definite debt would become due and payable from the tenant. But that is not the case here, for until the fine is assessed there is no debt, for the amount is not ascertained. The argument for the defendant does not displace the judgment in Hayward v. Raw, which is in my favour and decides this case.

SMITH, L.J.—The plaintiff seeks to get £24 from the defendant which he says he is entitled to as lord of the manor of Duddington by way of fine, according to the custom of the manor, for having admitted her tenant of a public-house which forms part of the manor. The defendant admits the plaintiff's right to claim the fine, but says, "You are out of time and you cannot enforce your claim against me because the statute of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3, protects me." On the admitted facts it is clear that if the fine had been assessed and demanded when the defendant was admitted tenant she could then have raised no defence under that statute. But although the widow was admitted on the 5th of April, 1892, nothing was done by the lord until February, 1898, to assess the amount of the fine, and the fine so fixed was not demanded by the steward until the 2nd of September that year. Then there was correspondence, and in the result the writ was issued on the 13th of April, 1899. There is no doubt that from April, 1892, to April, 1899, is seven years, and, therefore, if the Statutes of Limitation run in favour of the widow, the plaintiff cannot maintain this action. Now, section 3 of the Act of Will. 4 says that "all actions to recover any fine due in respect of any copyhold estate shall be brought within six years after the cause of such action or suit accrued, and not after." The widow pleads this section in defence and says, "You did not sue me within six years from the date when your cause of action accrued—i.e., when you admitted me, for it is in respect of that admittance which took place on the 5th of April, 1892, that you claim by custom of the manor this." I think the widow's contention is right. The whole object that the Legislature had in view and intended to carry into effect by this section was to prevent old claims being sprung upon tenants years after the fine, or whatever the debt was, ought to have been demanded, if at all, by the lord. The wording of the section is perfectly clear—no action of debt in respect of any fine due in respect of any holding shall be brought by the lord of the manor, except it be brought within six years. But to this defence the lord replied: "That is all quite true, but my cause of action did not arise until September, 1898, or at earliest in April, 1898, and therefore my action is brought within six years from the date when I could first have sued you for this £24." Now, is there anything which will support that statement? I think not. What did the defendant say in answer? She said, "The act that gave you the right to claim the fine was your formally admitting me tenant of this public-house which forms part of your manor, and that act took place in April, 1892. Therefore the six years within which your action must be brought dates from then." But the lord had another answer ready, for he replied, "I could not sue for a debt until the amount was ascertained, and that was not known, as this was an arbitrary fine, until I myself had assessed it and it had been agreed to by yourself as reasonable. Now, I did not assess the amount of the fine I should require you to pay until February, 1898, and even then I could not have taken out this writ to enforce payment until my steward had made a formal demand and you had refused to pay, and no demand was made until the 2nd of September, 1898." On that state of things the master quite rightly gave the defendant leave to defend. The meaning of section 3 of the statute of Will. 4 is that the person who has the right to sue for a debt must exercise that right within six years, otherwise the statute deprives him of a right of action and he has himself alone to blame. The right to the fine accrued when the defendant was admitted. No doubt before the lord could sue for it he had first to prove the admittance, the assessment, and the demand, But those are all three acts which the lord had the power to do and not the tenant. Having admitted the defendant she was at his mercy but for the statute, and it was just to prevent the lord in a case like the present letting the debt run on hanging over the tenant's head for ten, fifteen, or twenty years at his (the lord's) pleasure, that the statute was passed to meet. If the lord was not bound to assess and demand the fine at the time that he admitted the tenant, he was certainly bound to do so within a reasonable time afterwards, and if on the ground of saving himself trouble or expense he did not think fit to complete his right within six years of the date of admittance, so that he might in a case of refusal bring an action to recover the debt, he must expect to be met by the defence properly raised here. In my judgment, therefore, the defence to the claim being successful, judgment must be entered for the defendant with costs.

Judgment accordingly for the defendant; stay of execution refused.

Ex parte WARD. (a.)

Bill of sale—Validity—Form—Covenant to produce last receipt for rents, rates, and taxes "when called upon"—Power to seize on breach of any covenant—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 7, 9.

A bill of sale contained a covenant by the grantor to produce "when called upon" his last receipts for rents, rates, and taxes, and a proviso giving power to seize and sell on breach of any covenant. It also contained the usual proviso that the chattels included under the bill of sale should not be liable to seizure for any other cause than those mentioned in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Held, that the covenant to produce "when called upon" must be read as subject to the importation, in the subsequent proviso, of section 7 of the Act, and that consequently the bill of sale contained no power of seizure for non-production of the receipts except without reasonable excuse after demand in writing, and that it was a valid bill of sale.

Motion by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a bill of sale, and for delivery up of the proceeds of the goods seized and sold by the grantee of such bill of sale. The bill of sale was dated the 17th of September, 1897, and made between R. G. Bullock, the bankrupt, and one W. Silverton. Bullock assigned thereby all his horses and cabs and some furniture as security for the sum of £385 10s., and covenanted, inter alia, to repay the said sum by monthly instalments, and also, "when called upon by the said W. Silverton to produce to him the policy of insurance and the receipt for the last premium and the last receipt of such rent, rates, and taxes, provided always that the chattels thereby assigned should not be liable to seizure by the said W. Silverton for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882," which causes were thereafter set forth in the bill.

The bill also contained the following proviso: "Provided further that if the said horses or cabs, chattels, and things hereby assigned shall be seized or taken possession of by the said W. Silverton in consequence of the breach of any of the covenants herein contained, the said W. Silverton should be at liberty to remove and sell the same as therein mentioned."

On the 3rd of January, 1898, Silverton took possession under the bill of sale, default having been made in payment of the instalments, and sold the horses and cabs for £243 10s.

On the 4th of January, 1898, a receiving order was made against Bullock. He was adjudicated bankrupt, and Ward was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

The trustee claimed the proceeds of the sale on the ground that the bill of sale was not in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882.

Haldinstein, for the trustee.—This bill of sale is bad because it contains a covenant by the grantee to produce his last receipt for rent, &c., "when called upon," and confers a power to seize on breach of that covenant, whereas section 7 of the Act requires a "demand in writing" and absence of "reasonable excuse" for non-production before a power of seizure can arise.

He cited Davis v. Burton, 32 W. R. 423, 11 Q. B. D. 537, and Ex parte Pearce, In re Williams, 32 W. R. 187, 25 Ch. D. 656.

Reed, Q.C., and Salter, for the grantee of the bill of sale.—The deed is in common form and is perfectly good: see Weardale Coal and Iron Co. v. Hodgson, 42 W. R. 424, [1894] 1 Q. B. 598; In re Paxton, Ex parte Pope, 60 L. T. Rep. 498, 37 W. R. Dig. 24; Topley v. Corsbie, 36 W. R. 352, 20 Q. B. D. 350; Turner & Co. v. Culpan, 36 W. R. 278; Cartwright v. Regan, 43 W. R. 650, [1895] 1 Q. B. 900.

Haldinstein replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I think this is a very ordinary and unobjectionable form of bill of sale. I think I have often met with it before, and it is one commonly in use, though, of course, that will not make it good if the decisions say that it is bad. The question is whether the third provision in the bill of sale vitiates it as amounting to a power to seize and sell whenever there is a default in the production of the receipts for rent, rates, and taxes, although there may be a reasonable excuse for their non-production and although they are not demanded in writing.

I do not see that that is the meaning of the bill of sale at all; if that was the effect, I think the bill of sale might be bad; but it seems to me that in reading the bill of sale the general language of the first provision for seizure ought, as regards the receipts for rent, rates, and taxes, to be read as subject to the fourth provision of section 7: "If the said R. G. Bullock shall not without reasonable excuse upon demand in writing by the said William Silverton produce to him his last receipts for rents, rates, and taxes." What is the use of putting that in unless it is intended to cover the more general words of the first provision. It seems to me that that was the view of Cave and Charles, JJ., in In re Paxton, Ex parte Pope. I think, therefore, that the contention of the trustee fails.

HOGARTH & CO. v. WALKER. (a.)

Insurance (marine)—Time policy—Ship's furniture—Grain cargo—Dunnage mats and separating cloths.

The dunnage mats and separating cloths which are used on board ships engaged in the grain trade in connection with the carriage of the cargo are "furniture" of the ship within the meaning of an ordinary Lloyd's time policy of marine insurance on ship.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

The plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Felbridge, sought to recover a loss under a time policy in the ordinary Lloyd's form on the "body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munitions, artillery, boats, and other furniture in the good ship or vessel" Felbridge.

The Felbridge was a vessel engaged in the grain trade, and was usually employed in carrying cargoes of grain from the Black Sea. It is customary for ships engaged in the grain trade to have on board dunnage mats and separating cloths. The dunnage mats are used to keep the grain off the ship's floor, and the separating cloths keep apart the different parcels of grain. During the currency of the policy The Felbridge was on a voyage from America with a cargo of grain. The dunnage mats and separating cloths were on board, but were not being used, as the cargo consisted of one parcel only, which is usually the case with American cargoes. On the voyage the vessel collided with a pier-head, and some of the mats and cloths were washed overboard and lost. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the loss under the policy.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the plaintiffs.—The mats and cloths come within the word "furniture" in the policy. They formed part of the equipment which the ship necessarily had for the trade in which she was engaged, and without them the ship would not have been seaworthy.

They referred to Hoskins v. Pickersgill, 3 Doug. 222.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the defendant.—These articles formed no part of the equipment of the ship as a ship. They were used by the shipowner in his business as a carrier of cargo, and they are akin to the bags in which grain is carried, which bags are certainly not covered by a policy on ship.

They referred to McArthur on Marine Insurance (2nd ed.), p. 57.

BIGHAM, J.—In my opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. The question is whether an ordinary Lloyd's time policy covers the dunnage mats and separating cloths used in connection with the carriage of a grain cargo. It is not to be forgotten that the ship in question was a grain ship, and, as a grain ship, the use of such cloths and mats would under ordinary circumstances be necessary for the proper carriage of the cargo, and if the ship went to sea without them she would be unseaworthy. They are therefore part of the ship's furniture within the meaning of the policy. There is no distinction between these things and a movable bulkhead intended to separate one lot of cargo from another. The underwriter must pay on this policy.

IREDALE AND ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS' INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Ship—General average—Loss of freight.

The plaintiffs' ship was chartered to carry coal from Cardiff to Esquimalt. In the course of the voyage the coal heated to such an extent that, if the voyage to Esquimalt had been continued, the ship and cargo would have been burnt. The captain, for the safety of ship, freight, and cargo, put into Buenos Ayres and discharged the coal. It was found to be in such a condition that it could not be reloaded and carried to Esquimalt. The coal was therefore condemned and sold at Buenos Ayres, and the voyage to Esquimalt was abandoned, and the chartered freight was lost.

Held, that the freight had not been lost in such circumstances as to make the loss the subject of general average contribution.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The following statement of facts had been agreed upon by the parties:

1. The plaintiffs own the iron ship Lodore, and by charter-party, dated the 10th of February, 1897, chartered her to load coals at Cardiff for Esquimalt at 19s. 9d. per ton delivered. By a policy dated the 3rd of March, 1897, they insured the chartered freight thereunder, valued at £1,650, with the defendants, against, inter alia, loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight.

2. The Lodore proceeded to Cardiff, and there loaded a full cargo of coals, and sailed on the 29th of March, 1897, on the insured voyage. On the 26th of May, 1897, the coals began to heat, and the master decided, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to jettison cargo, and to bear up for the River Plate. About forty tons were jettisoned, and The Lodore subsequently anchored in Buenos Ayres Roads on the 29th of May, 1897. Between that date and the 25th of June, 1897, cargo was from time to time discharged, and various surveys were held upon the coals, and it was found that the coals continued hot, and would heat still further if the voyage was proceeded with. Accordingly, on the 25th of June, 1897, the coals were condemned and were ultimately sold. The vessel abandoned her voyage to Esquimalt and returned to the United Kingdom with another cargo, and the chartered freight was totally lost.

3. It was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure for the vessel to put into Buenos Ayres as aforesaid, and it was reasonably certain that if she had continued on her direct voyage, the temperature of the coal would have continued to rise until spontaneous combustion ensued, and that, had she continued her voyage, the ship and cargo would have been destroyed by fire before reaching Esquimalt. When and while she was at Buenos Ayres, the ship and her cargo, both the portion landed and the portion remaining on board, were in safety, but after she reached Buenos Ayres no part of the cargo could have been reloaded and/or carried with safety to Esquimalt in the same or another bottom, and it was all necessarily and properly sold at Buenos Ayres.

4. The policy and charter-party, the protest dated the 11th of August, 1897, and the average statement dated the 15th of March, 1898, with the survey reports as therein set out, may be referred to as parts of this special case.

5. This action in the defence to which all underwriters interested similarly to the defendants concur, is defended to test the question whether by way of set-off and deduction from the total loss in the policy, which is admitted, the defendants are entitled to have the said loss of freight made good in general average to any and what extent, and to deduct the contribution to the same falling on the plaintiffs as shipowners from the amount due on the policy.

6. It is not intended to allege or rely on improper condition of cargo as a defence to any claim there may be.

7. The court is to have power to draw all necessary inferences of fact, and the parties agreed to leave the adjustment of figures on such principle as may be laid down to an average adjuster.

July 4.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: The question in this case is whether the freight of the plaintiffs' vessel Lodore was sacrificed in such circumstances as to make the loss the subject of general average contribution. The facts have been agreed by the parties and are stated as follows: [His lordship read the statement of facts.] I have read and carefully considered the documents incorporated in the one special case, and I have drawn from all the facts the inference that before the master of the vessel decided to alter his course and make for Buenos Ayres the freight on the coals was completely lost. I am satisfied that the condition of the coals at and before that time was such that it had become impossible to carry them to their destination so as to earn any freight at all; their inherent heat would have completely destroyed them long before their arrival at Esquimalt. This inference of fact appears to me to dispose of the case, because the law is plain that where the thing sacrificed is already valueless at the time of the general average act there can be no claim to contribution. Nothing of value is sacrificed, and therefore there is nothing to contribute to. Why was this freight lost? Not because it was sacrificed, but because the cargo could not be reshipped. And why could it not be reshipped? Because long before the alleged average act (the abandonment of the voyage) the coals had got into such a condition as to be unfit for carriage. The freight, in fact, was lost by fire—a peril insured against by the defendants—and not by any general average act at all. The case was supposed to raise some questions of law not covered by authority; but, for my part, I do not think it does. It involves the finding of an inference of fact which, once found, leaves nothing further to be determined. It was said by Mr. Carver that the case was like that of a voluntary stranding in the fact of a danger of foundering so imminent as to render the saving of the adventure hopeless; or like the cutting away of a mast in similar circumstances. He said that in such cases the loss of the vessel or the loss of the mast is a general average loss, and that it is none the less so because, before the average act, the thing sacrificed (the ship or the mast) had practically gone, in the sense that it was involved in a hopeless peril. I agree with him that by our law such losses are the subject of general average; but I do not agree with him that such cases are like the case now before the court. In the illustrations given there is always an element of uncertainty. Mr. Lowndes, at p. 24 of his work on General Average (3rd. ed.), says: "The captain cannot tell but that in his last extremity a sudden shift of the wind, or lull of the storm, or, if drifting ashore, some undercurrent unknown to him may unexpectedly bring him out of danger. He can hardly ever be quite certain of destruction until his ship has been destroyed, and he substitutes a certain loss of part for a probable loss of all." If in the present case it could be said that when the captain abandoned the voyage there was a chance, even a remote chance, of saving the freight by carrying forward the cargo, then I should be of opinion that the freight was sacrificed in such circumstances as to give rise to the general average claim; the element of doubt which exists in cases supposed by Mr. Carver would then be present and would make all the cases alike. Mr. Walton contended that even if this element of doubt did exist, and there was a chance or a hope of successfully bringing forward the cargo and so earning the freight, yet the sacrifice of that chance or hope gave no claim to contribution, because the other interests were at the moment out of danger, the ship being in port and discharged, and the coal being safe on the quay; so that the sacrifice could not be described as a sacrifice for the general benefit. But I do not think this is a sound contention. Though the cargo and the ship were physically separated, the maritime adventure was not at an end; the intention to prosecute the voyage still existed, and in fact the putting in to Buenos Ayres and the discharge were all done with the object of continuing the voyage in safety; the obligation of the master, therefore, to make such sacrifices as might be necessary for attaining that object still existed, and if any such were made they would be in the general interest and the subject of contribution: see Whitecross Wire Co. v. Savill. The real difficulties in cases like the present is to ascertain the facts. Was the thing which is said to have been sacrificed absolutely lost or not before the general average act was done? I think this question ought to be answered by reference to the circumstances as they appeared at the time of the average act and not by reference to the events as subsequently ascertained. Thus, in the present case it was admitted by the plaintiffs that the loss of the freight on the forty tons of cargo jettisoned at sea was a general average loss, and I think it was rightly admitted; because, although it was subsequently ascertained that the freight was at this time wholly lost, yet the circumstances as then known did not justify that conclusion, and thus the captain may be properly said to have substituted a certain loss of part for a probable loss of the whole of the adventure so as to give rise to a general average claim. In Shepherd v. Kottgen the real difficulty with which the court had to deal was one of fact. The case turned entirely on the effect of the finding of the jury. When once the significance of that finding was ascertained the difficulty in applying the law disappeared. The facts in that case were as follows: The mast of a ship had by a storm been reduced to such a state that it was merely worthless wreckage; in this condition it incumbered the deck and constituted a common danger; it was therefore cut adrift and thrown overboard. The question was whether the shipowner could claim contribution, and it was held that he could not, because the thing thrown away was already worthless. It the arguments are examined, it will be seen that it was conceded that to constitute a claim to general average the thing sacrificed must be of some actual or potential value at the time of the sacrifice, and both Bramwell and Brett, L.JJ., in their judgments make the point clear and place it beyond doubt. The former said: "Where the thing destroyed had some peculiar condition attached to it so that it will be lost, whether the whole adventure be saved or not, then its destruction cannot be deemed a sacrifice." And Brett, L.J., said: "When, whether the act relied upon as an act of sacrifice had been done or not, the thing in respect of which contribution is claimed would, by reason of its own state or condition have been of no value whatever, or would certainly or absolutely have been lost to the owner although the rest of the adventure had been saved, there is nothing lost to the owner by the act, and therefore there is nothing sacrificed—that is to say, there is no sacrifice."

Mr. Carver relied upon the case of Pirie v. Middle Dock Co. That was a case in which the ship was carrying a cargo of coal to Singapore. During the voyage a fire broke out in the coals, and water was poured upon the burning portion to put out the fire. This water wetted the remainder of the coal. The vessel put into a port of refuge, and it was there discovered that the whole of the coal not affected by the fire was so damaged by the saturation with water that it was practically impossible to forward it to its destination. The voyage was therefore abandoned, and the question was whether the consequent loss of freight should be contributed to on general average. The answer turned on the construction of one point only, which is clearly stated by the learned judge (Watkin Williams, J.) in his judgment: "It seems to me that the only question on the case is whether the operation of pouring the water on the coals and so rendering them unfit to be forwarded to their destination, causing a total loss of the freight to be earned by the delivery at their destination, can be considered as a voluntary sacrifice of the freight of the coals so wetted within the true principles of general average." Apparently it had been argued at the bar that the case was not one of general average, because there was in fact no sacrifice of cargo and its incidental freight, inasmuch as the cargo, having taken fire, was practically already lost, past redemption. Having stated this contention, the learned judge proceeded to deal with it. He disposed of it, however, not by applying any principle of law, but by finding as a fact that the pouring of the water on the burning coal involved a sacrifice of the freight on the remainder of the coal: see the end of his judgment. In other words, he found that at the time of the general average act the freight of the coals which was not burning might still possibly have been earned, and was therefore not, as contended, already lost. The argument was thus disposed of on a finding of fact. When properly examined, the judgment of the learned judge seems to me to be an authority against the defendants in the present case, because in dealing with the conditions which must concur in order to give rise to a claim for contribution, he says that the sacrifice "must be a real sacrifice, and not a mere destruction or casting off of that which had become already lost, and consequently of no value." He thus admitted the correctness of counsel's contention as to the law; but, as I have pointed out, he so found the facts as to make the contention inapplicable to the case.

I was also referred to the American case of the Columbian Insurance Co. v. Ashby. In that case the ship had been voluntarily stranded. The act was done for the safety of the crew and of the vessel and cargo. The vessel could not be got off the bank, she was totally lost, and so the adventure was frustrated. The argument apparently was that the sacrifice, to come within the rules applying to general average, must be a sacrifice which benefits all the interests at stake, and that, therefore, a sacrifice which results in the total destruction of one of these interests is not the subject of contribution. Storey, J., disposes of the argument. He says: "Surely the question of contribution cannot depend upon the amount of damage sustained by the sacrifice, for that would be to say that if a man lost all his property for the common benefit he should receive nothing, but if he lost part only he should receive full compensation"; and he goes on to point out that it is the safety of the property, and not the voyage, which constitutes the true foundation of general average, and that, therefore, the fact that the general average act had the effect of putting an end to the voyage was immaterial. I did not understand Mr. Walton to contend that the fact of the loss of the whole freight took the present case out of the scope of general average, and if he did not so contend I do not see how the American authority affects the consideration of the question now before the court. If, however, he did so contend, it is sufficient for me to say that I do not agree with him. I believe the English law on this point to be the same as that laid down by Storey, J. In the American case it was further decided that, the freight having been totally lost by the voluntary stranding and consequent total loss of the vessel, the freight so lost should form the subject of contribution. This ruling does not, however, in any way affect the decision of the case in hand; the freight was an existing valuable property at the time of the stranding, and was sacrificed by the general average act. The conclusion I have come to is that at the time the master abandoned the voyage the freight was already hopelessly lost, and cannot, therefore, be said to have been sacrificed at all.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Nov. 4.

DAGLISH v. BARTON. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Court of Appeal—Application to Divisional Court to set aside judgment of official referee—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1 (5).

Where an action has been tried before an official referee, and an application is made to a Divisional Court to set aside the judgment of the official referee, the decision of the Divisional Court is final, and there is no appeal to the Court of Appeal without leave.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Darling and Phillimore, JJ.).

The action was tried before an official referee, who gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant applied to the Divisional Court, asking that the findings of the official referee might be varied and judgment entered accordingly, or for a new trial. The Divisional Court remitted the case to the official referee for reconsideration and determination.

The plaintiff appealed.

Edward Bray (R. M. Bray, Q.C., with him), for the defendant, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay to the Court of Appeal. By section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894, "In all cases where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court or person, the appeal shall be heard and determined by a Divisional Court constituted as may be prescribed by rules of court, and the determination thereof shall be final, unless leave to appeal is given by that court or by the Court of Appeal." The defendant's application to the Divisional Court was an appeal to the High Court from a court or person, and therefore the decision of the Divisional Court was final.

F. A. Greer, for the plaintiff.—The application to the Divisional Court was not an appeal to the High Court. It was a motion to the High Court to set aside a judgment of the High Court.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The case was tried by the official referee. The defendant, being dissatisfied with the way in which the official referee dealt with it, went to the Divisional Court—which was the only court he could go to—and asked that court to set the matter right. The plaintiff now says that that application to the Divisional Court was not an appeal to the High Court within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894. The argument is that the official referee is the High Court, and that the application to the Divisional Court was not an appeal, but a motion to the High Court to set aside a judgment of the High Court. The official referee is an arm of the High Court, but he is not the High Court itself, and it seems to me that the defendant appealed to the High Court; and further he had a right to appeal, for he certainly required no leave. In my judgment this case comes within the words "in all cases where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court or person." The official referee is clearly either a court or a person. Therefore the decision of the High Court is final, and there is no appeal to this court without leave.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I do not dissent, but I do not think the matter quite so clear as it appears to my brother. I hesitate to say that a motion to a Divisional Court to set aside a judgment which has been directed to be entered by an official referee is, strictly speaking, an appeal. The official referee is part of the machinery of the High Court, to try questions which are not convenient to be tried in court, and when he directs a judgment to be entered, that judgment is not his judgment, but it is entered as a judgment of the High Court by an officer of the court. I doubt whether a motion to a Divisional Court to set aside such judgment is really an appeal, but I think that in substance it is an appeal within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and that the intention of the Legislature is that, where a case is tried before an official referee and is then brought before a Divisional Court, there is no appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court. In such a case the Divisional Court is constituted the Court of Appeal.

ROBERTS v. GWYRFAI DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Water supply—District council—Riparian owner—River—Water rights—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 51, 332.

A local authority has no power either as a riparian owner or under the Public Health Act, 1875, to affect the flow of a stream for the purpose of supplying its district with water if the rights of a lower riparian owner are thereby infringed, even though such riparian owner sustained no actual damage.

This an appeal from a decision of Kekewich J. (reported 47 W. R. 376, [1899] 1 Ch. 583).

The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of a water-mill in the parish of Llanllyfni, in the county of Carnarvon. He claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the natural flow of the stream that worked his mill. The stream in question flowed from a lake called Llyn Cwmdulyn, situate at the foot of a mountain some distance above the mill.

The defendants had obtained from the Crown a lease of the lake and also a lease of adjoining land, and in May, 1893, they gave the plaintiff notice of their intention to take water from the lake to supply their district, and applied to him for his written consent thereto under section 332 of the Public Health Act, 1875; but he refused to give such consent. The defendants, without any further notice, laid down pipes and constructed a dam across the end of the lake so as to increase the water storage. A sluice was placed in the dam to regulate the outflow of the stream. The defendants offered to allow a sufficient outflow to work the plaintiff's mill. The plaintiff, however, claimed that he was entitled to the uninterrupted flow of the water past his mill.

Kekewich, J., granted the injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and H. Courthope Munroe, for the appeal.—Under section 51 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the defendants have a right to make a reservoir subject only to the restriction contained in section 332 of the Act that they shall not "injuriously affect" the stream. Here it is admitted that the plaintiff will have a supply of water as good as, if not better than, before. If the Act does not give the defendants the right to do what they have done, they rely on their rights as riparian owners. The defendants are not claiming an absolute right, but only a right to go on so long as they do no damage to anyone. Even if they have no right, the court will not interfere by injunction unless the lower riparian proprietors sustain damage.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The case has taken a turn which is a little unusual; but I think I see through the rights of the parties, which we have to consider, and which is all we have to consider.

First of all, what are the rights of the parties? The right of the plaintiff as proprietor and owner of this mill is to have the water come down that river, which takes its origin from this lake, in the accustomed way. That is his right, and that is subject to the rights of the persons who are riparian proprietors above him. Subject to those rights there is no right whatever to alter the flow of the water in the old accustomed way. To say that the persons who alter the old flow improve the old flow is a matter of opinion. They have no right to interfere with the accustomed flow of the water.

Now, these defendants are certainly doing that. How do they justify it? First of all as riparian proprietors. It seems to me as riparian proprietors it is impossible to justify what they are doing. Whether you take the measure of their rights as stated by Lord Kingsdown in that very excellent judgment in Miner v. Gilmour (7 W. R. 328, 12 Moore P. C. Cas. 131), or whether you take it in some of the later cases in which that exposition of the law has been more or less adopted and expanded, it does not seem to me to matter. These defendants, apart from all statutory powers, are not exercising the rights of riparian proprietors at all. They are diverting the water from this lake, not for their own purposes, not for the use either ordinary or extraordinary of the land of which they are owners, but for a totally different purpose: supplying townships some distance off. That is no exercise of the right of a riparian proprietor within the meaning of the law laid down in the cases to which I have referred, and if we look at the case of the Swindon Waterworks Co. v. Wilts and Berks Canal Navigation Co. we find that Lord Cairns alludes to the distinction. He says: "I think your lordships will find that in the present case you have no difficulty in saying whether the use which has been made of the water by the upper owner comes under the range of those authorities which deal with cases such as I have supposed, cases of irrigation and cases of manufacture. These were cases where the use made of the stream by the upper owner has been for purposes connected with the tenement of the upper owner. But the use which here has been made by the appellants of the water and the use which they claim the right to make of it is not for the purpose of their tenements at all, but is a use which virtually amounts to a complete diversion of the stream—as great a diversion as if they had changed the entire watershed of the country, and in place of allowing the stream to flow towards the south, had altered it near its source so as to make it flow towards the north," and so on. Then he says that the use being made by the waterworks company there, is not a use by them in the exercise of their rights as riparian proprietors, but for a totally different purpose. So it is here. Therefore I take it the defendants cannot justify what they are doing under the common law doctrine as to riparian owners. They are far exceeding any rights which can be based upon that ground.

Now let us look and see how they justify it under the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 51 enables them to make waterworks, subject to the provisions contained in section 332 as to not injuring other people. Let us first see what they say. Mr. Renshaw, I think, has very fairly claimed the right to do it either as riparian proprietor or under the Public Health Act, but in neither way, it strikes me, can they acquire the right or assert the right to alter the flow of the water to the injury of the rights of other people. Mr. Courthope

Munroe says at once, "I do not claim to do it; but you, the plaintiff, have no right to complain." But that depends entirely upon whether the rights of the plaintiff are infringed or not. It strikes me they are infringed, for the reason that although Mr. Munroe's view is that they have no claim to do what they have done, they have in fact most materially altered the flow of the water to which the plaintiff is entitled. His rights are infringed by a person who admits he has no right to do it, and unless the infringer goes on to say that he is prepared to stop, the injunction goes almost as a matter of course. That is warranted by what Lord Cairns says (at p. 705, 7 H. L. Cas.) in the Swindon case. I do not appreciate the difference between claiming a right to do a thing and saying, "I have no right to do it, but I intend to go on." If there is any difference it is rather against the man who admits that he has no right but insists on doing what he admits to be wrong. In Lord Cairns' observations the reply to the case set up is that the appellants did claim a right, and he says that after that claim of right "it appears to me that it is impossible that the court can do otherwise than decide the issue which is thus raised between the parties. It is a matter quite immaterial whether as riparian owners of Wayte's tenement any injury has now been sustained or has not been sustained by the respondents. If the appellants are right they would, at the end of twenty years, by the exercise of this claim of diversion entirely defeat the incident of the property: the riparian right of Wayte's tenement." Now, what are we to say to a man who says "I have no right to do this, but intend to go on all the same." If he is infringing the plaintiff's right it is the duty of the court to interfere to protect the plaintiff. There is no duty of the court that I know of which it is more important to observe, and no power of the court which it is more important to enforce, than the power it has of keeping public bodies within their rights. The moment public bodies exceed their right, they do so to the injury and oppression of private people, and those private people are entitled to be protected from injury owing to those operations of public bodies. So far I feel no difficulty at all. It has been suggested that the injunction ought to be qualified by putting in "so as not to injure the plaintiff," but if the plaintiff's rights are infringed and if the defendants intend to infringe them I do not see the necessity or the advisability of putting in those words at all. On the other hand I see this, that these defendants are doing what they say they were justified in doing and what they are quite entitled to do by the necessities of the case. But there is a proper method of obtaining power to do this. There is not the slightest doubt about it. That is, to go to Parliament for authority to do it. They say they cannot do that in this case. That is very likely; but it is a very common thing for public bodies to bring in Bills although they have no power to pay the expenses. But there are methods of escaping from that difficulty, and if they choose to say they will attempt to go to Parliament in order to obtain a Bill to authorize them to do what they are doing, and it is for the benefit of the plaintiff, of course we should suspend the injunction. What I propose to do is this, with the sanction of my brethren: to dismiss this appeal with costs; do not draw up the order for a fortnight, and if at the end of the fortnight we are told that the defendants desire to go to Parliament, then stay the operation of the injunction for six months to give them an opportunity. We have not the slightest objection to putting in that. On the other hand, it is our bounden duty to see that they do not exceed their right. That is the order.

REG. v. NICHOLSON. (a.)

Licensing law — Licence — Premises pulled down for public improvement—Application for licence for other premises—Notices, sufficiency of—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 14—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), s. 7—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 40.

The holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors on and off the premises in respect of a house which was about to be pulled down for the purpose of a public improvement, applied to the justices in special sessions, under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, for a similar licence in respect of other premises not theretofore licensed. The applicant had satisfied all the requirements of section 14 as to the giving of notices, but not the provisions of section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Held, that the notices were sufficient; that the express provisions of section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, as to notices are not repealed, either expressly or impliedly, by section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Darling and Channell, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi, obtained by William Bamber and others for a mandamus to the justices of the county borough of Bolton to hold a special licensing sessions as by adjournment from the 26th of January, 1899, and proceed to hear and determine according to law an application by one James Paisley for a licence to sell by retail intoxicating liquors to be consumed either on or off the premises, at premises known as Halliwell Lodge, Chorley New-road, Bolton.

The facts were as follows: James Paisley was the holder of a licence to sell by retail all intoxicating liquors on or off the premises in respect of a house known as the "Rope and Anchor," Bolton. That house being about to be pulled down for the purposes of the improvement of a highway, Paisley applied, under section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, at a special session of the justices for the borough of Bolton, held on the 26th of January, 1899, for a similar licence for new premises acquired by him, and known as Halliwell Lodge, Chorley New-road, Bolton. On January 18, 1899, notice in writing had been given to the chief constable and to the overseers of the poor of Bolton of Paisley's intention to make this application. On Sunday, the 22nd of January, a notice to the same effect had been posted on the door of Bolton parish church from 1 a.m. till 5 p.m., and on the front door of Halliwell Lodge. The justices heard the application and evidence in support of it, and they were informed that the notices and requirements provided by the Alehouse Act, 1828, had been given and complied with. There was no opposition to the application, and no objection was taken by anyone to the sufficiency of the notices. The justices granted the application. The rule nisi for a mandamus was obtained on the 3rd of March, the prosecutors being persons resident in the neighbourhood of Halliwell Lodge, who said that they had no knowledge of the application until after it had been granted in consequence of the proper notices not having been given; that the case was one of a removal of a licence from one set of premises to another, and that the case must as regards notices be treated as an application for a new licence, and that, therefore, under section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, a twenty-one days' notice and an advertisement in a local paper were requisite.

The Divisional Court were of opinion that the proper notices had not been given, but that mandamus ought not to be granted, because the justices had heard and determined the application. The court therefore discharged the rule.

Subsequently to this decision, on the 17th of May, an application was made to the Divisional Court, consisting of the same judges, for a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash the licence granted by the justices on the 26th of January. The Divisional Court refused the application, holding, on the authority of Reg. v. Sharman, 46 W. R. 367, [1898] 1 Q. B. 578, that certiorari would not issue to licensing justices. On the 30th of May a similar application was made to the Court of Appeal, and was granted. The arguments on the appeal from the refusal of the Divisional Court to grant the mandamus, and as to the making absolute of the rule nisi for a certiorari, were heard together in the Court of Appeal.

9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14: ". . . If any house being kept as an inn by any person duly licensed as aforesaid shall be or be about to be pulled down or occupied under the provisions of any Act for the improvement of the highways or for any other public purpose . . . it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid at a special session, holden under the authority of this Act, for the division or place in which the house so kept or having been kept shall be situate . . . to grant to the person whose house shall as aforesaid have been or shall be about to be pulled down or occupied for the improvement of the highways, or for any other public purpose . . . and who shall open and keep as an inn some other fit and convenient house, a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed therein. Provided always, that every such licence shall continue in force only from the day on which it shall be granted until the 5th day of April or the 10th day of October then next ensuing as the case may be. Provided also that every person intending to apply in any of the above-mentioned cases at any such special session for a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed in a house or premises thereunto belonging in which exciseable liquors shall not have been sold by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises by virtue of a licence granted at the general annual licensing meeting next before such special session, shall on some one Sunday within the six weeks next before such special session, at some time between the hours of ten in the forenoon and of four in the afternoon, affix or cause to be affixed on the door of such house and on the door of the church or chapel of the parish or place in which such house shall be situate, and where there shall be no church or chapel on some other public and conspicuous place within such parish or place, such and the like notice as is hereinbefore directed to be affixed by every person intending to apply at the general annual licensing meeting for a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed in a house not theretofore kept as an inn, and shall in like manner serve copies of the said notice on one of the overseers of the poor and on one of the constables or other peace officers of such parish or place."

32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 7: "Every person intending to apply to the justices for a certificate under this Act shall, twenty-one days at least before he applies, give notice in writing of his intention to one of the overseers of the parish, township, or place in which the house or shop in respect of which his application is to be made is situate, and to some constable or peace officer acting within such parish, township, or place, and shall in such notice set forth his name and address, and a description of the licence or licences for which he intends to apply, and of the situation of the house or shop in respect of which the application is to be made; and in the case of a house or shop not theretofore licensed for the sale, by retail, of beer, cider, or wine, such person shall also within the space of twenty-eight days before such application is made cause a like notice to be affixed and maintained between the hours of ten in the morning and five in the afternoon of two consecutive Sundays on the door of such house or shop, and on the principal door or one of the doors of the church or chapel of the parish or place in which such house or shop is situate, or, if there be no such church or chapel, on some other public and conspicuous place within such parish or place."

35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 40: "Every person intending to apply for a new licence or to apply for the transfer of a licence shall publish notice of such application as follows—that is to say,

"(1) In the case of a new licence he shall cause notice thereof to be given and to be affixed and maintained in manner directed by section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and any enactment amending the same, and shall advertise such notice in some paper circulating in the place in which the premises to which the notice relates are situate on some day not more than four and not less than two weeks before the proposed application, and on such day or days, if any, as may be from time to time fixed by the licensing justices; (2) "In the case of the transfer of a licence he shall, fourteen days prior to one of the special sessions appointed by the justices for granting transfers of such licences, serve a notice of his intention to transfer the same upon one of the overseers of the parish township, or place in which the premises in respect of which his application is to be made are situate and on the superintendent of the police of the district. This notice shall be signed by the applicant or by his authorized agent, and shall set forth the name of the person to whom it is intended that such licence shall be transferred, together with the place of his residence, and his trade or calling during the six months preceding the time of serving such notice." . . . "The provisions of this section as to notices shall extend to all cases where, under the Intoxicating Liquors Act, 1828," i.e., the Alehouse Act, 1828, "notices are required to be served in a like form to or in the same form as notices for a new licence."

Avery and Llewellyn Williams, for the appellants.—The notices were bad, and the justices acted without jurisdiction in granting the licence. Section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, provides that in the case of applications under that section "such and the like" notices are to be given as in the case of an application under section 10 of the same Act for a new licence. Section 10 was repealed by the Licensing Act, 1872. Section 40, sub-section 1, of that Act, and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, now contain the provisions as to notices in the case of applications under section 14 of the Act of 1828. Those provisions have not been complied with. Sub-section 2 of section 40 of the Act of 1872, which deals with applications for a transfer of a licence, does not apply to the case of an application under section 14 of the Act of 1828; such an application is not one for "the/a transfer of a licence" as defined by section 74 of the Act of 1872. The notices being bad the justices had no jurisdiction to grant the application, and under these circumstances certiorari will lie. In consequence of the decision of the House of Lords in Boulter v. Justices of Kent, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556, that licensing justices are not a court of summary jurisdiction, it was held by a Divisional Court in Reg. v. Sharman, 46 W. R. 367, [1898] 1 Q. B. 578, that certiorari will not lie to licensing justices, and that case was followed in the Divisional Court in Reg. v. Bowman, [1898] 1 Q. B. 663, 46 W. R. Dig. 83, and Reg. v. Cotham, 46 W. R. 512, [1898] 1 Q. B. 802. Those decisions are wrong, and ought not to be followed. Certiorari will lie to a body such as licensing justices, which, although not a court in the strict sense of the word, nevertheless exercises judicial or quasi-judicial functions as distinguished from purely ministerial functions.

They referred to Sharp v. Wakefield, 39 W. R. 561, [1891] A. C. 173; Reg. v. James, 11 J. P. 837, 12 ib. 262; Reg. v. Aberdare Canal Co., 14 Q. B. 854; Reg. v. Sulford Overseers, 18 ib. 687; Corner's Crown Practice (ed. 1844), p. 50; Reg. v. Watermens Company, [1897] 1 Q. B. 659, 45 W. R. Dig. 22; Reg. v. Justices of Manchester, 47 W. R. 410, [1899] 1 Q. B. 571; Laceby v. Lacon, 47 W. R. 497, [1899] A. C. 222.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C. (C. W. Mathews and Guy Stephenson with him), for the respondents.—The application in this case under section 14 of the Act of 1828 was not for a new licence or for the transfer of a licence, but for a protective or emergency licence. Section 14 provides what notices are to be given in such a case and the manner in which they are to be published. The words "such and the like notice," which refer back to section 10, only apply to the form of the notice, not to the time within which it must be given, or the manner of publication. The repeal of section 10 did not involve the repeal of section 14, the provisions of which are still subsisting, and having been complied with in this case the notices were sufficient. Assuming, however, the notices are bad, and, assuming also that certiorari will lie to licensing justices, the circumstances of the present case are such that the committee in the exercise of that discretion, which it undoubtedly has, will not direct the writ to issue. The prosecutors are not persons directly or immediately aggrieved (see Rex. v. Justices of Middlesex, 3 B. & Ad. 938), and, further, there has been great delay on their part in coming to the court.

Avery, in reply, cited Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, L. R. 5 Q. B. 466, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 48, on the question whether the prosecutors were persons aggrieved.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case we have to deal with the application for a writ of certiorari, a rule nisi having been granted by this court after its refusal by a Divisional Court, and also with an appeal from a decision of the same Divisional Court discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus.

I will first deal with the question whether on the application for what has been called an emergency licence the proper notices were given. That question depends on the construction to be placed on the provisions of section 14 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. The legislation we have to consider is very intricate owing to the introduction of provisoes in subsequent Acts of Parliament. Section 14 deals with several matters which may happen before the expiration of a licence, and, amongst others, with the case of licensed premises which are pulled down for the purpose of public improvements. In such a case the section provides that it shall be lawful for the justices at a special session to grant to the person whose premises have been so pulled down, and who is desirous of opening other premises as a public-house, a licence in respect of those new premises to continue till the 10th of October next. Then there is a proviso as to the notices to be given by the person intending to apply for a licence in respect of premises which have not previously been licensed. The section provides that the person shall on some one Sunday within six weeks before the special session at some time between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. affix a notice to the door of the house in question and to the door of the parish church, and shall also serve a copy of the notice upon the overseers and constable of the parish. In my opinion that provision regulates the time when and the manner in which the notice is to be given. The second part of the proviso deals with the form of the notice; it is to be "such and the like notice as is hereinbefore directed to be affixed by every person intending to apply at the general annual licensing meeting for a licence." That refers one back to section 10 of the same Act, and if the matter stopped there, there would have been no difficulty, because everything was done by the applicant for the licence to satisfy the requirements of the section. But it is said that section 40 of the Licensing Act, 1872, provides different requirements as to notices in the case of an application for an emergency licence, and that those requirements have not been complied with. In my opinion section 40 leaves untouched the emergency cases dealt with by section 14 of the Act of 1828. Section 40 says that every person intending to apply for a new licence or for the transfer of a licence shall publish notice of such application in the manner provided by the section. That does not touch cases of applications under section 14 of the Act of 1828, because these cases are not applications for a "new licence" or for the "transfer of a licence" as defined by section 74 of the Act of 1872. Section 40, however, contains the following proviso: "The provisions of this section as to notices shall extend to all cases where, under the Intoxicating Liquors Act, 1828, notices are required to be served in like form to or in the same manner as notices for new licences." It has already been pointed out that it is only as regards the form of the notice, and not as regards the manner in which the notice is to be given, that the provisions as to notices in the case of applications for new licences are applicable to applications in emergency cases under section 14. If that is so, then section 40 of the Act of 1872 does not apply to cases under section 14 because it only applies where notices are to given in like form or in the same manner as notices for new licences. No question arises as to the form of the notices in this case, and if the manner in which they were given was right, I cannot say that the justices acted without jurisdiction—that is, on insufficient notices. I think therefore that the certiorari should be refused.

I only wish to add, that assuming certiorari to be the proper remedy, I do not think that in this case, as a matter of discretion, certiorari ought to go. In the first place I think that the application comes too late, as it was not made until nearly four months after the licence was granted. Secondly, the affidavits do not show that the appellants have any peculiar and distinct grievance of their own, as they ought to have shown according to Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, but are only aggrieved in common with the rest of the public.

The rule for a certiorari will therefore be discharged, and it becomes unnecessary to consider the appeal as to the mandamus, which will be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the applicants (the present appellants) are not entitled to certiorari unless they can satisfy us that that something was done by the justices, in respect of granting the licence, beyond their jurisdiction. It is also quite clear that the applicants are not entitled to certiorari as of right, for the court has a discretion in a case like this with regard to the issue of the writ.

Now, a good deal has been said in the course of the argument in this case as to whether the applicants are persons who are aggrieved by what has been done. This is not a case in which any statute provides that the person applying for the writ of certiorari should be a person aggrieved. It is only one of those cases in which, by the practice of the court, it has been always insisted upon that the person applying must be a person aggrieved. There are two senses in which the expression "an aggrieved person" is used. Sometimes the question arises when the applicant is entitled to the writ as of right, ex debito justitiae. I do not think that anyone could contend that the facts disclosed by the affidavits in this case show that the applicants are aggrieved persons in the sense that they are entitled to the writ ex debito justitiae. If the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Justices of Surrey is looked at, it will be seen that he deals with the matter from that point of view, and he gives, as an illustration of a person aggrieved in that sense, a person who has been deprived of an office by the authority of the court. Such a person is entitled to the writ as a matter of right. There is no pretence of saying that the applicants in this case are persons aggrieved in that sense. But, besides the case of an aggrieved person who is entitled to the writ as a matter of right, there are aggrieved persons who are entitled to the writ in the discretion of the court. In that case the court has to consider whether, having regard to the interest of the applicant, there is sufficient ground for the issue of the writ. I do not think that the applicants here have made out such a case as would entitle them to induce the court to exercise their discretion by making the rule absolute. There is another matter which has to be considered in considering the exercise of the court's discretion. Having regard to the fact that a very considerable time elapsed after the granting of the licence before the application for the writ of certiorari was made, that in August the time will come round for the renewal of the application with an opportunity of then objecting to it, and that this is a matter in respect to which the justices have to act on an emergency, and make such provision as they best can for preventing an injustice, I do not think that this is a case for the exercise of its discretion by the court in favour of the applicants.

With regard to the question whether the notices were in fact wrong, there is no doubt that the whole of this legislation is very difficult to construe. Section 14 of the Act of 1828 deals with applications which may be made in cases of death, change of occupancy, and other contingencies. The proviso to the section sets out what notices are to be given, and how they they are to be published, and what form they are to be in, but unfortunately with regard to the form, instead of stating the form in so many words it does so only by reference to section 10, where the matter is expressly provided for, If the Act of 1828 stood alone, and was in no way affected by subsequent legislation, no complaint could have been made with regard to the notices given in this case. It is said, however, that the proviso at the end of section 40 of the Act of 1872 is intended to refer to the notices which are referred to in section 14 of the Act of 1828. I agree that that is so, but then one has to ascertain how far that proviso is to be treated as repealing section 14 of the Act of 1828. There is no pretence of saying that there is anything in that proviso or anywhere in the Act of 1872 expressly repealing the provisions of section 14, and therefore in my judgment when one comes to apply the proviso to notices under the Act of 1828 it must not be so applied as to make it interfere with any of the express provisions of the earlier Act. I suggested the question in the course of the argument whether, there being in section 14 an express provision as to affixing the notice to the church door on one Sunday, that was altered by the combined operation of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, s. 7, and the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 40, to a provision for the publication on two Sundays, and Mr. Avory was constrained to admit that the publication on two Sundays could not be substituted for the one Sunday. That is, I think, the right principle, and the principle which I intend to apply when I ask myself the question how far the section 40 of the Act of 1872 has added new obligations to those imposed by section 14 of the earlier Act. My answer is that there are no new obligations in any case in which the matter is found to be expressly dealt with in the earlier Act. It is said that if that principle is applied the proviso in section 40 is rendered a mere nullity, and the legislation of no effect. I do not assent to that. If the provisions of section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, are compared with those of sections 10 and 14 of the Act of 1828 it will be seen that they are not identical —for instance, in the form of application, and any one matter to which the proviso can apply is sufficient to do away with the argument that it is reduced to a nullity by adopting the principle of construction which I have indicated. Taking these matters into consideration the affidavits in this case do not satisfy me that there was anything left undone in the matter of the notices, which was a matter provided for by the Act of 1872, and was not a matter expressly provided for by section 14 of the Act of 1828.

I only wish to add a few words with regard to the conditions which are requisite for the application for a writ of certiorari. I do not think that it is essential that the record to be brought up must be the record of a court, or that an order to be brought up must be an order of persons exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions. I think that it will be found that there are other cases in which the remedy by certiorari is available. It is not necessary, however, to decide that point in this case, and I only wish to guard myself against being taken to have assented to the proposition that has been put forward.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Nov. 8.

BASCHET v. THE LONDON ILLUSTRATED STANDARD CO. AND OTHERS. (a.)

Copyright—Artistic copyright—Infringement by printer who is mere agent—Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 68), s. 6—International copyright—Infringement—Nature of remedies—International Copyright Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 33), s. 2, sub-section 3—Minimum penalty—Costs.

Printers who infringe artistic copyright, though only as mere agents, are equally liable with their principals to penalties under section 6 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862. An owner of international copyright is not restricted under section 2, sub-section 3, of the International Copyright Act, 1886, in case of infringement in a foreign country, to the remedies available for infringement in the country of origin. A farthing is the minimum penalty that will be inflicted in a court of justice. Where in an action for infringement of copyright the defendant is guilty of infringement, but the plaintiff is held not to be entitled to any remedy in a court of equity because of his own misconduct, the action will be dismissed without costs.

Trial of action.

This was an action against the London Illustrated Standard Co. (Limited) for an injunction to restrain them from causing to be printed copies of seven photographs, pictures, or works of art, the property of the plaintiff; and against the Temple Press (Limited) to restrain them from printing copies of the said seven photographs; and against the other defendants for an injunction to restrain them from selling and distributing copies of the same. The plaintiff also claimed an account and delivery up of all copies unlawfully dealt with, penalties, damages, and costs. It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff was the owner according to French law of the copyright in seven photographs, pictures, or works of art, originally published in Paris. These seven photographs had been printed and published in the paper called the London Illustrated Standard, and sold and delivered, by the several defendants respectively. It appeared that 20,000 copies of each of the said seven photographs had thus been printed, published, sold, and distributed.

On the 30th of May, 1899, an interlocutory injunction was granted against all the defendants by Kekewich, J. On appeal this injunction was confirmed as to five of the photographs by the Court of Appeal, but was dismissed in the case of the other two on the ground of their indecency. On the action now coming on for trial before Kekewich, J., it was admitted that as to the five photographs the injunction must be made perpetual. It was also admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to damages against all the defendants. Two important points, however, on the question of penalties, arose for the decision of the court.

By section 6 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, it is enacted that "If the author of any painting, drawing, or photograph in which there shall be subsisting copyright, after having sold or disposed of such copyright, or if any other person, not being the proprietor for the time being of copyright in any painting, drawing, or photograph, shall, without the consent of such proprietor, repeat, copy, colourably imitate, or otherwise multiply for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution, or cause or procure to be repeated, copied, colourably imitated, or otherwise multiplied for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution any such work or the design thereof, or, knowing that any such repetition, copy, or other imitation has been unlawfully made, shall import into any part of the United Kingdom, or sell, publish, let to hire, exhibit, or distribute, or offer for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution, or cause or procure to be imported, sold, published, let to hire, distributed, or offered for sale, hire, exhibition, or distribution, any repetition, copy, or imitation of the said work, or of the design thereof, made without such consent as aforesaid, such person for every such offence shall forfeit to the proprietor of the copyright for the time being a sum not exceeding £10." By section 2, sub-section 3, of the International Copyright Act, 1886, it is enacted that "the International Copyright Acts and an order made thereunder shall not confer on any person any greater right or longer term of copyright in any work than that enjoyed in the foreign country in which such work was first produced." By article 2 of the Berne Convention of 1887, which includes England and France, it is declared that "authors of any of the countries of the union . . . shall enjoy in the other countries for their works . . . the rights which the respective laws do now or may hereafter grant to natives. The enjoyment of these rights is subject to the accomplishment of the conditions and formalities prescribed by law in the country of origin of the work, and cannot exceed in the other countries the term of protection accorded in the said country of origin."

Warrington, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the plaintiff.—Under section 6 of the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, there is no need for the plaintiff, in order to recover penalties, to prove scienter in the case of the printers and publishers. Both are included in the section. The Temple Press have clearly "repeated, copied, colourably imitated, or multiplied for sale" the photographs in question. Equally clearly the Illustrated Standard Co. have "caused or procured" the said photographs to be "repeated, copied," &c. The two classes are inserted in the section with a view to distinguishing between those who actually print, or print and publish, themselves, and those who, though they publish, yet do not themselves print, but get the printing done by someone else. But those who print at somebody else's request are certainly meant to be included. The penalty for "each offence" is not to exceed £10; and "each offence" means each copy of the photograph: Graves v. Beale, Ex parte Beale, 16 W. R. 852, L. R. 3 Q. B 387; Ellis v. Marshall, 64 L. T. Rep. 757. It is suggested in the case of international copyright, that by section 2, sub-section 3, of the International Copyright Act, 1886, the plaintiff is restricted to such remedies as he would have had if the infringement had taken place in France. He is entitled on the contrary to the remedies given in this country for breach of copyright. The question turns on the wording of the section. The words "greater right or longer term" refer only to the substance and amount of the copyright—e.g., if in France the plaintiff were entitled only to restrain fraudulent infringement, his right in this country would be similarly limited. The words are not intended to put a limit on his remedies. This interpretation is sustained by the terms of the Berne Convention, which we are justified in referring to because of the preamble to the Act of 1886.

Renshaw, Q.C., and H. S. Simmons, for all the defendants except one distributor.—Section 6 of the

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act of 1862 is not meant to include those who have printed merely as agents. The distinction between the two first classes of infringers therein mentioned is the distinction between principals who infringe directly by their own act, and principals who infringe by an agent. But the agents themselves are not meant to be included. Penalties therefore do not lie against the Temple Press. As to section 2, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1886, the plaintiff is thereby limited to the remedies open to him in case of infringement in his own country. If the section had been meant to have the meaning put on it by the plaintiffs, the words "greater right" would not have been used. A "right" may be the right to an injunction, to penalties, to delivery up, to damages. It cannot possibly be restricted to the quantity or substance of the copyright. We are entitled, therefore, in accordance with French law, to escape with a single penalty for all our offences. If, however, the court construes the section against us and awards the plaintiff damages for each pirated copy, the court is not bound to take a farthing as the lowest possible measure of damages. Any fraction of a penny may be taken.

MacSwinney, for the remaining distributor, who had come to an arrangement with the plaintiff.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case the Court of Appeal have practically left only a few isolated points for my decision. It is admitted that in the case of five out of the seven photographs my injunction must now be made perpetual. There remains the important question of penalties. As against those defendants who were merely distributors, it is admitted that no penalties can be inflicted. Section 6 of the Act of 1862 says plainly that such persons shall only be liable to penalties when they have acted, "knowing that any such repetition, copy, &c., has been unlawfully made." Here there is no evidence of any such knowledge, and they cannot accordingly be held liable. With regard, however, to the other two sets of defendants, it is contended that both are liable—both the London Illustrated Standard Co., who have published, and the Temple Press, who have simply printed, the five photographs. With regard to the London Illustrated Standard Co.—reserving for the moment a point of law as to the nature of the penalties—the liability is not disputed. As to the Temple Press, on the other hand, the liability is disputed. It is said that they did not act as principals, but merely as the agents of the London Illustrated Standard Co.; and it is said that the section is only meant to include those who have acted as principals. It seems to me that the words of the Act are incapable of bearing that construction. [The learned judge read the section.] It seems to me that the Temple Press, by printing copies of these photographs, have clearly "repeated, copied, colourably imitated, or otherwise multiplied them for sale." I think, therefore, that they are liable in penalties. The Legislature has drawn no such distinction between principals and agents as it is now attempted to set up; and I think it is not my business to struggle against the plain words of the Act.

There remains, however, the point of law as to what those penalties are to be. That must be determined by the view we take of section 2, sub-section 3, of the Act of 1886. [His lordship read the section.] As I understand that section, it comes to this—that a man cannot sue in respect of international copyright unless he first prove to the satisfaction of the court that he would be protected in his own country. A Frenchman, for instance, who has taken out copyright in France, could not sue for a breach of international copyright here in England, unless he first satisfied the English court that he would be entitled to sue in France in case of a breach there. But it is going a long step beyond that to say—as the defendants say—that when he has succeeded in proving his right, he is then to have no further remedies in this country than he would have had in his own land. It would be absurd if I, sitting here as an English judge, were in a position to give him only such remedies as those he might have got in France. We have been told to-day, for instance, that in France an injunction is unknown; but that is no reason why I, as an English judge, am to refuse to grant an injunction. The critical words are, "any greater right or longer term." "Greater right" can only mean "greater right to protection." As for "longer term," the mere fact that it is specified points rather to the fact that there is to be no other limitation than the limitation thus imposed on the term. I think it would be impossible to work two systems of jurisprudence side by side in the way the defendants propose. I am of opinion, therefore, on the construction of the Act, that if the plaintiff can show that he has any remedy at all in France, he is entitled here to such remedies as English courts are in the habit of granting. He is entitled, therefore, to such penalties as I choose to award him not exceeding £10 for each copy. A farthing, if not actually the smallest coin, is the smallest available, and I accordingly fix that as the penalty for each offence.

With regard to costs, I propose to follow the principle laid down in Newman v. Pinto 57 L. T. Rep. 31, 36 W. R. Dig. 204. That was a very flagrant case of imitation on the part of the defendants. The Court of Appeal, however, sitting as a Court of Equity, declined to give the plaintiff any remedy, on the ground of his own false representations—what Bowen, L.J., called "pictorial lies." The action was accordingly dismissed, but, having regard to the flagrant imitation on the part of the defendants, dismissed without costs. I apply that principle here. As to two of the seven pictures in question, the plaintiff has failed on the ground of their indecency; but as there is also no doubt that the defendants have copied these pictures, the action as to those two pictures must be dismissed without costs. The defendants will, therefore, have to pay five-sevenths of the costs of the action.

Vendor and purchaser—Undisclosed restrictive covenant—Notice—Form of conveyance—Summons—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.

A vendor is not entitled to insert in the conveyance to the purchaser restrictive covenants or stipulations not expressly provided for in the contract. In determining such a question upon a summons under section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, it is not within the intention of that section that the court should be influenced by extraneous considerations, such, for instance, as the vendor's right to rescind the contract on the ground of mistake, or the fact that in omitting such restrictive covenants from his conveyance the vendor will be com- mitting a breach of some other contract. The true intention of that section is to provide that distinct and isolated questions between the vendor and purchaser on the matters therein mentioned may be raised and determined in a summary way as and when they arise, and not to enable a general declaration as to title to be made.

Adjourned summons.

This was a purchaser's summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking (inter alia) for a declaration that he was entitled to a conveyance of the premises comprised in the contract free from all incumbrances save and except the restrictive covenant specifically mentioned in the contract.

The facts were as follow: Mrs. Wallis, the vendor, was the owner of the Brownhill-park Estate, near Winchester. By an indenture of lease, dated the 23rd of April, 1895, she leased to the purchaser a piece of land forming part of the estate, and gave him an option, to be exercised within a certain time, of taking a conveyance in fee of the piece of land subject to a certain restrictive covenant therein contained, but otherwise free from incumbrances.

The purchaser exercised the option, but in the draft conveyance the vendor inserted an additional covenant to the effect that the purchaser should not use any of the buildings or permit them to be used as (inter alia) a public-house, beershop, or hotel, or for the sale of any beer, spirits, or other intoxicating liquors, or for any other purpose except that of a private dwelling-house. The vendor insisted upon the inclusion of this covenant in the conveyance on the ground that by an earlier lease of another part of the estate—of which lease she alleged that the purchaser had notice—she had granted to the lessee thereunder the exclusive right of using his premises for such purposes, and had covenanted that all future leases and assurances of other parts of the estate should provide against the land being so used, and the vendor further alleged that the purchaser knew that the whole estate was subject to a building scheme involving the insertion in the conveyance of the restrictive covenants in question. The purchaser denied the allegations, and refused to accept a conveyance containing the additional covenant, and took out the present summons for the determination of the question in dispute.

Renshaw, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the purchaser.—It is contrary to the contract to insert any stipulations in the conveyance. The purchaser is entitled to have a conveyance of the property free from incumbrances: Cato v. Thompson, 9 Q. B. D. 616, 31 W. R. Dig. 210; In re Gloag and Miller's Contract, 31 W. R. 601, 23 Ch. D. 320; and Phillips v. Caldcleugh, 17 W. R. 575, L. R. 4 Q. B. 159.

Warrington, Q.C., and G. B. Freeman, for the vendor.—If the vendor specifically performs this contract she will have to commit a breach of her former covenant, and the court will not grant specific performance of a contract involving the breach of another contract: Willmott v. Barber, 28 W. R. 911, 15 Ch. D. 96. Further, this contract is not valid because the vendor entered into it under a mistake, and that is sufficient to enable her to rescind it: Paget v. Marshall, 33 W. R. 608, 28 Ch. D. 255.

KEKEWICH, J.—The opportunity of again making some remarks on the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, is not ungrateful to me, because I think that our practice is drifting into a wrong channel.

The Vendor and Purchaser Act was passed in order to enable parties to raise and have decided in a summary way questions which otherwise would have to be raised in an action for specific performance. The Act says that either "a vendor or purchaser of real or leasehold estate in England, or their representatives respectively, may at any time or times and from time to time apply in a summary way to a judge of the Court of Chancery in England in chambers in respect of any requisitions or objections, or any claim for compensation, or any other question arising out of or connected with the contract"—I skip the words in brackets—"and the judge shall make such order upon the application as to him shall appear just." Now, the whole frame of that section seems to me to point to the raising in an isolated way of distinct points, and not to the question whether the vendor has shown a good title.

Observe also, that the vendor or purchaser may "from time to time or at any time or times" raise any such points. That, undoubtedly, was the object of the section, and for a very long time this section of the Act was worked on those lines. Lately, however, we have drifted into other forms, and in more recent instances the order of the court has gone to say that the vendor has shown or has not shown a good title. I believe that it was intended that that question should be left for an action for specific performance.

I must speak with bated breath of In re Scott and Alvarez's Contract, 43 W. R. 694, [1895] 1 Ch. 596, [1895] 2 Ch. 603, 43 W. R. Dig. 185, because the Court of Appeal in that case did not agree with me, but I think that the history of that case shows that the practice into which the courts are drifting is a mischievous one.

It seems to me that it would be a very great improvement to restrict these summonses to a distinct question—for instance, whether A. is seised in fee, or whether a disentailing assurance has effectually barred the entail. That, I think, is the general question which the court has to take into consideration, and is what must be borne in mind in this case.

Now here there is no question as to the existence of the contract. Mr. Warrington raises a question as to the validity of the contract, and says there was a mistake. But how can that question arise on this summons? The contract remains until it is rescinded by the court. The statute therefore applies, and I think that the summons properly raises a distinct question, and it asks the court to decide whether there shall or shall not be a particular covenant in the deed of conveyance. Now what is in question? The purchaser contracts to buy under a certain agreement. There was notice given to him of a restrictive covenant, but that notice did not contain any mention of the further restriction which the vendor now seeks to put into the deed of conveyance. There is no doubt that the vendor is in a difficult position, and there is also no doubt that another contract is likely to be broken. That circumstance brings under my notice another novelty in practice. The court used originally only to decide the simple question in dispute between vendor and purchaser. In more than one recent instance, however, the court has gone further, and has decided that the title is so doubtful that it cannot be forced on a purchaser. I have done it myself. But it is not a proper question for a vendor and purchaser summons, because on such a summons the court has not the proper evidence upon which to decide such a question. Here the purchaser says that the insertion of the covenant cannot be forced on him, but I do not think that if I were trying an action for specific performance, I could say that the vendor was obliged to commit a breach of her former contract by conveying in the manner required by the purchaser. But that is not the point now before me. The summons only raises the question whether the deed of conveyance shall be in one form or in another, and all that I am asked to say is, shall the deed contain, or shall it not contain, a certain restrictive covenant? On that point I do not think there is much room for doubt. I was referred to the case of In re Gloag and Miller's Contract, where it is well laid down that a purchaser is entitled to a conveyance, according to the terms of the contract. Now, in the present case, why should not the vendor convey in the terms of the contract? To that question it is answered, "Yes, according to the contract the conveyance must be in a certain form; but at the time of the contract the purchaser knew of this other restrictive covenant, and it ought to be inserted in the conveyance." But the answer seems to me to be that by the insertion of the covenant the vendor is no better off than he was before, because if the purchaser knew of the covenant, then its insertion in the conveyance cannot help the vendor, for the purchaser is affected with notice from outside. All I am deciding in this case, then, is that when the existence of the contract is not denied and the validity of it cannot be questioned, the conveyance must be in such and such a form—i.e., in the form which the purchaser has already prepared.

In re KELCEY.
TYSON v. KELCEY. (a.)

Mortgage—Charge upon "all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever"—Enforcement—Definite property—Valid charge—Public policy—Vagueness.

A charge by a man upon "all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, the same may be or consist," will not be void on the ground of vagueness or as offending against public policy, if it is possible, at the time when the charge is sought to be enforced, to construe fairly the document creating the charge, and to point to the property comprised in it.

Adjourned summons.

On the 10th of November, 1869, the applicant, Sarah Ann Foord, advanced to Francis Finn Kelcey, then known as Francis Finn, the sum of £2,500 upon his promissory note and the further security created by a memorandum of charge, which was in the following form: "Memorandum made this 10th day of November, 1869, that I, the undersigned, Francis Finn, of Scene, in the parish of Newington-next-Hythe, in the county of Kent, farmer and grazier, do hereby charge all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever the same may be or consist, with the payment to Sarah Ann Foord, of Smeeth, in the said county of Kent, widow, of the sum of £2,500, this day lent and advanced by her to me, and secured by my promissory note bearing even date herewith, together with interest for the same at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum. And I do hereby undertake and agree that I will, when thereunto required, make and execute all such deeds and assurances as shall be reasonable and necessary for charging the said premises with, or further securing the repayment of, the said sum of £2,500 and interest as aforesaid."

By the 1st of September, 1896, the debt had been reduced to £500, and all interest due was paid up to the 1st of September, 1897.

Francis Finn Kelcey died on the 12th of September, 1898, having duly made his will, dated the 21st of November, 1854, and on the 5th of November, 1898, letters of administration to his estate, with the will annexed, were granted to the respondent, Stephen Finn Kelcey.

A creditor's action for the administration of the testator's estate was subsequently commenced, and as the validity of Sarah Ann Foord's charge was called in question by other creditors, she took out the present summons asking that Stephen Finn Kelcey, as the administrator with the will of Francis Finn Kelcey annexed, might be ordered to pay to her out of moneys coming to his hands as such administrator, the sum of £500, with interest thereon at the rate of £4 10s. per cent. per annum computed from the 1st of September, 1897, secured by the said memorandum of charge, together with her costs in the action.

At the date of the memorandum of charge the testator was possessed of a policy of assurance on his life for £1,000 in the Minerva Life Assurance Co. (subsequently taken over by the Standard Life Assurance Co.). Notice of the charge was given to the company, who were now holding the policy moneys until the applicant's charge should be satisfied or removed.

J. G. Wood, for the applicant, Sarah Ann Foord.—This charge is good. Future property was not included in the charge, but only all the borrower's property at the date of the charge, and that property was then definite and ascertainable.

Warrington, Q.C., and H. C. Hull, for the plaintiffs in the action.—This charge is invalid on the grounds of public policy, for it is so wide that the court will consider it wrong to enforce it, because, if fully carried into effect, it would prevent the debtor from paying his debts, and would deprive him of his means of subsistence: In re Count D'Epineuil, 30 W. R. 702, 20 Ch. D. 758; In re Clarke, Coombe v. Carter, 36 W. R. 293, 36 Ch. D. 348. The charge also is too vague: Belding v. Read, 13 W. R. 867, 3 H. & C. 955; Clements v. Matthews, 11 Q. B. D. 808, 31 W. R. Dig. 23; In re Turcan, 37 W. R. 70, 40 Ch. D. 5. In Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523, Lord Macnaghten doubted whether a charge by a man on "all his present and future personalty" could create a specific lien of any sort or kind.

Bardswell, for another creditor.

Gatey, for Stephen Finn Kelcey, the administrator.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case we are free from any question whether future property is included in the security, and the actual words used seem to me to point directly to property belonging to the testator at the date of the charge only. The words are: "I do hereby charge all my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature and kind soever, the same may be or consist," and I do not think that what follows can fairly be construed to enlarge what in itself would be confined to then existing property. Now, why should not those words create a good charge upon property that he had at the time? The first answer urged in argument against that view is that such a construction would be against public policy, that in fact it is not desirable that a man should be able to create a charge on everything he has, even down to the clothes on his back, or to create such charges secretly, and so possibly be trading under false colours. To that argument I think there is more than one complete answer, and first, it is not possible to keep too forcibly before one the remarks of Burrough, J., on public policy in Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229, at p. 252. "It is," he says, "a very unruly horse, and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you." That seems to me to apply here. There is certainly no law to the effect that a man may not create a charge on all his real and personal property. It may be that a bill of sale or some formality is necessary, but he may create the charge if he pleases. There is no doubt that such charges can be effectively and validly created by the assistance of the law, and to say that what can be done in one way by lawyers, cannot, so far as public policy is concerned, be done in another way by other persons is absurd.

Then, again, it is said that such a document is invalid because it tends to defeat creditors, but the same thing is also true of a great many other documents. Take, for instance, a marriage settlement, by means of which a man may, to a certain extent, prejudice his creditors. I think that it would be going too far to adopt that point of view.

Then as to the question of vagueness. The contract itself is not vague; the only vagueness which exists arises from the uncertainty whether the property purported to be charged can be really charged or not. On that point I refer to the remarks of Bowen, L.J., in In re Clarke (36 Ch. D., at p. 355) where he says: "Vagueness is a misleading term. A contract may be so vague in its terms that it cannot be understood, and in that case it is of no effect in law or in equity. There is another kind of vagueness which arises from the property not being ascertained at the date of the contract, but if at the time when the contract is sought to be enforced the property has come in esse and is capable of being identified as that to which the contract refers, I cannot see why there is in it any such vagueness as to prevent a court of equity from enforcing the contract," and then he goes on to hint at the suggestion which is the basis of the present argument, and he takes one illustration. "Thus," he says, "it is said a contract by a man to assign all the property that shall come to him would be too wide to be enforced. I will give no opinion on that point till it comes before us for decision." Here, however, the question of future property does not arise, and I think that if it is possible to construe the document fairly, and to point to the property comprised in it, then the charge is a good charge. I put aside, therefore, the ground of public policy. It might, perhaps, be a great advantage that charges of this kind should be registered, but that has not been hitherto the policy of the English law.

There is no authority at the present time saying that a charge similar to this is invalid; the nearest approach to any such authority is this one passage of Lord Macnaghten's judgment in Tailby v. Official Receiver, where, with reference to the case of In re Count D'Epineuil, he says, "I much doubt whether a memoradum like that on which the plaintiff relied could create a specific lien of any sort or kind." Lord Macnaghten has suggested a doubt which may have to be solved hereafter, and I venture to think that the doubt which he suggests must be set at rest by the House of Lords. It might be solved, perhaps, by the Court of Appeal, but I am perfectly sure that it could not be done by a judge of first instance. I therefore hold that the charge is valid, and I direct that it be paid out of the policy-moneys.

Settled estate—Minerals—Lease—Open or unopened mine—Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18). s. 4.

A settled estate was divided into two portions by a strip of land belonging to a different owner. A seam of coal underlay the whole. When the tenant for life of the settled estate came into possession the part of the seam underlying the northern portion of the estate was an opened mine. The tenant for life subsequently acquired the coal underlying the dividing strip. The tenant for life now proposed to grant a lease of the part of the seam underlying the southern portion of the estate which had not yet been worked. This part of the seam it was practicable to work from the opened mine, but it was not commercially convenient, and it was therefore intended to sink a new shaft in the southern portion of the estate.

Held, that the part of the seam underlying the southern portion of the estate was an unopened mine.

Petition.

Under the will of Viscount Maynard, who died in 1865, the Countess of Warwick was tenant for life in possession of an estate known as the Bayworth Estate, in the county of Leicester, and her eldest son, Lord Brooke, an infant, was tenant-in-tail in remainder expectant on her decease. The Bayworth Estate was divided into two separate portions by a strip of land belonging to a different owner running east and west. There was amongst others a seam of coal called the Lower Main Seam underlying the northern portion of the Bayworth Estate which ran across under the strip of land and was continued under the southern portion of the estate. At the time of Lord Maynard's death the coal under the northern portion of the estate was leased to the Bayworth Colliery Co. and was worked by them from a shaft sunk therein, but the coal underlying the southern portion of the estate had not been leased or worked. In 1885 Lady Warwick, out of her own moneys, purchased the coal, including Lower Main Seam, underlying the dividing strip of land, and subsequently leased them to the Bayworth Colliery Co. Lady Warwick now proposed to grant a lease of the coal, including the Lower Main Seam, which underlay the southern portion of the Bayworth Estate, and which had not yet been worked, to Henry Bramall. It appeared that it would be possible to work the Lower Main Seam underlying the southern portion of the estate from the shaft of the Bayworth Colliery Co. in the northern portion, through the coal underlying the dividing strip, but that it would be very expensive and from a commercial point of view unlikely to be successful. It was, therefore, intended to work from a new shaft sunk in the southern portion of the estate. This was a petition under the Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18), for the approval of the court to the proposed lease, and the question arose whether the coal underlying the southern portion of the Bayworth Estate must be regarded as an open mine or as an unopened mine. In the former case one-fourth only of the rent would have to be set aside and invested, but in the latter three-fourths as provided by section 4 of the Settled Estates Act, 1877.

Warrington, Q.C., and Darlington, for the petitioner.—The coal underlying the southern part of the estate now proposed to be demised is a continuation of the seam which had already been opened by the colliery company before the testator's death from their shaft in the northern part of the estate, and it must therefore be regarded as an open mine, although for commercial purposes we propose to sink a new shaft in the southern part. Elias v. Snowdon Slate Quarries Co., 28 W. KEKEWICH, J.—For my present purpose I think it will be sufficient to treat this as if it were a lease of the Lower Main Seam only, although I do not say that the same construction would not be arrived at after looking at the other facts of the case; but I think this is the simplest way of looking at the case.

What is said is this, that the Bayworth Colliery Co. having, as the lessees of the settlor, worked the Lower Main Seam in the northern portion of the Bayworth estate, there has therefore been an opening of that seam, or of the mine which is to be treated as the seam in the southern portion of the estate, which is now proposed to be demised under the rules of the court.

That is the question which I have to consider. What Mr. Warrington has called the dictum of Lord Selborne in the case of Elias v. Snowdon Slate Quarries Co., but which I think is more than a dictum, gives us in a few sentences what is the settled law on the subject. What he says is this: "When a mine or quarry is once open, so that the owner of an estate impeachable for waste may work it, I do not consider that the sinking a new pit on the same vein, or breaking ground in a new place on the same rock, is necessarily the opening of a new mine or a new quarry." It is quite possible to construe that so as to give Mr. Warrington all that he wants, but it is obvious that there must be some limitation. It cannot mean that a settlor, a person owning estate in one county, in which there is a seam of coal, and owning another estate in another county where the same seam is found, and who has only worked the seam under one estate, is not, upon opening the ground in the adjoining county, opening a new mine. I do not think it would be right to wrest Lord Selborne's language to make it fit such an extreme case as that, and I am justified in making that limitation because Lord Selborne, though he laid down the law, thus clearly says this immediately afterwards: "And for this authority is to be found in the cases which are cited at the bar of Clavering v. Clavering, Bagot v. Bagot, and Lord Cowley v. Wellesley. I must treat this statement of the law as thoroughly agreeing with the cases to which he refers. It is not difficult to obtain a principle from from these cases, and particularly from Clavering v. Clavering and Lord Cowley v. Wellesley." I do not think it is necessary to refer to Bagot v. Bagot further. We have the judgment of King, L.C., in Clavering v. Clavering, which contains a curious expression relating to a practice in the county of Devonshire, that "Any person having a right to dig in mines may pursue the mine, and open new shafts or pits to follow the same vein." The point which was before the Lord Chancellor's mind, and which he brings out in a very clear manner, is that really you are pursuing the same mine in the same seam. It is a pursuing by means, not of pushing forward the same seam in the old pit but, of sinking a new pit so as to work the minerals in connection with the old shaft. That is what he means by pursuing the same vein, notwithstanding that it is reached by a different way. In Lord Cowley v. Wellesley we find the same principle with reference to a different subject. I take the report in 1 Equity Cases because, although the report is shorter, it brings out the point more exactly. There there was waste land under which was gravel and no coal, and the gravel was reached by pits dug on the surface, each pit being separate. The gravel had been taken thence for some time, and the question was whether each new gravel pit was a new working or a continuance of the old working, and Lord Romilly said: "The whole of the gravel or sand on the waste land must be treated as a mine, and each gravel pit as if it were a fresh pit in the mine," that is to say he treats the waste of the manor, and the gravel or sand under it as one mine. The lord of the manor digs a pit here and there all over the waste, and on each occasion he is doing what King, L.C., calls "pursuing" the vein; he does not pursue in the sense of working it out inch by inch through the soil by continuing along the line of the vein, but by attacking the vein from another point he is still working the vein in the waste land. Now, I fail to see how you can apply that to this case. The property now intended to be demised, the southern portion of the Bayworth Estate, is separated from the northern portion, which was demised to the Bayworth Colliery Co., by the strip of land. There is as much distinction between these two properties as if they were two separate estates in two adjoining counties or in two counties separated by an intervening county. I assume that it is the same vein which is the subject of the demise, but not only is it to be approached from a different pit, but it is quite impossible to approach it from the old pit. Lady Warwick has a clear right to work the lower main seam under the dividing strip of land, but for this purpose she must be treated as an entire stranger. She is willing that the two pits should be worked together, because she happens to be interested in both, but I must treat her for the present purpose as if she had no interest in the former. She comes here as tenant for life desirous of demising the Lower Main Seam under the southern portion of the estate; that seems to me an entirely different seam from that leased to the Bayworth Colliery Co. on the northern portion of the estate. It is not like the case of working the waste of a manor, nor like the pursuing a vein as King, L.C., says. For this purpose it is a different estate. Of course I quite follow the evidence that if this was all under one ownership the result would be, that for convenience, for commercial purposes, a new pit would be opened, but it seems to me that the intervention of the strip of land which belongs to others, and is not part of the settled estate, prevents this mine from being held to be an "open mine" within the meaning of the law as laid down by Lord Selborne in Elias v. Snowdon Slate Quarries Co. and in the other cases. It never was in Lord Maynard's time in any sense under the same hands or worked under the same control. It could not have been in his contemplation to work under the southern portion of the estate by means of a pit to the north of the dividing strip of land, because he knew that that dividing strip of land did not belong to him. Upon the principle laid down in the cases to which I have referred, I think that this is not an open mine, and therefore a proportion of three-fourths of the rent must be reserved to the trustees of Lord Maynard's will, and set aside and invested.

MUTTON v. PEAT. (a.)

Banker—Account—Rule in Clayton's case—Application of rule as between bank, customers, and third parties.

T. & Co. had two accounts with their bankers, a current and a loan account. On the latter they owed £7,500, and in November, 1895, had deposited as security certain securities belonging to some of their clients. In January, 1896, T. & Co. had paid into their current account £790 4s. 6d., which had been paid to them by P., another client of theirs, to invest on his behalf. With this sum the current account showed a credit of £1,362 10s.

On the 24th of January, 1896, T. & Co. were adjudicated bankrupt. On the 20th of January the bank closed the current account, and transferred the credit balance of £1,362 10s. into a new account entered in a book kept in cases of bankruptcy and liquidation. At various times the bank proceeded to sell the securities deposited to secure the £7,500, and, as was shown by the new account, specifically appropriated the receipts to the specific balance then remaining at the dates of such sales. They did not deal with any part of the £1,362 10s., out of which P. now claimed to be repaid his £790 4s. 6d.

Held, that having regard to the bank's mode of appropriation, the rule in Clayton's case did not apply, and that the cestuis que trustent of the securities which had been sold had no equity as against P. to enforce the rule, and that P. was entitled to be repaid the £790 6s. 4d.

Adjourned summons.

Messrs. Tatham & Co., stockbrokers, had two accounts with their bankers, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co.—a current account and a loan account. On the latter account there was owing, on the 30th of December, 1895, a sum of £7,500, and to secure this debt there had been deposited by Messrs. Tatham before the 30th of November, 1895, certain securities which really belonged to some of their clients, one of whom was the plaintiff in this action.

On the 11th of January, 1896, Tatham & Co. paid into their current account the sum of £790 4s. 6d., which they had received from one Parker, another client of theirs, for investment. Two days afterwards Tatham & Co. were declared defaulters on the Stock Exchange. On the 21st of January a receiving order was made against them, and on the 24th of January they were adjudicated bankrupt. On the 20th of January, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, & Co. closed Tatham's current account, and transferred the credit balance, amounting to £1,362 10s., partly made up of Parker's above-mentioned £790 4s. 6d., into a new account. The bank also, on the 20th of January, 1896, credited this new account with a sum of £3,342 15s., which had been produced by the sale of some of the before-mentioned securities held as security for the loan account. On the 22nd of January, 1896, the debit side of this account showed: "Loan (part) discharged, £3,340; twenty days' interest to the 20th of January, £3 13s. 2d."

Further sums were similarly received and entered in this new account by the bank in respect of sales of others of the said securities, so that on the 30th of January, 1896, on the debit side there appeared "loan (balance) discharge, £3,590; thirty days' interest, £5 17s. 11d."

It did not appear from this new account that any part of the said sum of £1,362 10s., which had been the credit balance on Tathams' current account, had been applied in reduction of their debt on the loan account, but that the proceeds of the sales of the securities were specifically appropriated in discharge of this debt, leaving a small balance in the hands of the bank.

Parker then took out this summons claiming to be repaid the sum of £790 4s. 6d., which, as above-mentioned, had been paid by him to Tathams for investment out of the £1,362 10s., the balance on the current account transferred to the new account.

July 29.—BYRNE, J., after stating the facts, proceeded: It is conceded that the bankers might, had they been so minded, have applied the balance transferred from current account in part discharge of the amount due to them on loan account, but they did not do so.

They were entitled to appropriate the proceeds of the sale of securities as they did, namely, in discharge of the indebtedness on the loan account, to secure which the securities had been deposited. It is to be noted moreover, that interest is charged in the liquidation account on the amount due in respect of loan account, a part of which would not have been chargeable had the balance of current account been applied in part discharge of loan account.

But it is argued on behalf of owners of securities which have been realised and which were wrongfully deposited by Messrs. Tatham, being securities belonging to customers of theirs, that it does not matter as between rival claimants to the funds what entries the bankers made in their books or what they in fact did by way of appropriation; that as between banker and customer all the accounts make but one account (which is true for certain purposes) and that the rule in Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, at pp. 585, 608, ought to be treated as applicable, not only as between the bankers and other persons but as between third parties claiming the balance. The rule in Clayton's case applies where there is one unbroken account, and it applies as between cestuis que trust in an appropriate case: see In re Hallett's Estate, 28 W. R. 732, 13 Ch. D. 696;

In re Stenning, [1895] 2 Ch. 433, 43 W. R. Dig. 9. In Cory Brothers & Co. v. Owners of Turkish Steamship "Mecca," Lord Macnaghten cites ([1897] A. C. p. 295) what was said by Jessel, M.R., in In re Hallett's Estate: "It is a very convenient rule, and I have nothing to say against it unless there is evidence either of agreement to the contrary or of circumstances from which a contrary intention must be presumed, and then, of course, that which is a mere presumption of law gives way to these other considerations." And after citing a passage to a similar effect from the judgment of Baggallay, L.J., in the same case, Lord Macnachten proceeds to deal with the case of Cory v. SS. Mecca upon the footing of the qualification referred to.

Suppose the bankers had not made any appropriation of the moneys received by them from the sale of securities, but had simply made one account by means of transfer to the credit of the liquidation account of the balance on current account and had added the amount received by them from sale of securities, entering items on the debit side without distinguishing, it may well be that the rule in Clayton's case, would have applied, but I have, in what was actually done by the bankers, clear evidence that they appropriated, as they were clearly entitled to do, specific receipts to payment of a specific balance due from the customer. I think that this excludes the application of the rule in Clayton's case and I cannot find authority for saying that there exists any equity entitling the cestuis que trust of the deposited securities as against the cestuis que trust of the transferred balance from the current account to require the application of the rule in Clayton's case, or to maintain a right to say that the moneys ought to be deemed to have been dealt with otherwise than they in fact were. I think that Mr. Parker has established his claim. This decision applies also to the other claimants to the cash balance if they succeed in tracing their moneys into the fund.

(Ridley and Darling, JJ.) Oct. 26.

THE UCKFIELD DISTRICT COUNCIL (Appellants) v. THE CROWBOROUGH WATER CO. (Respondents). (a.)

Local government — Water-tower erected by company under special Act—Non-compliance of undertakers with bye-laws made under Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 157—Jurisdiction of district council to enforce obedience to bye-laws.

The Uckfield District Council laid two informations against the respondent water company for having begun to build a water-tower without giving any of the notices prescribed by, or in any otherwise complying with, the provisions of certain bye-laws made by the council under powers conferred on them by the Public Health Act, 1875.

The justices dismissed the information on the ground that as the erection of the water-tower was expressly authorized by the company's private Act of 1897 the bye-laws did not apply.

Held, on appeal, that the justices were wrong. The special Act was merely to enable the respondent company to build the water-tower on land belonging to someone else; but, being so empowered, they were then in the same position as a private person intending to erect a building on his own land, and under a similar obligation to comply with bye-laws duly made under the Public Health Act, 1875, which Act, although not expressly incorporated in the respondent company's private Act of 1897, must, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, be held to apply.

Held, also, that there was no such inconsistency between the powers conferred by the special Act of 1897 upon the respondents to erect their tower and the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, empowering the appellants to make bye-laws, as would support an inference that the latter had been repealed.

Case stated by justices of the petty sessional division of Frant, Sussex, who had dismissed two informations preferred by the surveyor to the Uckfield District Board charging that the Crowborough District Water Co. had in October, 1898, begun to construct a water-tower without first giving any of the notices prescribed by, or in any other wise complying with, the provisions of the bye-laws with respect to new streets and buildings made by the district council under powers conferred on them by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 157.

It appeared from the case that the appellants were a rural district council and the respondents a waterworks company incorporated by 60 & 61 Vict. c. cxvii. (1897). By section 25 of this Act the respondents were empowered to erect and maintain in a field within the appellants' district a high-service water-tower "in the lines and situations and according to the levels shown on the deposited plans and sections."

The private Act of 1897 incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 93 of which provides as follows: "Nothing herein or in the special Act contained shall be deemed to exempt the undertakers from any . . . Act for improving the sanitary condition of towns and populous districts which may be passed . . . in any future session of Parliament."

The appellants had all the powers of a rural sanitary authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, and Acts amending the same, and had also duly acquired the same powers to make and enforce bye-laws with respect to new streets and buildings as are conferred upon urban sanitary authorities by section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and they had in accordance with these powers enacted certain bye-laws requiring persons intending to erect buildings, before doing so to deliver to the district surveyor plans and sections of such buildings, with other particulars, including the date when such buildings would be commenced.

The respondents began to erect the water-tower authorized by their private Act of 1897 without depositing plans or giving notice.

On a summons for breach of the above bye-law the justices dismissed the information.

The district council appealed.

R. E. Moore, for the appellants.—The justices ought to have convicted, for the bye-laws, being made under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and having therefore statutory force, are binding on the respondents in so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of that company's special Act. Here there is no such inconsistency, and I rely upon Hill v. Hall, 1 Ex. D. 411, 25 W. R. Dig. 278. This water-tower is none the less a "building" within the meaning of that term as used in the bye-laws because the company were authorized to erect it by their private Act. The respondents do not deny that the deposited plans give no details or method of construction to be adopted by them in the erection of the water-tower.

W. Whateley (W. P. Boxall with him), for the respondents.—The private Act of 1897 expressly authorized the waterworks company to erect this tower in accordance with plans deposited by the undertakers when the Bill was moved for. It is not alleged against the respondents that the tower in course of construction is not strictly in accordance with those plans. Having obtained the necessary sanction of Parliament to proceed with this work, the local authority cannot fetter the undertakers by requiring them to conform to bye-laws, which we say, moreover, do not apply at all to a water-tower built in accordance with statutory powers by a water company. Moreover, the bye-law was promulgated on the 15th of January, 1897, while the special Act was not passed until the 15th of July of the same year. We say the bye-laws and the special Act are inconsistent, because the latter obliges the company to construct all proper and necessary works, which means proper and necessary in the view of the undertakers, while the former makes the district council the judges of what is proper and necessary. The judgments in London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Limehouse Board of Works, 5 W. R. 64, and City and South London Railway v. London County Council, 40 W. R. 166, [1891] 2 Q. B. 513, show that the appellants' contention is erroneous, and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

R. E. Moore replied.

RIDLEY, J.—The question here is whether the respondents, having been empowered by section 25 of their special Act to construct all proper and necessary works, including a high-service water-tower, are thereby exonerated from submitting plans and giving notices to the local authority in accordance with two bye-laws numbered 93 and 94. The first of these bye-laws provides that any person about to erect a new building shall give notice to the local authority of his intention, and shall deliver to the clerk or surveyor of the council plans and sections of such building, and a description in writing of the materials of which it is intended to construct the same, and also a description in writing of the mode of drainage and water supply. The second bye-law provides that notice shall be given of the date on which it is intended to commence such building; and there are other bye-laws which impose penalties for breach of the foregoing, and contain provisions for removal of works executed in contravention thereof. I do not agree with the contention put forward by the respondents' counsel that when once the company were authorized by their Act to erect a water-tower, they were empowered to construct it as they thought fit. The effect of their special Act was to enable them to erect a tower on land which was not theirs; an Act was necessary to enable them to do that. But when they had been so empowered they were in the same position as a private person intending to build a house upon his own land, and under a similar obligation to comply with bye-laws duly made under the provisions of the Public Health Act. It was argued that these bye-laws did not apply because the Public Health Act was not expressly incorporated with the special Act, but a general Act must be taken to apply unless it can clearly be shown that it was the intention of the Legislature that it should not apply to the provisions of the special Act obtained subsequently, to which it would otherwise be applicable. Section 93 of the Waterworks Clauses Act begins by stating that "Nothing herein or in the special Act contained shall be deemed to exempt the undertakers from any general Act relating to waterworks, or any Act for improving the sanitary condition of towns and populous districts . . . passed in any future session of parliament," and clearly expresses a contrary intention on the part of the Legislature to that which we are asked to assume here so far as the provisions of that Act are applicable to the present case. With regard to the existing sanitary Acts, section 25 of the special Act was silent with reference to them. That left untouched the general principle that the general law of the land applies when construing a private Act. I think with regard to the cases cited they are both distinguishable. In London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Limehouse Board of Works, the earlier Act was a special Act, and the later a general Act. There was, therefore, no such inconsistency as would lead the court to infer that the earlier Act was by implication intended to be repealed. In my judgment that is the true test. In City and South London Railway Co. v. London County Council the court held there was a distinct inconsistency, and the special Act had to give way; but for that inconsistency the decision of the court would probably have been the other way. It cannot be said successfully that there is any inconsistency here between the special Act and the bye-laws, which have the force of a general statute, and the company are subject to the provisions of the latter. It was argued that the water-tower was not a "building" within the meaning of the bye-laws, and that they must be limited to the powers with respect to new streets and the like conferred on rural district councils constituted under the Local Government Act, 1894, having the powers of a rural sanitary authority conferred by section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875. I cannot accept that view, and for the reasons I have given I think the appeal must be allowed.

ANGLO-ARGENTINE LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCE AGENCY v. TEMPERLEY STEAM SHIPPING CO. (a.)

Ship—General average—Depreciation in cargo—Maintenance of cattlemen—Fodder for cattle.

The plaintiffs shipped in the defendants' steamship a cargo of live cattle for carriage from Buenos Ayres to the United Kingdom under a charter-party, which provided that average (if any) should be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules; and that the vessel should on no account call at Brazilian or Continental ports before landing her live stock. The reason of this proviso was that by the law of the United Kingdom live cattle could not be landed in the United Kingdom if the ship carrying them had touched at the ports specified. In the course of the voyage the vessel sprang a leak, and it became necessary for the safety of all concerned to put into Bahia, a Brazilian port, for repairs. Consequently the cattle could not be landed in the United Kingdom, and were sold in Antwerp, realizing less than they would have done if they had been sold in the United Kingdom.

Held, that the loss sustained by the owners of the cattle was the subject of general average contribution.

During the execution of the repairs to the vessel at

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bahia the owners of the cattle incurred expense in the maintenance of the cattlemen in charge of the cattle on the ship and in the supply of fodder and water to the cattle.

Held, that these expenses were not recoverable in general average either under the York-Antwerp Rules, 1890, or at common law.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled to recover by way of contribution in general average from the defendants, as owners of the steamship Edenbridge, and from the other interests at risk the sum of £2,324 19s. 3d.

The following statement of facts was agreed upon:

(1) By a charter-party dated the 4th of February, 1898, John Williams, Son, & Sharp, on behalf of the defendants, the owners of The Edenbridge, chartered her to Williams & Co., of Buenos Ayres, for a voyage from the River Plate to Deptford, and a further port in the United Kingdom or Continent within certain limits. The charter-party contained the words "charterers to provide a full deck load of live stock for Deptford in accordance with Argentine Government regulations," and "average, if any, payable according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1890."

(2) By a live stock charter-party dated the 26th of March, 1898, John Williams, Son, & Sharp, on behalf of the defendants, the owners of The Edenbridge, agreed with the plaintiffs that she should load from the plaintiffs a full deck cargo of cattle and sheep for Deptford. This agreement contained the words "other conditions as per Williams & Co.'s live stock bill of lading, which shall be deemed to form part of this agreement," and "all other conditions as per bill of lading, which must be subservient to and governed by this contract," and "steamer on no account to call at Brazilian or Continental ports before landing her live stock."

By the Foreign Animals Order of 1896, made by the Board of Agriculture in exercise of their powers under the Diseases of Animals Acts, 1894 and 1896, foreign animals cannot be landed alive in the United Kingdom if the steamer conveying them has touched at Brazilian or Continental ports on her voyage.

(3) The plaintiffs loaded on board The Edenbridge 201 bullocks and 862 sheep at Buenos Ayres, and the captain of The Edenbridge signed a bill of lading for such live stock dated the 15th of April, 1898. This bill of lading was in the form of Williams & Co.'s live stock bill of lading, and contained the words, "average, if any, is to be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules of 1890," and "neither the steamer nor her cargo, nor the owners thereof, are to be liable under any circumstances for contribution in average for jettison of animals."

(4) On the 15th of April 1898, at 1 p.m. the vessel finished loading at Beunos Ayres and proceeded through the docks. In passing through the junction between Nos. 2 and 3 docks, the vessel's head fell off slightly to starboard, and her port bow bumped against the dock wall. The tanks and wells were immediately sounded, but the vessel was found to be making no water, and proceeded down the channel. On the 16th of April a rivet blew out of the port boiler, rendering the boiler useless, and after consultation with the officers, the master, for the safety of all concerned, determined to put into Montevideo for repairs, and proceeded under one boiler, and arrived at 2.30 p.m. On the 18th of April, the necessary repairs having been effected, the vessel left Montevideo. On the 20th of April the weather increased in violence, blowing a gale, and on the 26th of April the carpenters sounding the well of No. 1 hold at 6 a.m., thirteen feet of water were found in the hold. The pumps were immediately set to work, and these were able to keep the water down. As it was impossible to ascertain at sea the exact position or the extent of the leak or to repair it when ascertained, it being obviously below the water-line, the captain determined to put into Bahia, where she arrived at 4.30 a.m. on the 27th of April.

(5) At Bahia expenses were incurred for extra fodder, water, and otherwise in connection with the live stock while the vessel was in port. Owing to the vessel having put into Bahia, a Brazilian port, the animals, by reason of the order aforesaid, could not be landed alive in the United Kingdom. It was therefore arranged, and was the best course to take in the interests of all concerned, that the vessel should proceed direct to Antwerp and deliver them at that port, and a contract dated the 9th of May, 1898, was entered into between the defendants, the owners of The Edenbridge, and Pritchard, Moore, & Cruit, to whom at that time the bill of lading had been indorsed, for the carriage of the live stock to Antwerp. The contract contained the words "other conditions to be as per live stock bill of lading, which is to be governed by this contract," the animals to be delivered at Antwerp to the holders of the bill of lading of The Edenbridge from Buenos Ayres to Deptford, the said bill of lading to be indorsed by them as follows: "Received the within animals at Antwerp instead of at Deptford in full satisfaction of the shipowners' obligations under the bill of lading." The vessel left Bahia on the 12th of May, 1898, and arrived at Antwerp on the 7th of June, and the bill of lading was indorsed as above by Pritchard, Moore, & Cruit on delivery of the live stock there. The live stock did in fact realize at Antwerp lower prices than they would have realized if they had been landed alive in the London market.

(6) It is in dispute whether to any, and if so to what, extent outlay in connection with the live stock at Montevideo and Bahia and loss on realization at Antwerp are to be made good in general average, and the following figures taken from the average statement show the items and amounts so disputed. (The case proceeded to give figures and contained provisions for adjusting the same).

(8) The above-mentioned charter-parties and bill of lading form part of this case, and reference may be made, if necessary, saving all just exceptions, to the adjustment of Messrs. Manley Hopkins, Son, & Cookes, dated the 10th of November, 1898, and to the abstract thereof bearing the same date. The court is to be at liberty to draw any necessary inferences of fact.

York-Antwerp Rules, 1890:

Rule X (c).—Whenever the cost of discharging cargo from a ship is admissible as general average, the cost of re-loading and stowing such cargo on board the said ship, together with all storage charges on such cargo, shall likewise be so admitted, but when the ship is condemned or does not proceed on her original voyage, no storage expenses incurred after the date of the ship's condemnation or of the abandonment of the voyage shall be admitted as general average.

Rule XI.—When a ship shall have entered or been detained in any port or place under the circumstances or for the purposes of repairs mentioned in Rule X, the wages payable to the master, officers, and crew, together with the cost of maintenance of the same during the extra period of detention in such port or place until the ship shall or should have been made ready to proceed upon her voyage shall be admitted as general average; but when the ship is condemned or does not proceed on her original voyage the wages and maintenance of the master, officers, and crew incurred after the date of the ship's condemnation or of the abandonment of the voyage shall not be admitted as general average.

July 7.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: Shortly stated the facts of this case are as follows: The plaintiffs in April, 1898, shipped on board the defendants' steamer Edenbridge at Buenos Ayres a deck cargo of cattle and sheep for carriage to Deptford. The contract of carriage stipulated (1) that the steamer should on no account call at any Brazilian or Continental ports before landing her live stock; and (2) that average, if any, should be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules. The reason for the insertion of the first of these stipulations was that by an order made under the Diseases of Animals Acts, 1894 and 1896, foreign animals cannot be landed in the United Kingdom if the steamer conveying them has touched at Brazilian or Continental ports on her voyage. The loading of the vessel finished on the 15th of April, and on that day she left Buenos Ayres. On the 20th of April it was discovered that the vessel was making water from a leak below the water-line, and for the safety of all concerned the captain put into Bahia, arriving there on the 27th of April. The putting into Bahia was a general average act. Bahia being a Brazilian port, the ultimate landing of the cattle at Deptford was by this general average act rendered impossible, and the plaintiffs having thus lost their English market acted for the best by making arrangements for the carriage of their cattle to Antwerp. The cattle were accordingly carried to Antwerp, where they sold at a much less price than they would have realized if they had been carried to and delivered at Deptford. The repairs to the vessel at Bahia were done between the 27th of April and the 12th of May. On the 12th of May she sailed for Antwerp and arrived there on the 7th of June. The plaintiffs incurred a large loss by reason of their cattle having been rendered incapable of being landed at Deptford. They were also put to the expense of maintaining their cattlemen and of providing fodder and water for the cattle while at Bahia. The questions are whether any, and if so which, of these losses form the subject of general average contribution. The facts will be found set out more fully in a joint statement which was produced at the hearing of the arguments.

As to the damage sustained by putting into Bahia, I think it is recoverable in general average. It is the direct and immediate consequence of the general average act. The moment the vessel touched the Brazilian port the plaintiffs' property was ipso facto rendered of less value than it was before, because by that act the plaintiffs were deprived of one of the means, and that the best, of realizing their property. It was said by the defendants that a claim such as this was not recoverable in general average, because the shipowner and the other cargo-owners could not, at the time the voyage began, have contemplated such a claim arising; and the captain was called before me to say that, though he knew it was of importance to the plaintiffs that he should not touch at a Brazilian port, he did not know what the precise consequences of touching might be. If it be material to inquire what the captain knew or thought, I am satisfied that he knew well enough that the effect of putting into Bahia would be to render the discharge of the cattle at Deptford impossible, and that this would cause serious loss to the plaintiffs. As to the other cargo-owners, I daresay it is the fact that many of them were unaware even that cattle were being carried, and therefore unaware that they were running the risk of having to contribute to such a loss as that which they are now asked to make good. But it would be a dangerous thing to make the liability to contribute depend upon what each cargo-owner may be supposed to have contemplated at the beginning of the voyage with reference to the character or incidents of the cargo of the other cargo-owners. The captain, when he determines on the general average act, is the agent of all parties interested—the occasion makes him their agent; and if in doing the act he causes direct injury to the property of any one of them, it must be taken that the others there and then promise to contribute to make it good. If one ought to consider what was in the contemplation of anyone, it ought to be what was in the contemplation of the master at the time he determined upon the sacrifice. Mr. Lowndes in his work on General Average (4th ed), p. 36, says: "We have to determine quod pro omnibus datum est, and since giving must always imply an intention to give, what we have here to ascertain must be what loss at once has in fact occurred, and likewise must be regarded as the natural and reasonable result of the act of sacrifice? or, in other words, what the shipmaster would naturally or might reasonably have intended to give for all when he resolved upon the act? If, then, upon the act of sacrifice any loss ensues which the master did not in fact bring before his mind at the time of making the sacrifice, it would have to be considered whether it were such a loss as he naturally might or reasonably ought to have taken account of." Ulrich, in his Grosse-Haverei, p. 5, says: "General average comprises not only the damage purposely done to ship and cargo, but also (1) all damage or expense which was to be foreseen as the natural (immediate) consequence of the first sacrifice, since this unmistakably forms part of that which was given for the common safety; (2) all damage or expense which, though not to be foreseen, stands to the sacrifice in the relation of effect to cause, or in other words was its necessary consequence. Not so, however, those losses or expenses which, though they would not have occurred but for the sacrifice, yet would not have occurred but for some subsequent accident." These two passages seem to me to express accurately the principles upon which the damages to be made good in general average are to be ascertained; and applying those principles to the present case, I think that as, when the master of The Edenbridge resolved upon the average act, he knew, or ought to have known, that he was sacrificing the advantages which the plaintiffs then possessed by reason of the ship not having touched a Brazilian port, he must be taken to have intended that the value of those advantages should be made good in general average; and the master's intention is the intention of the parties interested whose agent he is. I am further of opinion that the damage in question is the direct consequence of the general average act.

Then it was said that this was like a claim for damages for wages of crew and detention of ship while in a port of refuge, and it was pointed out that such damages are never recoverable in general average when (as here) the vessel puts into port to repair damage which is not itself caused by a general average act: Atwood v. Sellar. But there is a distinction between such a case and the one in hand. In the case supposed the shipowner has contracted with all the other co-adventurers to keep his vessel tight, staunch, and strong to the end of the voyage, and if by storm or by any other similar misfortunes (not voluntary) she is damaged, and then for the benefit of all concerned the master has to seek a port of refuge, he must when he gets there repair the damage and so perform his contract; and he must do it at his own expense, part of which will consist of the wages of his crew during the necessary delay, and the damages arising from the detention of the ship. In the case before the court the plaintiffs were under no contractual obligation to bear the loss which they now seek to recover.

It was further contended that the loss was like the case of loss of market for which damages could not be recovered: The Notting Hill. But it is not like such a case. Damages resulting from loss of market arise by reason of fluctuations in price which happen not in consequence of the act complained of, but by reason of events which are independent of the act. Here, the instant the ship touched Bahia, and by that fact of itself, the goods became of much less value than that which they otherwise would have had. The goods did not arrive too late for the English market, but by the average act they were prevented from ever arriving at all. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in respect of the main part of their claim.

Then as to the keep of the cattlemen and the cost of the fodder and water. The cattlemen were the servants of the plaintiffs, the cargo-owners, and were paid by them. The defendants, the shipowners, gave them a free passage on the vessel, but otherwise, they gave them nothing. Their duty was to attend to the wants of the cattle; they had nothing to do with the navigation of the ship. Mr. Carver contended that Rule XL of the York-Antwerp Rules gave the plaintiffs the right to have the cost of maintaining the men during the ship's detention at Bahia made good in general average. The rule is as follows: [His lordship read the rule.] Mr. Carver said that inasmuch as the cattlemen worked on the ship they ought to be regarded as part of the "crew." In my opinion they were not part of the crew at all; they were not under the command of the master; they were not in the services of the shipowners; they did not sign the ship's articles; nor were they in any way engaged in the navigation of the vessel. As to the cost of fodder and water for the cattle during the same period, it was said that it was recoverable under Rule X (c) which is as follows: [His lordship read the rule.] It was said that the cost of fodder and water ought to be covered by the words "all storage charges on such cargo." But the cattle were never discharged at all at Bahia, so that in my opinion the rule does not apply; and even if they had been discharged I should have had great difficulty in saying that the cost of fodder and water could be properly called storage charges. Storage charges comprise the cost of putting into store and the rent of the place hired. They do not include expenditure on the goods themselves.

But it was said that, though these two claims may not be recoverable under the York-Antwerp Rules, they are nevertheless recoverable at common law. I am, however, of opinion that they are not. Everyone concerned in the adventure suffers damage by the delay at the port of refuge. Each cargo-owner is delayed in getting payment of his freight, and the shipowner is deprived of the use of his ship. Yet none of these cases afford the foundation of any claim in general average according to our common law. Perhaps it is desirable that they should; and when the York-Antwerp Rules are by contract made applicable, some of them do form the subject of contribution. But the common law is clear, and it will be found laid down in the cases collected by Mr. Lowndes and referred to in section 57 of his work.

The loss which each owner sustains may be out of proportion to the loss which the others have to bear. There may be accidental circumstances making the loss in one case more serious proportionally than it is in others. But this fact gives rise to no claim. I see no ground for distinguishing the present case from those to which I have referred. The delay threw upon the plaintiffs the burden of keeping their cargo in good condition during fifteen days longer than they would otherwise have had to do, and the burden involved them in the expense of maintaining their cattlemen and supplying the cattle with fodder and water. These damages are exactly of the same character as those suffered in the cases I have instanced, and therefore are, in my opinion, equally irrevocable. If Mr. Carver could have persuaded me that they came within the meaning of the York-Antwerp Rules he would have succeeded on this part of the claim; but he has failed to do that, and I am satisfied that the common law on which he fell back would not support him. Therefore I direct that the charges for the maintenance of the cattlemen and for the fodder and water should not be treated as subjects of general average.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.) — Nov. 7, 9.

In re CLEMENT ET CIE.'S TRADE-MARK. (a.)

Trade-mark — Registration — "St. Raphael" — Geographical name—Descriptive name—Fancy word—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64 (1) (c) (2), 74 (a).

The company had registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, as their trade-mark a label upon which the words "St. Raphael" appeared several times. On the application by a rival company to have this mark removed from the register unless a disclaimer of the said words was entered,

Held, that the words, being contained in a distinctive label, registered as a whole under the Act of 1883, need not be disclaimed under section 74, inasmuch as they formed a part of the label and were not additions to it.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (47 W. R. 407), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., reported in 47 W. R. 407, where the facts are set out at length. Shortly the point was this: The applicants, the proprietors of a medicinal wine called "St. Raphael—Quinquina," desired to register a mark bearing the name of their article variously printed; the comptroller refused it, as the respondents, since May in 1888, had on the register in the same class a mark associated with and containing the name of their natural wine, known as "Vin de St. Raphael," or "St. Raphael's Wine." The evidence was conflicting as to the possible connection of the respondents' wine with any place of the name "St. Raphael." The applicants had asked for the rectification of the register by the removal of the respondents' trade-mark, or, alternatively, by adding thereto a disclaimer as to the words "St. Raphael," the matter being entirely under the Act of 1883. Kekewich, J., refused the summons of the applicants with costs.

The applicants appealed.

R. Nevill, Q.C., and T. R. Warrington, Q.C., (G. F. Hart with them), for the appellants. The word "St. Raphael" is not a fancy word, but a geographical name or the name of a personage: In re Van Duzer's Trade-Mark, 35 W. R. 294, 34 Ch. D. 623 ("Melrose"). Under section 74 of the 1883 Act, the word is primâ facie distinctive, being an addition; and therefore, not being a common word or a direction for use or the like, it must be disclaimed: Burland v. Broxburn Oil Co., 38 W. R. 89, 42 Ch. D. 274 ("Washerine"); Thompson v. Miller, 13 Pat. Cas. Rep. 35 ("Roadster"). If the respondent's mark is distinctive without reference to the words "St. Raphael," then it is good; if not, either it is bad, or those words must be disclaimed.

L. B. Sebastian, for the respondents.—It is not a question of a "fancy word" at all. What the respondents claim to have protected is their label as a whole, being in the two parts as originally entered on the register; without the words in question it would not be the label as used; and it is a distinctive label, not in the sense of being an invented object, but as being the thing which designates their goods. Unless the words are held to be an addition, cadit quaestio. The kind of words that can be called an addition are, "This label is issued only by, &c." The respondents rely on the law as laid down in In re Smokeless Powder Co.'s Trade-Mark, 40 W. R. 507, [1892] 1 Ch. 596, in which case are cited In re Apollinaris Co., [1891] 2 Ch. 186, 8 Pat. Cas. Rep. 137, 39 W. R. Dig. 237; and Pinto v. Badman, 8 Pat. Cas. Rep. 181.

LINDLEY, M.R.—This case, like all the other trade-mark cases, is important to the parties, and extremely difficult for the court. The difficulty in construing Acts of Parliament is one which we have to grapple with every day, but this Act of Parliament of 1883 has given, and is likely to give, rise to a great deal of difference of opinion. But after all, now that we understand the case, the conclusion at which we have arrived (though I am speaking for myself only at present) is that the decision of the learned judge is right, and that Mr. Sebastian has brushed away a good deal of dust which was raised by the ingenious argument of the appellants, by pointing out that the respondents are not claiming as the registered owners of the words "St. Raphael," or of a fancy name, or of anything else except the label which they have registered. The label which they have registered is a label which they are entitled to register under section 64; and as to the words "St. Raphael" I think Mr. Sebastian is quite right, and the learned judge was quite right, in treating it not as an addition to the mark. It is part of their label, it is a part of the thing registered, and there is no reason, therefore, for calling upon the person who registered to disclaim it under section 74. That section applies to things which are additions to and not parts of a registered mark or label. Here I cannot hesitate to say in my opinion this evidently is part of the mark, and not an addition to it. I am not going to lay down any general principle for distinguishing between what are parts of the mark and what are additions to it. I can easily see that there may be cases in which it is extremely difficult to say which is which, but here, to my mind, it is well on the obvious side that this is part of the mark. That is an answer to the case, and the appeal must be dismissed. As to whether this could be regarded as a fancy word, I will say nothing. The evidence is not altogether satisfactory, but there are difficulties in either view of the case, and I will say nothing at all about it. It is sufficient for us to say that the decision appealed from was right, and the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The upper label registered by the respondents was, in my opinion, a perfect label in itself, and the words upon it are not in addition to that label, but form part of the label. It appears to me that the lower label was a true addition in the sense in which the words are used in section 64—that is to say, were words added to the label; but section 64 permits that to be done, for it says that there may be added to any one or more of the particulars pointed out in that section "any letters, words, or figures, or combination of letters, words, or figures, or of any of them." That being so, the registration of both labels, if I may refer to them as two separate labels for the moment, was a right registration. And then under section 74 no disclaimer of the lower label is required, inasmuch as it was not primâ facie distinctive, so that it appears to me that the label as registered was rightly registered as a whole, the two labels together, without any disclaimer as to the lower portion. I would only desire to say this, that this judgment ought in no way, I think, give rise to any idea that it would sanction the registration of words which in themselves would not constitute a proper trade-mark merely because some flourishes were colourably put round them to try and make out a distinct label a compound label, when, in fact, what was really sought to be registered, and intended to be registered was the words alone.

DAVENTRY DISTRICT COUNCIL v. PARKER. (a.)

Local government — Highway — Liability to repair ratione tenuræ*—Recovery of expenses incurred by district council in effecting repairs—Local Government Act*, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 25, sub-section 2.

Proceedings under section 25, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, to enforce liability to repair a highway ratione tenuræ must be taken against the occupier of the land charged with the repair, and not against the owner.

Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring, 46 W. R. 541, [1898] 1 Q. B. 865, affirmed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Bruce, JJ.) on the argument on a point of law raised in an action.

The action was brought by the District Council of Daventry, under section 25, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, to recover from the defendant £136 17s. 6d., the amount of costs incurred by the plaintiffs in repairing two roads which passed through a farm, of which the defendant was the owner, but not the occupier.

Section 25, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act is as follows: "Where a highway repairable ratione tenuræ appears on the report of a competent surveyor not to be in proper repair, and the person liable to repair the same fails when requested so to do by the district council to place it in proper repair, the district council may place the highway in proper repair, and recover from the person liable to repair the highway the necessary expenses of so doing."

The point was taken on behalf of the defendant that "the person liable to repair the highway" was the occupier of the land charged with the repair, and not the owner.

The point was ordered to be argued first.

The Divisional Court, on the authority of the case of Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring, 46 W. R. 541, [1898] 1 Q. B. 865, decided the point in favour of the defendant.

The plaintiffs appealed.

R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Morten, for the plaintiffs.—This is in effect an appeal from the judgment in Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring. Formerly the liability to repair a highway ratione tenuræ could only be enforced by indictment. In Reg. v. Barker, 25 Q. B. D. 213, 38 W. R. Dig. 85; it was held that the only person indictable for non-repair of a highway repairable ratione tenuræ was the occupier of the lands charged with the repair, and that an owner who was not in occupation was not indictable. This decision was based upon a passage in Rolle's Abridgment, Chim'n Common, B. (2), which, however, probably refers only to liability to repair ratione clausuræ. In Rex v. Sutton, 3 A. & E. 597, the question was argued whether a person who was owner, but not occupier, of lands charged with the repair of a bridge, was indictable for non-repair of the bridge; but it was not necessary to decide the question. In Reg. v. Ramsden, E. B. & E. 949, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 48, it was held that, in the case of liability to repair ratione clausuræ, only the occupier of the lands inclosed could be indicted, and not the owner as owner. That case does not cover liability to repair ratione tenuræ. The Local Government Act, 1894, by section 25, sub-section 2, has created a new method of enforcing liability to repair ratione tenuræ, and the question now is, not who is liable to be indicted, but who is liable to repair. The case of Baker v. Greenhill, 3 Q. B. 148, shows that, when the only remedy was by indictment, the occupier, who had been indicted, had a right to be reimbursed by the owner for any repairs which he had been obliged to do. Therefore the person ultimately liable was always the owner. According to the true construction of the section "the person liable to repair the highway" is the owner.

H. W. Rowsell (Macmorran, Q.C., and J. P. Grain with him), for the defendant, cited Viner's Abridgment, vol. 4, p. 507, and referred to section 34 of the Highway Act, 1862.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—The point raised in this case is a narrow one, and I am disposed to deal with it on the construction of the statute, and I will not embarrass myself with a consideration of the cases which have been cited. It seems clear that before the passing of the Highway Act, 1862, the uniform method of enforcing liability to repair a highway whether ratione tenuræ or ratione clausuræ was by indictment against the occupier only. No case has been found of an owner being indicted for non-repair. I think that section 34 of the Highway Act, 1862, was intended only to alter the procedure for enforcing the existing liability to repair, and not to shift the onus of the liability. Then came section 25, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894. [His Lordship read the section and proceeded] Can it be said that the landlord was the person liable to repair? It is pointed out that, where an occupier was indicted, the owner was liable to indemnify him. But the liability to indemnify was not the same thing as a liability to repair. In my opinion the Legislature have merely altered the procedure, and the occupier still remains the person liable to repair.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case of Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring was rightly decided.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., concurred.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Nov. 1, 2.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HANWELL URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government — Land — Compulsory purchase for sewage—Use for hospital—Ultra vires—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 175.

The Local Government Board has no power under section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to direct that land acquired by a local authority under statutory provisions for a specified object shall be retained by the authority for purposes permanently inconsistent with that object.

By a provisional order of the Local Government Board dated the 30th of April, 1881, made under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875—and duly confirmed by Act of Parliament—the sanitary authority for the Rural Sanitary District of the Brentford Union was empowered to put in force the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845, 1868, and 1869, with respect to the taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, and to take certain land in the parish of Hanwell in the district of the Brentford Union belonging to the Earl of Jersey "for the disposal of the sewage of the parish of Hanwell in their district." Accordingly about twelve acres of the lands were conveyed to the sanitary authority on the 28th of December, 1883. The Urban District Council of Hanwell, the successors in title of the sanitary authority of the Brentford Union, being desirous of erecting a hospital on a part of the lands, applied to the Local Government Board under section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and on the 3rd of April, 1897, obtained from them an order directing that about two acres of the lands so acquired "for purpose of sewage disposal," but which were "not required for such purposes," should be retained by the council as a site for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than small-pox.

Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides, inter alia: "Any lands acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any powers in this Act contained and not required for the purpose for which they were acquired shall (unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct) be sold at the best price, &c."; and section 295 provides: "All orders made by the Local Government Board in pursuance of this Act shall be binding and conclusive in respect of the matters to which they refer. . . ."

This was an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Earl of Jersey. and the earl, against the Urban District Council of Hanwell, in which the plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting the hospital on the land or from using the same as the site of any such hospital, on the ground that their so doing would be a nuisance or injury to the plaintiff or his tenants or his adjacent land. The defendants denied that the proposed hospital would be a nuisance or injury, and relied on the order of the 3rd of April, 1897, of the Local Government Board.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the plaintiffs.—Land compulsorily purchased for a specified purpose under statutory powers cannot be applied to different purposes nor be sold as superfluous land. The order of the 3rd of April, 1897, is ultra vires: Glen on the Public Health Acts (11th ed.), p. 390; Attorney-General v. Corporation of Southampton, 1 Giff. 363, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 2; Attorney-General v. Corporation of Sunderland, 24 W. R. 991, 2 Ch. D. 634, W. N. (1873), pp. 174 and 221; Attorney-General v. Teddington Urban District Council, 46 W. R. 88, [1898] 1 Ch. 66; Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 175 and 131. The plaintiffs have a right to compensation if their land is injured: Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board, 38 W. R. 209, 14 App. Cas. 153.

Warrington, Q.C., and F. Stallard, for the defendants.—Land acquired for a specified purpose need not be used only for that purpose. Superfluous land not wanted may be sold. The part of the land in question is unsuitable for sewage purposes on account of its elevation. The Local Government Board had power to make this order under section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The order was obtained to avoid selling and then repurchasing under section 131 of the Act and section 11 of the Isolation Hospitals Act, 1893. The order of the Local Government Board is binding under section 295 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The plaintiffs cannot interfere with the erection of the hospital if the defendants are justified by the Acts, although they may get compensation if they are injured: Attorney-General v. Manchester Corporation, 41 W. R. 459, [1893] 2 Ch. 87.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question falling for decision in this case is an exceedingly simple one, and one, in my judgment, not admitting of reasonable doubt. The defendants, the Urban District Council of Hanwell, obtained powers by provisional orders granted under the authority of the Public Health Act of 1875 to purchase lands of the Earl of Jersey for sewage purposes, and they are proposing to use some parts of the lands so acquired for purposes which are not sewage purposes.

The land which it is proposed to devote to the hospital is not land which, according to present sewage science, can be devoted conveniently to the disposal of sewage. It lies higher than the other land and cannot be used for sewage purposes at present. It may be confessed by the defendants, and it is confessed, that it was a mistake to acquire that land for sewage purposes, though, of course, it was honestly acquired for that purpose in the first instance. I put that altogether aside. The principle on which one approaches a case of this kind is, that no public body, whether simply entrusted with powers for the benefit of the public, or, as a railway company, entrusted with powers primarily for the benefit of the public, can properly acquire land for the purposes sanctioned and then devote that land to purposes which are not sanctioned. Mr. Warrington suggested that in some of the cases there had been a breach of trust, but I am not sure that that may not introduce some confusion. The principle is that which I have mentioned, that the public body is authorized to buy land for the particular purpose. So far as it is not wanted for that purpose it is land which in one sense they ought not to hold. Whether they hold it under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act as superfluous land or whether they hold it under the Public Health Act with a direction to sell, is immaterial—it is not theirs. They have not got the fee simple freed from all charges, incumbrances, and limitations. They hold it only for certain purposes. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this, Can this particular public body be said to hold this particular land for the purpose of applying it as a site of a hospital? If they have not that power — if that is not within their ownership, the result is that they are proposing to use the property for purposes for which they are not authorized to use it, and on application by proper persons they must be restrained. The question as put by the defendants really depends on section 175 of the Public Health Act. They acquired the land originally with perfect propriety. They got a provisional order and they acquired the land under the Public Health Act, 1875, for sewage purposes. Now, the Act by section 175 says any lands acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any powers in this Act contained—that is to say, such lands as these—and not required for the purposes for which they were acquired—on that Mr. Warrington says that does not mean not required at any particular moment, but which, by some means or other, have been ascertained will never be, cannot possibly be required—for the particular purpose. To that I entirely assent. It is not a question of whether some one is of opinion that they cannot be required now or whether they will be required in time to come, but in order to make the section apply you must ascertain—a very difficult thing to do—that the land absolutely is not required for the purpose for which it has been acquired. Unless you arrive at that, you cannot apply the section at all. What is to happen then? It has to be sold at the best price that can be got from its sale, and directions are given as to the disposal of the proceeds of sale. I am not concerned as to whether this land ought to be sold now or not. That is not part of my inquiry now. The words of section 175 are "shall unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct be sold." If the Local Government Board has directed that it shall not be sold, then for the present purpose no further inquiry can be made; it will not be sold. But then Mr. Warrington goes on to argue that means and must mean that the Local Government Board may not merely direct the authority not to sell, but may at the same time direct the local authority to apply the land for other purposes. That seems introducing words which certainly are not in the statute, and for which, as far as I can see, there is no necessary implication. All that the Local Government Board has to say is, that they shall not be sold, leaving everything else open. Some further inquiry may be necessary, some further provisional order may be necessary, when the land may be applied to other purposes; but I see no reason for concluding that because the Local Government Board have a discretion to say that land not required, however conclusively it may have been ascertained that it is not required, shall not be sold, therefore it is empowered to say that it shall be applied to purposes other than those for which the land was originally required.

But then one is met by this order of the Local Government Board of the 3rd of April, 1897, and it is strange that though it purports to be made under the provisions of section 175 of the Public Health Act the draughtsman of the order did not see fit to follow the words of the Act. He does not say that the land "shall not be sold," he does not even say that the land shall be retained, which might be considered to be a verbal equivalent to the words "shall not be sold"; but the order says "shall be retained by the said council as a site for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than small-pox."

If I am right in my construction of the Act, there is not the slightest jurisdiction on the part of the Local Government Board to make any such order as that. That is giving the local authority a new power—a power entirely alien to that for which the land was acquired, and as I say on my construction of the Act entirely unauthorized. It is attempted to answer that by section 295, that "all orders made by the Local Government Board in pursuance of this Act shall be binding and conclusive in respect of the matters to which they refer." Yes, but that will not prevent the court from considering the question of jurisdiction on the part of the Local Government Board. It cannot be that an order by the Local Government Board made without jurisdiction shall be held conclusive in a court of justice. It must be the duty of the court to inquire whether the order could properly be made. If it could properly be made, then under section 295 it would be held to be conclusive, though perhaps there might be some irregularities about it, and though perhaps it ought not to have been made. But those are matters into which, at any rate for the present purpose, I shall assume the court ought not to inquire.

The authorities I do not think need be examined in detail; they were cited on behalf of the plaintiffs, and have been examined on behalf of the defendants. The only one I need refer to is that one before Romer, J., which shows precisely how the matter stands, and how it is viewed by the courts. I will assume now that the land need not be sold. I am not considering whether it ought to be sold or not. Nobody is complaining that it has not been sold. I am not going into that at all; the land is now in the possession of the defendants. The courts have held in more than one case—and Romer, J., held in that case—that retaining it for particular purposes did not necessarily mean that it was to be applied immediately to those purposes, but that the local authority must not devote the land so retained, and which had been acquired for particular purposes, to any purposes permanently inconsistent with the purposes for which had been acquired. Some of the other cases—the Sunderland case—showed that the courts would be liberal in construing the purposes for which it had been acquired—that purposes of an ancillary character might very well be brought within the description of the primary character of the purpose, but Romer, J., held, and it seems to me to be perfectly clear, that the local authority is not, without further order, justified in devoting the land acquired for a particular purpose to purposes which are not merely alien to that original purpose, but which will permanently interfere with the devotion of the land to the original purpose. It cannot be suggested that building a hospital is not permanently inconsistent with the use of this land for sewage purposes. It would be a permanent interference with the application of the land for those purposes.

To my mind Mr. Glen in the passage cited from his work on the Public Health Acts, is perhaps a little wanting in accuracy, having regard to the decisions, in saying that land compulsorily purchased for the purposes specified in the Act cannot be used for a different purpose. I think the statement ought to be, that it cannot be used for a different purpose which would permanently interfere with its devotion to its original purpose; but substantially no doubt to my mind that proposition is sound. The result is, therefore, that this local authority is, without any order on which it can properly rest, endeavouring to use this land for purposes for which it was not originally acquired; and that, it has no authority to do.

Now, as regards the parties. The Attorney-General, of course, is a proper complainant when we come to consider whether the local authority is exceeding its powers. Of course about that there could be no question. As regards Lord Jersey, the matter requires a little more consideration. He has sold this land for special purposes. He has not sold it except for special purposes, and it seems to me there must necessarily be vested in him some residuum of interest—that is to say, what is left out of a conveyance of the fee for special purposes only. He has not conveyed it for all purposes. But quite apart from that he is the owner of the surrounding property. Under the 128th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which is incorporated in the provisional order by means of the Public Health Act of 1875, he has certain rights of acquiring this property if eventually it is determined that it will not be required, and there is no direction to retain it given by the Local Government Board. That gives him, to my mind, a sufficient interest to maintain the action; but besides that there is no doubt it cannot be contended to the contrary that his adjoining land would become less marketable and less valuable by reason of the erection of this hospital. In that respect he has got an interest in preventing the authority from devoting the land to purposes for which he has not sold it. I think there must be an injunction to restrain the defendants from what I consider an excess of their statutory powers—that is, from using this two acres as a site for their hospital, and that they must pay the costs of the action.

Statute of Limitations 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42), s. 5—Husband and wife—Bond by husband—Life interest in bond property of wife—Interest on bond.

Acting within the provisions of the marriage settlement the trustees lent part of the trust funds to the husband on the security of his bond, conditioned for repayment of the sum advanced six months after date with interest at £4 per cent. The interest on the trust property so lent was payable to the wife for life, then to the husband for life. The wife died in 1876, the husband died in 1896, having lived together in amity during their joint lives, but the husband never having paid any interest on the bond.

Held, that under the circumstances the principle of Caton v. Rideout, 1 M. & G. 399, must be applied, and the hand to pay and to receive the interest having been the same, no payment over was necessary, and therefore the Statute of Limitations did not run, and the bond was still subsisting.

Interest is payable as interest and not as damages under a bond having a condition or defeasance to make void the same upon payment of a lesser sum at a day or place certain, even though no express mention of interest is made in the bond.

By a settlement dated the 7th of October, 1847, made on the marriage, which was afterwards solemnized, of Thomas Dixon with Jane Heynes, the one-fifth part of certain real estate was vested in trustees on trust to pay the income to the wife for life, with remainder to the husband for life, with remainders over. The settlement contained a power of sale and for re-investment with the consent of the husband or wife on real or personal security.

In 1852 the real estate was sold, and on the written request of the wife, Jane Dixon, the trustees lent the proceeds, amounting to £1,928 5s. 10d., to her husband, the said Thomas Dixon, on his giving to them his bond or obligation in writing. In pursuance of this, Thomas Dixon, by his bond dated the 13th of February, 1852, bound himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, in the penal sum of £3,856 11s. 8d., the consideration of the bond being that if he, his heirs, executors, or administrators should pay to the trustees of the settlement the full sum of £1,928 5s. 10d., with interest for the same at and after the rate of £4 per cent. per annum upon the 13th of August then next ensuing without any deduction or abatement whatsoever, then the obligation should be void and of no effect, or else should remain in full force and virtue.

The wife, Jane Dixon, was by the terms of the settlement entitled to the interest of the money secured by the bond for her life. She died in May, 1876, and her husband, the said Thomas Dixon, then became entitled to such interest for his life. He died on the 1st of January, 1896, never having repaid to the trustees any part of the said sum of £1,928 5s. 10d., and never having paid any interest in respect of the bond. It appeared that Thomas and Jane Dixon had since their marriage wholly lived together in amity.

The present action was instituted by the trustees of the settlement of the 1st of October, 1847, against the defendants, who were the executors of Thomas Dixon, and they claimed that there was due to them from the estate of the said Thomas Dixon under the bond the sum of £1,928 5s. 10d., with interest at 4 per cent. from the 1st of January, 1896.

Farwell, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the plaintiffs.—The debt is not statute-barred. The explanation of the trustees not demanding payment of interest must be that, as the husband and wife were living together she allowed her husband to receive her separate income. The hand to pay and the hand to receive were the same, and the statute does not run: In re Hawes, 41 W. R. 173; Caton v. Rideout, 1 Mac. & G. 599; Mills v. Borthwich, 13 W. R. 707; Amos v. Smith, 10 W. R. 759, 1 H. & C. 238.

Levett, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the defendants.—A bond debt such as here did not strictly carry interest, and if recovered in an action it really is as damages for breach of the contract: Cook v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 27, 22 W. R. 260; In re Roberts. 22 W. R. 870, 14 Ch. D. 49. The debt here is statute-barred.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.

BYRNE, J.—The case of Bonafous v. Rybot, 3 Burr. 1370, was heard on argument of a rule obtained under the Act 4 & 5 Anne c. 16, s. 13, whereby it was enacted "That if at any time pending an action upon any such bond with a penalty ('such bond' meaning any bond with a condition or defeasance to make it void on payment of a lesser sum at a day or place certain) the defendant shall bring into the court where the action shall be depending all the principal money and interest due on such bond, and also all such costs as have been expended in any suit or suits in law or equity upon such bond; the said money so brought in shall be deemed and taken to be in full satisfaction and discharge of the said bond, and the court shall and may give judgment to discharge every such defendant of and from the same accordingly," and in giving judgment Lord Mansfield said: "It is surprising that after the Statute of Usury, 37 Hen. 8, which excepts obligations with condition made upon a just and true intent, the courts of law did not consider the just intent of a bond to be principal, interest, and costs secured by a penalty, and suffer the party at any time to save the forfeiture by performing the intent. It is more extraordinary that, after this was settled in a court of equity 'to be the nature of a bond' and therefore every party to a bond understood it in this sense, the courts of law did not follow equity but still continued to do injustice as of course, and put the parties to the delay and expense of setting it right elsewhere as of course." I ought to add that Lord Bramwell in Preston v. Dania, 21 W. R. 128, L. R. 8, Ex. 19, at p. 22 expresses disagreement with the observations of Lord Mansfield as to the injustice of the course formerly adopted by the courts of law, but I do not understand him to dissent from Lord Mansfield's statement of the practice of courts of equity, nor does he dissent from the construction put upon the statute of Anne as applied to common money bonds; but this case did decide that the statute of Anne does not apply to bonds for moneys payable by instalments.

Reading these cases with the cases of Farquhar v. Morris, 7 T. R. 124, and Amos v. Smith; I think that interest is payable as interest and not as damages under a bond having a condition or defeasance to make void the same upon payment of a lesser sum at a "day or place certain," even although no express mention of interest is made in the bond, and I cannot see any just reason for holding that the amount of interest recoverable is diminished by reason only of the bond being conditioned for payment of principal and interest up to or at a certain date. The bond may be so framed as to show an intent to limit interest recoverable as up to a specified date; but in my judgment it wants more than the circumstance I have referred to to show such an intent.

In the present case the trustees lawfully lent a sum of money on the personal security of his bond to the husband. That loan on bond was an investment within their power, and the trustees could have recovered interest from the husband so long as the bond was unredeemed. If they had claimed and received interest it would have been their duty to hand it over to the wife, who might or might not have handed it to the husband for their common use. For more than twenty years no interest was claimed from the husband, the wife (being a party to the direction to the trustees to lend the money) never called upon the trustees to enforce payment. She and her husband lived in amity until her death, and I think the right inference to draw under the circumstances is that she allowed her trustees to forbear demanding interest from her husband to avoid the absurdity of obtaining payment by the husband to the trustees, payment by the trustees to herself, and then handing it back to her husband.

It appears to me that the principle of Caton v. Rideout, applies. In Edward v. Cheyne, 13 App. Cas. 385, 36 W. R. Dig. 173, Lord Watson says (p. 390): [His lordship read the passages he referred to, and proceeded:] I do not think that Kindersley, V.C., in Mills v. Borthwich, meant to lay down any rule adverse to what I have stated as my view in reference to a bond conditioned like the present, although he did call attention to the fact that the condition was not that the husband should pay in six months certainly, but only if he should be called upon to do so. Cook v. Fowler was not the case of a bond, but the case of a warrant of attorney and defeasance, and not such a debt as before 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, would have been held to carry interest, so that interest could only have been given by way of damages. The case, therefore, does not appear to be applicable to the present one.

I think that In re Hawes, although distinguishable from the present case on the ground that it had relation to an advance to the husband upon mortgage, is nevertheless in point when once the conclusion is arrived at that the loan upon bond was an authorized security within the terms of the trust, and was one, moreover, which the trustees could not change without the consent of husband and wife.

In Spickernell v. Hotham, 2 W. R. 638, Kay 673, the covenant was to transfer certain £4 per cent. annuities to trustees to hold upon certain trusts, and Wood, V.C., held that as the trust fund never had any existence he could not assume that a person had been paying himself the interest of a non-existing fund—that is, the trust security never came into existence.

In Stone v. Stone, 18 W. R. 225, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 74, no trust fund or security had ever come into existence, and it was held that the covenant was simply a legal obligation barred by lapse of time. These cases seem to me to be distinguishable, therefore, from the present one.

I do not think that the fact of the bond being found in the possession of the husband is sufficient evidence from which I ought to infer payment. I think that the explanation suggested in the affidavits—namely, that it came into his possession by mistake, is probably the true one.

The result is that I feel entitled to hold, and do hold, that the hand to pay and the hand to receive were, during the lifetime of the wife as well as afterwards, the same, and that consequently the bond debt is not barred.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by originating summons by two of the trustees of the will of the late Henry Danson for an order under section 25 of the Trustee Act, 1893, appointing a new trustee of the will in the place of one R. J. Martinez Danson, who had been convicted of felony and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. On behalf of the convict trustee the objection was taken that the court had no jurisdiction on an application by originating summons to make an order removing a trustee against his will, and it was urged that such an order could only be made in an action commenced by writ, and that the case did not come within ord. 55, r. 13*a*, which set out the applications under the Trustee Act which could be made by summons.

Q. B. Div. } Nov. 7.

WRIDE (Appellant) v. DYER (Respondent). (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Yearly tenant—Notice to quit—Alternative notice—"End of current year's tenancy"—Sufficiency of notice.

A notice given on the 24th of March, 1898, to a tenant from year to year holding from the 25th of March to the 25th of March in each year, to quit "on the 24th of June, 1898, or at the end of your current year's tenancy," is a good notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899, and determines the tenancy on that day.

Case stated by justices of the peace for Weston-super-Mare.

On the 5th of May, 1899, an application by the respondent to recover certain premises known as No. 4, Holland-street, Weston-super-Mare, from the appellant under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 74), was heard by the justices, when the following facts were proved or admitted.

The respondent was the owner of the premises, which were held by the appellant as tenant to the respondent upon a yearly tenancy from Lady Day to Lady Day, at a rent not exceeding £20 a year. The contract of tenancy was verbal, and there was no special agreement or any custom as to the time or mode of determining the tenancy.

On the 24th of March, 1898, a notice to quit was served by the respondent upon the appellant, which notice was as follows:

"I hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up to me all that cottage, garden, and premises which you hold or rent of me, situate at and known as No. 4, Holland-street, Ashcombe, Weston-super-Mare, on the 24th day of June, 1898, or at the end of your current year's tenancy."

The appellant did not quit the premises, and, after due notice, application was made to the justices to issue their warrant as provided by the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, directing constables to enter and take possession of the premises and eject the appellant.

The appellant appeared before the justices and contended that the tenancy had not been duly determined by a legal notice to quit, and that consequently the justices had no jurisdiction under the statute to issue their warrant, and the grounds of the objection were that the notice was not a legal notice and did not operate to determine the tenancy, as the tenancy being a yearly tenancy from the 25th day of March of each year could only be determined by at least half-a-year's notice to quit at the end of a year of the tenancy; and that the notice was either a three months' notice to quit on the 24th of June, 1898, which was not the end of a year of the tenancy, or a one day's notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1898, which day was the end of the year's tenancy current on the 24th of March, 1898, when the notice was served.

It was admitted for the respondent that the notice was not a legal notice to quit on the 24th of June, 1898, but it was contended on his behalf that it was a legal notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899, and that the yearly tenancy was determined by such notice.

The justices held that the notice was a legal notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899, and that the yearly tenancy of the appellant was thereby determined, and they issued their warrant accordingly for ejecting the appellant.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the notice to quit was a legal notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899, and whether the yearly tenancy of the appellant was thereby determined on the 25th of March, 1899.

Brooke Little, for the appellant.—It is conceded that the notice was not a good notice to quit on the 24th of June, 1898, and the only question is whether it was a good notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899. There is no ambiguity in the terms of the notice, and it must be read strictly. It is a notice given on the 24th of March, 1898, to quit at the end of the current year's tenancy—that is, on the 25th of March, 1898, which could not be a good notice. The case of Doe v. Morphett, 7 Q. B. 577, shows that the notice is not a good notice. In that case the previous case of Doe v. Culliford, 4 Dow. & Ry. 248, in which a notice of this kind was held to be a good six months' notice was commented upon, and was said to be bad law, and it may be taken as having been overruled, and is treated as overruled in Cole on Ejectment, p. 52. Doe v. Morphett, being the later case, ought to be followed, and that case shows that this is not a good notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899.

Layman (Weatherly with him), for the respondent, was not called upon.

RIDLEY, J.—I think this appeal should be dismissed, and I should say very little about the case but for the authorities that have been cited to us. Now, the notice is in these terms: "I hereby give you notice to quit on the 24th of June, 1898, or at the end of your current year's tenancy"; and the question is whether that is a good notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899.

I think it was a good notice to quit on the 25th of March, 1899. I think that in considering these notices it is necessary to consider the terms of each notice as the application of the principle varies in each case. No two notices are identical, and we can only extract the principle from the previous decisions. In Doe v. Morphett the earlier case of Doe v. Culliford was disapproved of and treated as bad law, and it was said that the judgment of Bayley, J., in that case was incorrect. With the greatest possible respect I think that judgment was correct, and I do not find anything in conflict with it in the later case. In Doe v. Culliford it seems to me that precisely the same principle of law was applied as is usually applicable in such cases. Abbott, C.J., there says that the rule of construction in such cases is to give such a sense to ambiguous words as will effectuate the intention of the parties; and Bayley, J., says that the rule is to make the notice sensible, not insensible. In this case I do not think that any person could have intended to give a notice to quit to expire in a few hours afterwards; and therefore we ought to say that the notice ought not to be read as applying to the current year ending on the 25th of March, 1898, but to the year ending on the 25th of March, 1899.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is argued that we should read these words in the notice, "at the end of your current year's tenancy," as meaning this—that "I, the landlord, give you notice to quit on to-morrow," because, if we are to construe these words strictly, the notice would be a notice to quit on the morning after the notice. What is the rule we have to apply? It was laid down in 1824 in Doe v. Culliford, and in 1836 in the case of Doe d. Williams v. Smith, 5 A. & E. 350, the case of Doe v. Culliford was cited in argument, and Lord Denman, C.J., said "I think this notice was well enough"; and Littledale, J., said that we must endeavour to give the notice a rational interpretation. Would it be giving a rational interpretation to this notice to say that it was a notice to quit on the following morning? If we wanted to give the notice an irrational interpretation that would be the one to give. It is then said that the judges in the later case of Doe v. Morphett intended to overrule what was said in Doe v. Culliford; but in Doe d. Williams v. Smith, Doe v. Culliford was cited, and not a word of disapproval of it was expressed by the court. Then, nine years later, came the case of Doe v. Morphett, which disapproved of Doe v. Culliford; but, apart from that, there is plenty of authority for us to decide that this was a good notice for the 25th of March, 1899, and, in so holding I found myself on the words of Lord Denman himself in Doe d. Williams v. Smith when he said, "I think this notice was well enough."

LAGUNAS NITRATE CO. v. LAGUNAS NITRATE SYNDICATE (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Promoters—Directors—Sale by promoters to company—No independent board—Duties of directors—Validity of contract—Breach of trust—Misrepresentation—Voidable contract—Rescission—Change of position.

company to furnish the company with an independent board of directors, if the truth is disclosed to the persons who are induced to join the company. Consequently, if a company is avowedly formed with a board of directors who are not independent, but who are stated to be the intended vendors, or agents of the intended vendors, of property to the company, the company cannot set aside an agreement entered into by the directors for the purchase of such property simply because they are not an independent board.

In the absence of fraud, the right to rescind such a contract on the ground of misrepresentations contained in the prospectus of the company cannot be enforced where the property has been worked so as to materially alter the position of the parties.

Directors who act within their powers and honestly for the benefit of the company, and with reasonable care, discharge both their legal and equitable duties to the company. The fact that they are both promoters and directors will not necessarily be held to prove that it was impossible for them to discharge their duties to the company, at any rate in a case where there was full disclosure of their position.

A syndicate formed a company to buy certain property of the syndicate. The directors of the company were the directors of the syndicate, and before a prospectus was issued they entered into an agreement with the syndicate to buy the property. A prospectus was subsequently issued, which disclosed the fact that the directors were vendors, but contained misrepresentations of fact. The company bought and worked the property. Subsequently fresh directors were appointed, and they commenced an action against the syndicate for misrepresentation. The company continued to work the property after the action had commenced.

Held, by Lindley, M.R., and Collins, L.J. (Rigby, L.J., dissentiente), that the company were not entitled to rescission merely on the ground that the contract had been entered into without independent advice, and that the working of the property by the company had so altered the position of the parties as to deprive the company of its right to rescission on the ground of misrepresentations contained in the prospectus. The directors of the company, having acted intra vires and with reasonable care and honestly for the benefit of the company, were not liable to make good any loss the company might have sustained through entering into the agreement with the syndicate.

Decision of Romer, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Romer, J.

The facts of the case and the view taken by the court of the evidence will appear from the judgments, and it will be sufficient to state them shortly as follow:

The defendants, the Lagunas Syndicate (Limited), was incorporated in 1889, with a capital of £110,000, to acquire by agreement with Colonel North the "Lagunas Nitrate Works," which consisted of 548 estacas of land in Chili and the buildings, plant, and machinery in and about the same, and to resell portions to companies to be formed by the syndicate. An estaca is a Spanish measure equivalent to between six and seven acres. The property was acquired for £110,000, payable as to £109,300 in fully paid-up shares of the syndicate and as to the balance in cash.

In the year 1894 the Lagunas Nitrate Co. (Limited) was promoted by the syndicate for the purpose of acquiring 200 of the 548 estacas with an oficina or factory erected thereon, otherwise called a maquina, with the plant and stock and a certain supply of water. The directors of the syndicate prepared the memorandum and articles of association of the syndicate and thereby provided that the company should carry into effect a draft agreement which they also prepared.

The company was registered under the Companies Acts on the 15th of June, 1894. The directors of the syndicate, seven in number, were the first directors of the company, and they, with two other persons, signed the memorandum. The memorandum stated that the company had been formed to acquire lands and works the property of the syndicate, and in particular to carry into effect an agreement already prepared by the syndicate.

By article 5 the directors were authorized to carry the agreement into effect, and on the 18th of June, 1894, the agreement was entered into under the seals of the company and the syndicate. The agreement provided that the company should acquire 200 estacas of the syndicate's nitrate grounds and one-third of the existing water supply of the syndicate for a price of £850,000, of which £550,000 was payable in cash and £300,000 in fully paid-up shares of the company. The company were to be bound by an agreement of the 1st of July, 1890, between the Nitrate Railways Co. (Limited) and the syndicate for the carriage of goods over the company's line for ten years, also by an agreement of the 19th of August, 1890, whereby the syndicate had appointed the firm of North & Jewell port agents of the syndicate on the west coast of South America for ten years, and by an agreement of the 21st of December, 1891, whereby the syndicate had appointed the firm of W. & J. Lockett, of Liverpool, the sole mercantile agents in England of the syndicate for ten years. If the company failed to satisfy the syndicate on or before the 24th of June, 1894, that the £600,000 for which the public were by the prospectus to be invited to subscribe had been subscribed for in cash and allotted to responsible persons, the syndicate might, by notice at any time before the 30th of September, 1894, the date fixed for completion of the contract, annul the sale. On the 18th of June, 1894, the directors of the syndicate, in their character as directors of the company, issued a prospectus substantially in the form of the draft they had already prepared. The prospectus invited subscriptions for £600,000 of the nominal share capital of the company. It stated that the nitrate grounds of the syndicate acquired by the company were "believed to contain the richest deposit of caliche" (the raw product from which nitrate was manufactured) "in the province of Tarapaca," that the officina was capable of manufacturing 300,000 quintals of nitrate of soda per month, that the syndicate had obtained and had brought in pipes into Lagunas a supply of water, and that the company would have the right of using one-third of the surplus water of the syndicate after supplying the requirements of the railway company, that the company would have the benefit of the said agreements with Messrs. North & Jewell and Messrs. W. & J. Lockett, that the syndicate was formed in 1889 to acquire and develop the Lagunas, and that it was now selling (at a profit) to the company a portion only of its property, with an oficina "in complete working order." It also stated that the directors of the company were directors of the syndicate and held a considerable portion of the shares of the syndicate. The only agreement entered into was stated to be the agreement of the 18th of June, 1894. The company's shares were duly allotted and the property comprised in the agreement was conveyed to and worked by the company. The syndicate, at the company's request, made considerable outlays in putting the oficina in complete working order, and in providing further necessary water supply, which was completed in December, 1894. Large dividends were paid by the company and the shares received by the syndicate in part payment of the purchase-money were sold by the syndicate at a premium. In January and February, 1895, resolutions were passed for a voluntary winding up of the syndicate, and liquidators were appointed, one of whom, George Fleming, was a director both of the company and the syndicate. Towards the end of 1895 the shareholders of the company compelled three of the original directors to retire and appointed three independent directors in their places. These new directors proceeded to investigate the facts connected with the formation of the company and the sale to it of the Lagunas. On the 3rd of December, 1895, a Mr. Porlitz, another independent director, joined the board. After the death of Colonel North on the 9th of May, 1896, the voting power of the board ceased to be under the control of the syndicate directors. Ultimately on the 12th of June, 1896, the present action was commenced against the syndicate and its liquidators, the five original directors of the company and the syndicate, and the executors of the two original directors of the syndicate and the company who were dead, Colonel North and Maurice Jewell. The plaintiffs claimed (1) rescission of the agreement of the 18th of June, 1894; (2) payment by the defendants of £39,000 expended by the plaintiffs in putting the oficina into working order; (3) an indemnity by the defendants in an action brought in the Queen's Bench Division by Messrs. W. & J. Lockett to recover various sums of money alleged to be due under the agreements of the 21st of December, 1891, and the 18th of June, 1894; (4) alternatively an account of all profits made by the syndicate and the directors, and payment made to the company of the amount so due with interest; (5) damages against the syndicate and the directors, and the estates of such of them as were dead, for misrepresentation, misfeasance, breach of trust, and breach of warranty; (6) damages against the syndicate. At a meeting of the company held on the 29th of July, 1896, a resolution was passed sanctioning the continuance of the action. In August the same year the remaining syndicate directors retired. The company continued to carry on business notwithstanding the action, and in April, 1897, an interim dividend of 4 per cent. was declared, but on legal advice was not paid. The company did not allege fraud but based its action on misrepresentations of fact in the prospectus, the want of independent advice, and non-disclosure of Colonel North's interest in the agreement with Messrs. Lockett.

Romer, J., directed an inquiry as to loss sustained by the company by reason of the maquina not being in complete working order on the 30th of June, 1894, and of defective water supply, and dismissed the rest of the action.

The company appealed.

June 26.—LINDLEY, M.R.—This appeal involves the proper application to a company peculiarly formed and to a large number of disputed facts of a few well-settled principles of law which, in their application to this case, appear to me to conflict with each other. The first principle is that in equity the promoters of a company stand in a fiduciary relation to it and to those persons whom they induce to become shareholders in it, and cannot in equity bind the company by any contract with themselves without fully and fairly disclosing to the company all material facts which the company ought to know. The New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger, 25 W. R. 436 and 27 ib. 65, 5 Ch. D. 73 and 3 App. Cas. 1218, is the leading authority in support of this general proposition. The second principle is that a company, when registered, is a corporation, capable by its directors of binding itself by a contract with them as promoters, if all material facts are disclosed. Salomon v. Salomon & Co., 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22, is the leading authority for this principle. The third principle is that the directors of a company, acting within their powers, and with reasonable care and honestly in the interest of the company, are not personally liable for losses which the company may suffer by reason of their mistakes or errors in judgment. Overend, Gurney, & Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 H. L. 480, is the leading authority on this head. A fourth principle, not confined to companies but extending to them, is, that a contract can be set aside in equity on proof that one party induced the other to enter into it by misrepresentations of material facts, although such misrepresentations may not have been fraudulent. A fifth principle is that a voidable contract cannot be rescinded or set aside after the position of the parties has been changed so that they cannot be restored to their former position. Fraud may exclude the application of this principle, but I know of no other exception. With these preliminary observations I proceed to examine the facts of this case. The Lagunas Nitrate Co. was promoted and formed by the directors of another company called the Lagunas Nitrate Syndicate, in order to buy property belonging to the syndicate. The memorandum and articles of association of the syndicate show that in promoting and forming the nitrate company the directors of the syndicate were acting within and not beyond their powers as such directors. The syndicate, therefore, as a company, may be properly described and ought to be regarded as the promoter by its directors of the nitrate company. The syndicate, therefore, is responsible for the acts and omissions of its directors in promoting and forming the nitrate company. The directors of the syndicate and the actual promoters and creators of the nitrate company were Colonel North, Messrs. Harvey, R. R. Lockett, Edmondson, Fleming, Murray, and M. Jewell. These seven persons and two others signed the memorandum and articles of association of the nitrate company. The nitrate company was registered on the 15th of June, 1894. The memorandum and articles of association require attention, for they contain statements of great importance. The memorandum states that the company has been formed to acquire land and works of the syndicate, and its engagements and liabilities with reference thereto, and particularly to complete and carry into effect (with such modifications, if any, as may be thought fit) an agreement already prepared and settled for the purchase of that property from the syndicate. Article 5 required the directors to complete and carry into effect (with such modifications, if any, as they might think fit) the agreement with the syndicate referred to in the memorandum of association. Article 57 named the seven persons above mentioned as the first directors of the nitrate company, and stated that they were all directors and the only directors of the syndicate. In addition to these three articles, it is to be observed that article 66 enabled the company by extraordinary resolution to remove any director, and articles 82 and 83 conferred upon the directors extensive powers of acting for the company in all matters of business. Before any prospectus was issued, and before any other person in addition to the nine who had subscribed the memorandum of association had joined the company—viz., on the 18th of June, 1894—the agreement referred to in the memorandum and articles of association was executed by the syndicate and the company under their respective seals. It is important to consider the effect of this step. By sections 11 and 16 of the Companies Act, 1862, the memorandum and articles became binding on the company and the members thereof. These sections did not render the nitrate company bound to the syndicate by the agreement referred to in the memorandum and articles of the nitrate company, but those documents clearly authorized the directors to affix the seal of the nitrate company to that agreement, with or without modification, and to bind that company to the syndicate by so doing. As soon as that agreement was sealed by the two companies that which before was no agreement at all became the agreement of both of them. The decision in Erlanger's case, on which the appellants mainly rely, and which is one of the most valuable decisions on the duties of promoters to the companies which they bring into existence, does not warrant the conclu ion that the contract between the two companies can be treated as no contract at all, and as a piece of paper not binding the nitrate company either at law or in equity. Nor is it possible, after the decision in Salomon's case, to treat that contract as so opposed to the Companies Acts as to be ultra vires the nitrate company, or to be void upon the ground that there were not in truth two parties capable of contracting with one another. If the syndicate brought an action against the nitrate company for a breach of the agreement, the nitrate company could not successfully defend itself by a plea of non est factum, or by a mere denial of the existence of any agreement. If the agreement can be set aside, it must be upon some other ground. The first ground relied upon is this—the formation of the nitrate company itself without an independent body of directors. Notwithstanding all that was said in Erlanger's case about the duty of the promoters of a company to furnish it with an independent board of directors, that decision does not require, or, indeed, justify, the conclusion that. if a company is avowedly formed with a board of directors who are not independent, but who are stated to be the intended vendors, or the agents of the intended vendors, of property to the company, the company can set aside an agreement entered into by them for the purchase of that property simply because they are not an independent board. What vitiated the agreement in Erlanger's case was the concealment of the fact that two out of the three managing directors were agents of the vendors and promoters; and the untrue statement that a provisional contract had been entered into by the directors, while in fact it had only been framed by the promoters and adopted by three directors, two of whom were not known to be agents of the promoters, and the third of whom knew nothing about the matter. In the present case there is no secrecy or concealment of the true position of the first directors, and no untrue statement as to what they did for the company. In the face of the memorandum and articles of association it is impossible to treat the nitrate company, or the members thereof, as ignorant of the real truth as to the position of its directors. After Salomon's case I think it impossible to hold that it is the duty of the promoters of a company to provide it with an independent board of directors if the real truth is disclosed to those who are induced by the promoters to join the company. Treating promoters of companies as in a fiduciary relation to them and as having a power of appointing trustees (viz., directors) I cannot treat companies or their shareholders as so many cestuis que trustent under disability, nor even as cestuis que trustent for whom trustees are appointed without their consent. No one need join a company unless he likes, and if a person knows that if he becomes a member he will find as directors persons who in his opinion ought not to be directors he should not join the company. If he does he has no right to redress on the ground that improper persons were appointed trustees. Volenti non fit injuria applies in such a case to the members of the company, and Salomon's case shows that the company in its corporate capacity is in this respect in no better position. On these grounds the nitrate company is not, in my opinion, entitled to relief against the syndicate or its directors on the ground that they did wrong in creating the nitrate company with such provisions as are contained in the instruments by which it was created and which govern its existence. The principles on which Salomon's case was decided by the House of Lords are quite consistent with those on which Erlanger's case was decided, but are quite inconsistent with such an extension of those principles as would be necessary to give the nitrate company relief against those who formed it on the ground that they formed it with an objectionable constitution. But it by no means follows that the nitrate company has no rights against the syndicate or its directors for misrepresentation or breach of duty as promoters. Notwithstanding the memorandum and articles of association of the nitrate company, that company may have a right to repudiate the contract into which it entered with the syndicate. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the principles on which such a right must be rested. The possible grounds for impeaching the agreement are (1) fraud; (2) misrepresentation, although not fraudulent; (3) nondisclosure of material facts. Fraud was distinctly abandoned as a ground of relief both as against the syndicate and as against the other defendants. But the abandonment of the charge of fraud does not affect the right to relief on the other grounds if established. Nor can evidence to prove them be rejected simply because the same evidence might be used to support a charge of fraud if made. But the abandonment of the charge of fraud as a ground for relief extends to the whole case and precludes the nitrate company from seeking relief on the ground of fraud either in entering into the contract or in not repudiating it. It is important to bear this in mind, because there are cases in which fraud subsequent to a contract may not only afford a defence to an action on it, but may confer a right to have it rescinded: see Panama and South Pacific Telegraph Co. v. India Rubber, &c., Co., 23 W. R. 583, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 515, where, after a contract was entered into, fraud was committed by one of the parties by bribing the agent of the other. Misrepresentation and concealment of material facts remain to be considered. With reference to these it is important to ask to whom any misrepresentation was made and from whom any material facts were concealed before the agreement was entered into. There is no evidence to show, nor any reason to believe, that any misrepresentation was made to or any material fact was concealed from any person who was a member of the company at that date. The seven promoters of the company and the two other persons who signed the memorandum were then the only members. Three of the promoters were personally acquainted with the Lagunas, and their four associates, who were co-directors of the syndicate, had learned from them all the material facts relating to the property which they were selling. One of the two remaining signatories of the memorandum and articles of association of the nitrate company was the solicitor both of the syndicate and of the nitrate company, and the other was a brother of one of the seven promoters and secretary of the syndicate. It would be unreasonable to treat them as in any way deceived or misled. They do not allege that they were, and the history of the case fairly leads to the inference that they were not. If, then, the case stopped here the decision of the House of Lords in Salomon's case would preclude the company from having the agreement set aside. But in that case care was taken to point out that no other persons besides the promoter and his nominees ever became shareholders. No prospectus was issued, and no one else was invited to take, nor did any one else take, any share in the company. Here it was intended from the first to raise a large capital by appealing to the public. The promoters prepared a prospectus before the company was formed, and, although it was not issued until after the company was formed and until after the contract was executed, its issue must, as between the two companies, be treated as the act of the syndicate and of its directors, and not merely as the act of the nitrate company. The nitrate company, although in one sense formed when registered, was not completely formed as contemplated by the promoters until a prospectus had been issued and a large capital had been subscribed. The issue of the prospectus was the last act of the promotion. If, therefore, the prospectus concealed or misrepresented any material facts the nitrate company would be in a position to impeach the agreement, and Salomon's case would be inapplicable. The nitrate company would be in a position to say that there was such a breach of duty on the part of the promoters and directors in misrepresenting and concealing material facts that the contract could not stand in equity. To such a state of things Erlanger's case and Adam v. Newbigging, 37 W. R. 97, 13 App. Cas. 308, and the well-known observations of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in In re British Seamless Paper Box Co., 29 W. R. 690, 17 Ch. D. 467 at p. 471, are much more applicable than Salomon's case. The prospectus must, I think, be read in connection with the recitals in the contract between the two companies. The two together contain the statements which the syndicate and its directors made when they were promoting and forming the nitrate company, and were inducing persons to join it. The most important document is the prospectus. The case is remarkable in one respect. There is no person who has come forward to say that he was misled by the prospectus. But it does not follow that the nitrate company in its corporate capacity may not prove a case entitling it to relief. It may prove such concealment of material facts or such misrepresentations as to entitle it to repudiate the contract unless the defendants can show that the members of the company knew the real truth and were not, therefore, imposed upon. I proceed, therefore, to consider the respects in which the prospectus and the recitals in the contract are alleged to be misleading. The matters complained of relate to (1) the land, that is the ground or mineral to be taken; (2) the water supply necessary for working it; (3) the oficina or works and their state and sufficiency; and (4) the agreement with W. & J. Lockett. The evidence bearing on these matters was minutely examined by counsel, and it would be sheer waste of time to examine it again. I will state the conclusions at which I have arrived. (1) As regards the land or mineral to be taken, the evidence satisfies me that all the 200 acres were not rich in caliche. Some contained little, if any; how much it is extremely difficult to say. Most of the 200 acres are, in my opinion, shown to have contained a large quantity of rich caliche. They had contained more, but a considerable quantity had been worked out. The prospectus did not contain any positive misrepresentation, but I think it exaggerated the truth. (2) As to the water supply, the conclusion at which I have arrived is that, if there were nothing else to complain of, the prospectus was in this respect distinctly and seriously misleading. The evidence, in my opinion, establishes (a) That there was in the district in which the Lagunas belonging to the syndicate were situate an ample supply of fresh water; and Colonel North and the other vendors who knew the district were perfectly confident that such was the case, and they were right. (b) That attempts to get this water in sufficient quantity had been made by the vendors all through the first six months of 1894, and that until the well No. 10 was sunk all those attempts were disappointing and were known to the syndicate to be unsatisfactory. (c) That in June, 1894, well No. 10 was sunk, and it was believed to be all that was required. (d) That before that prospectus was issued this well also was found and was known to the syndicate not to be yielding enough water. (e) That the cause of this was not due to injury by riot nor to wilful breaking by workmen or others. That mismanagement was one cause, but there was also an insufficient supply of water at that well for the works dependent on it. (f) That between June and December, 1894, the syndicate made strenuous efforts to get more water, and ultimately succeeded in getting an adequate supply for the wants of the nitrate company which has never in fact suffered from a defective supply since the end of 1894. (g) That even now if the nitrate company got only one-third of the total supply obtained by the syndicate such one-third might not be sufficient for the wants of the nitrate company. (3) As regards the oficina or works I am not prepared to say that if there had been adequate water supply and an adequate supply of labour and if the works had been complete and in good working order they would not have been capable of turning out, if required, the amount of nitrate of soda mentioned in the prospectus. Nor do I think that a few things, however essential, which had been ordered and had not arrived when the prospectus was issued, but which were supplied soon afterwards, afforded any ground for repudiating the contract. Nor do I think the non-existence of an iodine house afforded, by itself, any ground for repudiating it. Moreover, I am satisfied that many of the outlays made by the nitrate company for buildings and entered in the construction account were not necessary for working the oficina, however desirable in other respects. But, after making all due allowance for these matters and for no little exaggeration, I have come to the conclusion that, looked at fairly, the oficina was not really complete and in such good working order as it was represented in the prospectus. The heavy cost of the repairs goes far to show this. (4) As regards the Lockett agreement, it was no doubt both onerous and unusual. But it was distinctly referred to, and I am not prepared to say that the prospectus can be fairly regarded as so misleading by reason of this agreement as to confer on the nitrate company a right to repudiate its contract. But it cannot be cast aside as wholly immaterial. Another matter, not perhaps in itself sufficient to vitiate the contract, but still by no means to be neglected as unimportant, is that the promoters knew that in order to ensure success the market price of nitrate of soda would have to be kept up by a combination of manufacturers, which the nitrate company would have to join. There is nothing in the prospectus to lead the shareholders to suppose that the company's prospects of success depended on anything of this sort, although, of course, as business men they must have known that the profitable working of the company depended on the price at which it could sell its nitrate when obtained, and that the market price must depend on supply and demand. Having regard to what was disclosed and to the avowed object of the company, I do not consider the non-disclosure of the price paid by the syndicate for the Lagunas and of the profit made by the sale to the nitrate company as fatal to the validity of the sale. But, putting together the results arrived at from the evidence, and above summarized, I consider it established that the prospectus was seriously misleading, and that the nitrate company had a right to repudiate the contract by reason of the failure of the syndicate to inform it of the real state of things, which was, in fact, seriously misrepresented, or, at least, not properly disclosed in the prospectus, although such misrepresentation and non-disclosure were not fraudulent. The directors of the nitrate company no doubt knew all the facts, but they were the persons who failed to disclose them, and who, as directors of the syndicate, formed the nitrate company. To impute to the nitrate company the knowledge which the directors had acquired in another capacity, and which knowledge they did not disclose to any one, is neither law nor sense. Again, it is true that the prospectus was issued by the nitrate company and would have to be so treated as between that company and any one except the directors and the syndicate for whom they acted in issuing the prospectus. But the circumstance that the prospectus was issued by the nitrate company itself could not avail the syndicate who procured the issue of the prospectus by the nitrate company, and thereby completed the promotion and formation of the nitrate company. If the nitrate company had sued the syndicate for a rescission of the contract shortly after it had been entered into, the syndicate would, in my opinion, have had no defence to the action. It becomes necessary to consider now the position of the nitrate company and of the syndicate relatively to each other after the promotion of the former company by the latter was ended. The two companies cannot, in my opinion, be regarded any longer, and as to future acts unconnected with the promotion of the nitrate company, as in any fiduciary relation to each other. They are distinct commercial bodies with the same persons as directors, but they cannot be regarded as two firms with common partners. Still less can the directors of the nitrate company in transacting its business as its agents be treated as agents of the syndicate. What the directors do as the agents of the one company cannot be properly treated as done by them for the other. For all business purposes the two boards must be kept distinct. The incorporation of the two companies renders this essential. The obligations of the syndicate towards the nitrate company arising out of its promotion stand, however, on a different footing, and we have to consider whether the nitrate company has lost the right to have the contract set aside, which right I have already stated I am of opinion it had. This right rests, in my judgment, not on the memorandum or articles of association, nor on the formation of the nitrate company, but on the issue of the prospectus for which as between the two companies the syndicate is responsible. The persons who issued the prospectus and whose failure to disclose the material facts gave rise to the right to rescind were the directors of the nitrate company and the agents of the syndicate. Had those same persons any authority to release or discharge the syndicate from the consequences of their own breach of duty? Special authority conferred by the members of the nitrate company there was none. Their authority, if any, to do so must be found in the general authority conferred upon them by the articles of association of the nitrate company. But I cannot construe that general authority as authorizing the directors to screen or absolve themselves and their principals the syndicate from the consequences of their own misdeeds. If such misdeeds were fraudulent there could be no doubt whatever on the point. But, although the issue of the prospectus was not fraudulent, it was seriously misleading, and its issue was a clear breach of duty on the part of the directors, and it would be contrary to the plainest good sense, and also to well-settled legal principles, to hold that they could, whilst they concealed the facts from the members of the nitrate company, deprive that company of the rights acquired by the concealment of those very facts. In considering, therefore, the position of the nitrate company, I disregard entirely the circumstance that its directors did not rescind the contract whilst they were in office. Mere lapse of time whilst the original directors were in office cannot, in my opinion, avail the syndicate in this action. But it does not follow that all that the nitrate company did by its directors can be disregarded. The real difficulty in the way of rescission turns on the impossibility of restoring the parties to their original position. I have looked carefully into Erlanger's case, where this difficulty had also to be considered, but the reports do not show what was done except that the property there acquired was more or less worked for a time and always at a loss. That case, moreover, was one of fraud, and here there is none. In the present case the nitrate company in fact worked their property vigorously as soon as they could; they called upon the syndicate to make large outlays upon it, and such outlays were made; the company's business was carried on at a profit and large dividends were declared and paid; the syndicate has sold the shares it received in part payment of the purchase-money. In December, 1895, Porlitz joined the board; an entirely new board was formed in March, 1896; rescission is not thought of, but damages are claimed; the works are carried on as before; the action is commenced in June, and rescission is then thought of for the first time. Even then the works are carried on, not merely to keep them going, but with a view to profit, and a dividend is declared, though under counsel's advice it is not paid. As late as December, 1896, the plaintiffs called for more water from the syndicate. The works have now been stopped altogether. These facts are very different from any which the court had to deal with in Erlanger's case. Still, if this were a case of fraud the court would be justified in making an order for repayment of the purchase-money (including the amount realised by the sale of the shares) on the plaintiffs accounting for all their profits. The defendants could not effectually set up their own wrong as a reason for not giving such relief against them. But there being in this case no fraud, the reasoning which in a case of fraud would justify such an order is inapplicable. It must never be forgotten that the business of the nitrate company was a highly speculative one. The price of nitrate was liable to great fluctuation. The value of the Laguna property is not what it was. The original directors of the nitrate company were not fraudulently carrying on its business to screen the syndicate or themselves from the consequences of having issued the prospectus; they did not carry on the business as agents of the syndicate, but simply as agents of the nitrate company, and the nitrate company, first by them and afterwards by their successors, worked the Lagunas with a view to its own profit until the market price of nitrate and of its own shares had permanently fallen. Then, and not before, did the nitrate company determine to rescind if it could. Having regard to the absence of fraud and to the impossibility of restoring the parties to their former position, the right to rescind cannot, in my judgment, now be enforced. Who the shareholders in the two companies now are is not matter for inquiry; but in considering what is right between two companies the fact that they consist of individual shareholders ought not to be forgotten, and I cannot see how the court can now set aside the contract on any terms which would be just between the two companies. Rescission, then, being impossible, and an action for damages on the ground of fraud being out of the question, the only point which remains for consideration is what pecuniary claim, if any, the nitrate company has either against the syndicate or against its own directors. As regards the syndicate, Romer, J., has given the nitrate company damages for the loss sustained by the nitrate company by reason of the short water supply and the incomplete state of the works. This, I think, was quite right. Mr. Swinfen Eady in his reply suggested that the inquiry should be somewhat wider; but the defendants were not heard on this point, which is comparatively of small importance, and no injustice will be done by leaving the inquiry as it is. I pass to the claim of the nitrate company against the other defendants. It will be convenient to speak of them all as if Colonel North were still alive and were a co-defendant. It must be borne in mind that they were first promoters and then directors of the nitrate company. This circumstance, though not material at law, is material in equity. Their duties as promoters and their failure to discharge those duties has been already considered. As promoters they might be liable to the nitrate company if rescission could be decreed; but they have not by their conduct in the matter of the prospectus become accountable to the nitrate company in respect of any property improperly come to their hands, and actions for damages are governed by legal and not by equitable principles. Their liability to pay damages will be examined presently. As directors I am not aware that there is any difference between their legal and their equitable duties. If directors act within their powers, if they act with such care as is reasonably to be expected from them having regard to their knowledge and experience, and if they act honestly for the benefit of the company they represent, they discharge both their equitable as well as their legal duty to the company. In this case they clearly acted within their powers; they did nothing ultra vires. Fraud is not imputed. The inquiry, therefore, is reduced to want of care and bona fides with a view to the interests of the nitrate company. The amount of care to be taken is difficult to define; but it is plain that directors are not liable for all the mistakes they may make, although if they had taken more care they might have avoided them: see Overend, Gurney, & Co. v. Gibb. Their negligence must be not the omission to take all possible care; it must be much more blameable than that; it must be in a business sense culpable or gross. I do not know how better to describe it. What, then, was their conduct? I regard the burden of proof now unimportant, for the evidence is sufficiently full and complete to enable the court to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. The directors of the nitrate company were also directors of the syndicate. Their position was, or at all events might be, difficult. The interests of the two companies might clash. But the shareholders of the nitrate company knew this perfectly well. Their knowledge did not relieve the directors from the due performance of their duties; but it rendered inapplicable to them many of the remarks made in Erlanger's case, where their position was concealed. Their position, though difficult, did not render the due discharge of their duties to either company impossible, and the first question is—Did they succeed in discharging them? If they did not, then a second question arises—viz., Is the loss sustained by the company attributable to such failure? Let us see, then, what they did. 1. As promoters they formed the company. 2. As directors they put the company's seal to the contract, and paid the purchase-money. 3. As promoters and directors they issued the prospectus. 4. They did not communicate all they ought as promoters to the shareholders. 5. They did not as directors repudiate the contract, but, on the contract, held the syndicate to it. Now, the cause of loss to the company is not attributable to what they did as promoters in forming the company or issuing a misleading prospectus. The loss to the company was occasioned by what the defendants did as directors—viz., sealing the contract, paying the purchase-money, and going on instead of repudiating the purchase. I take it to be clear that no action at law or in equity could be maintained against the defendants for forming the company with the memorandum and articles of association which were registered. As regards the issue of the prospectus, Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, far as it goes, would not, I think, protect the directors against an action by the company if the directors issued it without proper care, and if loss by the company attributable to the prospectus could be proved; for the directors owed duties to the company which the House of Lords held they did not owe to the plaintiff in Derry v. Peek. But, as already stated, the issue of the prospectus by the directors was not in this case the cause of any loss to the nitrate company. Similar observations apply to not consulting the shareholders. Even if the directors had consulted them it is impossible to say that the loss would not have been sustained. They might have resolved to go on. The omission to consult the shareholders did not cause the loss, and an action for damages for such omission cannot be supported. On this point Walker v. Goe, 7 W. R. 289, 4 H. & N. 350, is important. But the directors, though not liable for damages, may be liable in equity for misapplying the company's assets. Having acted throughout intra vires, and fraud being out of the question, whether a loss of a company's assets by directors imposes on them an equitable liability to make them good depends on the principles already explained. The legal liability for damages for the loss and the equitable liability to make good the loss both depend upon the same considerations—viz., carelessness and inattention to the interests of the nitrate company. This, then, is the last point to be determined. On this part of the case Romer, J., who saw the directors, has found everything in their favour; and I see no reason to differ from him. I go further; I agree in his conclusions. A great point was made of their recklessness in sealing the contract and paying the money without another survey and further inquiry. But, bearing in mind that it is plain that Colonel North had had a survey and that three of the directors knew the property well, they cannot be justly charged with any breach of duty in not waiting for another survey and in acting on their own knowledge and judgment in this and in other respects. They saw no necessity in the interest of the nitrate company for delay, nor for modifying the contract. It is only by imputing to them a want of bona fides as directors that a breach of duty in sealing the contract and paying the purchase-money can be established against them. Their conviction that water was in the district, and could and would be found (as it was in fact), appears to me to explain their conduct in entering into and not repudiating the contract; and I doubt whether any independent body of directors with their knowledge of the place and with their conviction as to the water would have acted differently. I have not the slightest doubt that the directors believed that, notwithstanding all drawbacks, large profits would be realized by the nitrate company, and that to throw the bargain up would be the reverse of beneficial, not to say disastrous, to its members. We have not to consider whether Colonel North's estate is liable to account to the company for the secret profits he made out of the Lockett agreement, and I say nothing on that subject. This action is brought for another purpose altogether, and I am of opinion that it is not sustainable.

RIGBY, L.J.—In the view which I take of this case it will not be necessary to go at length into the very complicated issues of fact, as to which an immense body of evidence has been taken. I will only say that if it were necessary I should not be inclined to differ from the conclusion of the Master of the Rolls as to the misrepresentations in respect of which he holds the plaintiffs to have been entitled originally to a rescission of the contract sought to be rescinded in the action.

In my judgment, however, the undisputed facts are sufficient to enable the court, on broad and salutary principles of equity, long established and never departed from, to determine the rights of the parties.

In the year 1889 the Lagunas Syndicate (Limited), hereinafter called the syndicate, was incorporated under the Companies Acts as a company with liability limited by shares. Its principal object was to acquire by agreement with Colonel North certain nitrate deposits and works, known as the Lagunas Nitrate Works, consisting of 548 estacas of land in Chili and the buildings, plant, and machinery in and about the same. An estaca is a Spanish measure equivalent to from 6 to 7 English acres.

They acquired this property in consideration of 1,093 fully paid-up shares of £100 each and £700 in cash, their whole share capital being £110,000 in 1,100 shares of £100 each. The capital was subsequently increased to £275,000.

In the early part of 1894 the syndicate acting through their board of directors determined to promote a company who should purchase from them 200 of the 548 estacas belonging to them, together with an oficina or factory, otherwise called a maquina, erected thereon and adapted to be used for the manufacture of nitrate of soda, with certain plant and stock and a certain supply of water. The price was to be £850,000, payable £550,000 in cash and £300,000 in fully-paid shares.

These shares having regard to the representations contained in the prospectus could not be treated by the syndicate as of less than par value, and, in fact, in February, 1895, they were all sold by the syndicate and realized £324,000 payable by instalments, making altogether £874,000 in cash ultimately received by the syndicate for the property sold by them. The total of the sums alleged by the syndicate to have been expended by them in respect of the 548 estacas down to the date of the sale of the 200 estacas, including at par the shares which went to make up the original purchase price of £110,000, fell considerably below £400,000, but taking it at that sum, and bearing in mind that the syndicate was to retain 348 estacas for its own benefit, it is plain that the profit of the syndicate out of the sale was so considerable that independent advisers of the contemplated company knowing nothing more than would be told to an independent purchaser might well have hesitated before recommending the purchase.

More than this it is not necessary at present to say, but this at least is clear.

It may well be that a contract in similar terms entered into by an independent board of directors would have been binding.

Unfortunately, however, the syndicate and its directors took deliberate and effectual steps for shutting out the possibility of the intervention of any independent advisers.

Before the incorporation of the company the board of directors of the syndicate settled the precise terms (a) of an agreement for the sale and purchase of 200 of the 548 estacas; (b) of the memorandum and articles of association of the projected company; and (c) of a prospectus which was to be issued by the company.

In the articles of association they had the courage to nominate every member of the syndicate's board (seven in number) to be also a member of the company's board of directors.

No other person was nominated as a director of the company, and the seven members so nominated, in their individual capacities, and with corresponding boldness, accepted the nomination.

They appear to have had no misgiving as to their own competency to perform the delicate task of holding an even balance between the vendor, the syndicate, and the purchaser, the company.

Probably their conviction, mistaken as it was, that the company would turn out to be a financial success made them somewhat indifferent to such considerations.

A main point of their scheme seems to have been the exclusion of any possible outside adviser of the company. This was not left to chance. The articles not only provided for the appointment of the seven first directors of the company, but enabled the directors for the time being at any time and from time to time to appoint any other person as a director, but so that the total number of directors should not exceed the maximum prescribed number. The directors were moreover empowered to fill up any casual vacancy in the office of director by the appointment of a successor who was to hold office for the remainder of the time for which his predecessor in ordinary course would have held office (article 57). By article 96 no member is to have any right of inspecting any account or book or document of the company except such as is actually conferred upon him by the statutes or shall be authorized by the directors or by the company in general meeting.

These common form provisions acquire a sinister importance when they complete a scheme of secrecy such as that disclosed by these articles.

I may observe in passing that on the result it was not until long after the syndicate had been paid the whole cash portion (£550,000) of the purchase price and had sold at a premium the £300,000 in shares that made up the total sum of £850,000 that any independent adviser obtained access to the board-room of the company. The exact date was the 3rd of December, 1895, when Mr. Porlitz first took his seat at the board.

To return to the narrative of facts not in dispute. The above-mentioned preliminaries having been arranged in the confidence and privacy of the syndicate board-room, the company was on Friday, the 15th of June, 1894, incorporated by registration of the memorandum and articles of association prepared for it, and on Monday, the 18th of June, the seal of the company was attached to the agreement already prepared, and the prospectus already prepared was approved, apparently without alteration in either case.

The prospectus was dated the same 18th of June and forthwith published.

The firm of solicitors who had for some time been and continued to be solicitors of the syndicate were retained as solicitors of the company, and the gentleman who for some time past had been and continued to be the secretary of the syndicate was appointed secretary of the company.

In short, the company was treated throughout its promotion and down to the time of the execution of the purchase agreement and the issue of the prospectus in precisely the same way as it might have been if intended to be the private company of the syndicate and its board, in which they alone were to be concerned.

This, however, was very far from being the case. The draft prospectus showed from a time before the incorporation of the company that the public were to be invited to subscribe for the two-thirds of the capital (£600,000) which was not to be issued to the syndicate, and the purchase agreement (clause 18) provided in effect that if the company failed to satisfy the syndicate on or before the 24th of June that the whole £600,000 offered to the public had been subscribed for in cash and allotted to responsible people, the syndicate might, by notice at any time before the date fixed for completion, the end of September, annul the sale.

The case therefore is totally different from that dealt with by the House of Lords in Salomon v. Salomon & Co., where there was no intention of adding at any time to the original number of corporators, each of whom knew of everything that was being done.

There the subscribers to the memorandum and articles and the owners of the business to be transferred only took advantage of the machinery of the Companies Acts for the purpose of carrying on a business in which no other person had or was intended to have an interest. In the present case the syndicate and its directors proposed out of the money of other people to make a great profit to themselves.

I proceed now to consider the exact legal position of the syndicate and its directors with reference to the company.

It is not now disputed that the syndicate in its corporate capacity and the directors individually were promoters of the company. They contended this in the court below, and had to pay the costs of their unsuccessful contention. It is difficult to see how such a contention came to be put forward. Each of the directors agreed in advance to become a director of the company from its incorporation. Each of them must, in my opinion, be taken to have agreed beforehand to all the terms of the purchase agreement and of the prospectus. Each of them was a signatory to the memorandum and articles. The syndicate is bound by the acts of its directors and is plainly a promoter. The fact, however, of the denial of responsibility as promoters in the court below is not without great importance, There could be no doubt that the syndicate and each director, both as director of the syndicate and in his individual private capacity, had a distinct and important interest adverse to that of the company. They, nevertheless, chose while acting as the sole agents for the vendor syndicate to constitute themselves also and throughout sole agents for the purchaser company.

The syndicate and its directors thus voluntarily placed themselves in a position in which the interest of the directors both as directors of the syndicate and as to each on his own private account must necessarily come into conflict with their duty as fiduciary agents for the company. This apparently made them all-powerful, but the position having regard to its consequences was in reality a most unenviable one, as it left them most properly to be judged by a standard which it is next to impossible that any body of men could satisfy. The rules which apply as between independent vendors and independent purchasers have no longer any application, but other rules must apply. It is an equitable rule which has always been guarded and enforced with the utmost jealousy, that no fiduciary agents shall under pain of consequences thoroughly well known and noticed below intentionally place himself in a position in which his interest may conflict with his duty. This rule was plainly violated in the present case and I can hardly imagine a case in which the violation would be more flagrant. This violation of the rule was a distinct misfeasance and breach of duty to the company on the part of each promoter, and I see no reason why each should not be liable for all the consequences of the misfeasance and breach. The rule is not a mere arbitrary or technical rule of equity, but is based upon high grounds of morality, and courts of equity have always held any departure from it to be a very serious wrongdoing.

The equitable rule referred to does not in any way depend upon fraud or any presumption of advantage actually taken; indeed it applies equally even though it be shown that no advantage has been taken. The rule is made general in order to prevent the danger arising from the difficulty of disproving in particular cases that duty has given way to interest: see per Lord Eldon in the leading case of Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 625. The plaintiffs in this case are therefore under no obligation to allege or prove fraud. Honesty of purpose on the part of the fiduciary agents, together with a meaning to act for the benefit of the principal (in this case the company), would not avail them as a defence: see Ex Parte Lacey.

The plaintiffs have not argued the case on the ground of fraud, and have been within their right in declining to do so, and I say at once that we are bound in this state of things to assume that all the directors of the syndicate believed the terms of the agreement which they fastened upon the company to be fair, reasonable, and even advantageous to the company, and that there was an absence of all intention to overreach. We should also assume that the promoters were ignorant of the fact that they were committing a breach of trust so as to subject themselves to the operation of the equitable rule referred to, otherwise it would be impossible to understand how their conduct could be reconciled with good faith.

The doctrine above referred to has been so long and so firmly established that, but for the way in which it has been ignored both in action and in the argument for the defendants, I should have thought it unnecessary to do more than assert it. It may, however, be useful to go once more over well-beaten ground, and I will do so, without, however, attempting to refer to any of the numerous cases which have been decided, except in so far as appears necessary for the full understanding of the doctrine as applicable to the present case.

The case of Ex parte Lacey was one of a trustee for sale purchasing for himself. The doctrine has not, however, been confined to trustees for sale. It was long ago extended to the case of a sale to a principal by a person occupying a fiduciary position of the agent's own property, as in the present case. So, too, an attorney selling an annuity to his client: Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 266. In that case Lord Eldon (p. 278) calls it "that great rule of the court that he who bargains in matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence, a rule applying to trustees, attorneys, or any one else." The rule has been from time to time stated in different language, but, whatever hesitation there may have been in the earlier cases, in the later ones no limit whatever has been placed on the principle that no fiduciary agent can bind a principal by a sale of the agent's property where the principal has not had independent advice.

It is unnecessary further to deal with any case except that of promoters. We find James, L.J., in In re The Ambrose Lake Tin and Copper Mining Co., 28 W. R. 783, 14 Ch. D. 390 at p. 394, stating the law applicable to a case like the present as follows: "Now what we have got here to consider is a sale in substance made by the vendors for themselves as beneficially interested to themselves as directors of the company, being in that sense in a fiduciary character towards the company, and the sale is a sale by themselves in the one character to themselves in the other character. Of course such a sale is a thing that cannot stand if it is questioned in time and proper offers made to restore the thing purchased." It is true that in the case cited it was not possible to give the relief asked for, which was relief going upon the ground not of rescinding but of upholding the bargain made, but the opinion of the lord justice with reference to such a case as he describes is in no way affected thereby. I now come to the case of The New Sombrero Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger. It is a case of great importance, not as I think because it lays down any new principle whatever, but because of the manner in which it applies well-established principles in the particular case of promoters of a company as between themselves and the company promoted by them. The whole case is worthy of careful attention, but I will cite such passages only from the judgments of the learned judges and the opinion of the noble and learned lords as seem to me to be of special importance and to be directly applicable to the present case. The late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, says with reference to the contract there set up: "It is nothing more than a mere sham contract, a thing entered into by one agent of the promoter to sell with another agent of the promoter to buy; there was really nothing more in it when it had been adopted than when it was entered into, and it was not a transaction which could in any sense bind the company." By this the learned judge did not mean that the contract was null and void at law, for the judgment recognized its validity at law by directing it to be set aside. James, L.J., says: "A promoter is, according to my view of the case, in a fiduciary relation to the company which he promotes or causes to come into existence. If that promoter has a property which he desires to sell to the company it is quite open to him to do so, but upon him as upon any other person in a fiduciary position it is incumbent to make full and fair disclosure of his interest and position with respect to that property. I can see no difference in this respect between a promoter and a trustee, steward, or agent." Now, it is clear that the full and fair disclosure which a trustee would have to make to his cestui que trust to whom he was selling would have to include not only the fact of his being the owner, but all material facts concerning his interest and position, including what it had cost him—or, in other words, the amount of profit that he was to get out of the transaction, and many other things which an independent vendor would be under no sort of obligation to disclose. Baggallay, L.J., says: "Therefore it is not a technical rule at all which requires that a vendor who in any respect is in a fiduciary position should tell the exact truth, should say he is the vendor, or state the interest that he has. Therefore upon that broad principle I think that this company whenever they discovered the fact that the full disclosure which the rules of equity require had not been made were entitled to have the contract set aside." It will be seen that the equitable doctrine is in all these passages laid down in the broadest possible terms without any reference to fraud on the part of the promoters. The noble and learned lords whose opinions were given in the House of Lords said nothing to throw any doubt on the principles enunciated by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, but, on the contrary, seem to me to adopt their views to the fullest extent. The first opinion was that of Lord Penzance. [His lordship read the judgment from the words at 3 App. Cas., p. 1229: "Can a contract so obtained be allowed to stand?" to ". . . disclose the material facts."] Lord Cairns says at p. 1236: [His lordship read the judgment from "In the whole of this proceeding up to this time the syndicate, or the house of Erlanger as representing the syndicate, were the promoters of the company" to ". . . shall be competent and impartial judges as to whether the purchase ought or ought not to be made."] There is more in both the opinions quoted from to the same effect, but substantially the passages which I have quoted contain the ground on which the decision of the House as to the voidability of the contract was based. The other noble and learned lords give their adhesion to these views, but give no additional reasons which seem to me material, being mainly occupied with the important question of delay and acquiescence, on which Lord Cairns expressed grave doubts. I think, however, that it may be well to cite one passage from the opinion of Lord O'Hagan. [His lordship read the judgment at 3 App. Cas., p. 1256, from "The promoters who so forget their duty to the company they formed as to give it a directorate without independence, opposition, or vigilance, and caution in caring for its interest must take the consequences," to ". . . he is impeachable with indirect or improper motives."] I think that this passage is entirely in harmony with the opinion of the other noble and learned lords, and that the decision was not based on fraud, but on breach of duty, even though I consider the case a direct authority for the voidability in equity of the agreement of the 18th of June, 1894, at the pleasure of the company, within a reasonable time after the company was made aware of all material facts giving them a right to require rescission. It is said by way of defence that the existence of the fiduciary relation and of the acting in a double capacity is plainly disclosed in the memorandum and articles of association and the prospectus. But this circumstance, though it makes it possible to acquit the promoters of fraud, does not affect the application of the general equitable rule. The rule does not depend upon concealment any more than it does upon fraud or advantage actually taken, and in many cases in which the acting in a double capacity has been perfectly well known relief has been given.

The mere fact of the admission of the fiduciary relation and of the double character in which the fiduciary agents have acted cannot discharge the agents from the obligations of the rule. No doubt a perusal of the memorandum and articles would disclose the fact of the directors of the company being also directors, and the only directors, of the syndicate, and therefore occupying the ambiguous position which I have already commented upon, but I see no reason whatever why this disclosure should relieve the promoters from the obligations under which they came by reason of their misfeasance and breach of duty. It would be altogether against principle to say that a statement by fiduciary agents of the fact that they have chosen to place themselves in a position which they ought never to have occupied can set them right from the beginning and make them cease to be wrongdoers, or free them from the consequences of their wrongdoing. So much for those shareholders who, whether they saw the memorandum and articles or not, are bound by them but by nothing else. Take next the case of the shareholders who read the prospectus. Probably ninety-nine out of every hundred persons who read the prospectus were no wiser than the promoters themselves, and would see in the statement contained as to the identity of the directors of the syndicate with the first directors of the company no ground for questioning the validity of the agreement for purchase and sale. The promoters at any rate cannot be allowed to say, as they have practically done, "We were not aware of any wrongdoing on our part, but your shareholders had notice of facts which ought to have let you to see that we were wrongdoers, and you must be deemed therefore to have released us." It is quite clear that mere notice of matters which might well lead to inquiry does not in this class of cases take the place of full disclosure, and it is mainly because Lord Cairns differed on this point from the rest of the noble and learned lords in the Erlanger case that he was disposed to arrive at a different conclusion from them. Even in the case of the very few readers of the prospectus who from their knowledge of the rule and its applicability to the facts would be made aware that in theory the rule would be applicable, there would be no ground for assuming from their taking of shares a binding assent to and release of the promoters from their obligations. Each of them would be entitled to say, "Here are promoters of high standing and reputation who have not hesitated to put themselves into an ambiguous position, and I must assume them to have satisfied themselves that the bargain which they seek to impose upon the company is so clearly advantageous that there can be no risk of its being called in question." The greater the confidence invited and reposed, the greater the responsibility. But, after all, the obligation of the promoters in respect of the breach of duty of which they were guilty is an obligation not to individual shareholders but to the incorporated company. We have no information as to the persons who were the original allottees, and it is quite possible that many of them never saw the prospectus. Even though all saw the prospectus, there can be no doubt that many of them speedily disposed of their shares to others who never read the prospectus, and as to these purchasers from original allottees the whole case would depend upon the memorandum and articles of association. I observe that it was part of the scheme to issue share warrants to bearer which would pass by delivery, and the holders of such share warrants from time to time would not be known. If the mere notice conveyed by the memorandum and articles to shareholders would suffice to exclude the operation of the equitable rule, there would be an end to it altogether whenever the victim of the scheme was an incorporated company. It seems to me that the case of a company brought into existence by promoters is as strong a case for the application of the rule as can be conceived. With reference to the argument that every applicant for shares has himself only to blame, as he need not have become a shareholder, there appears to me to be a complete answer. In a case between individual fiduciary agents and individual beneficiaries a purchaser from an original beneficiary, even with notice of what had taken place, would be equally entitled to any remedy which the original beneficiary would have had. This follows from the fact that an equitable interest is in general assignable with all the rights belonging to it. If it were not so there would in many of the worst cases, in which the beneficiary had by the misconduct of his fiduciary agent been reduced to poverty, be no practical possibility of his obtaining relief. I cannot see why a person taking shares in a company against which the scheme was planned should be in a different or worse position than an ordinary purchaser of an equitable interest. At any rate he ought not to be treated as having waived the breach of trust until he knew all material facts. I shall assume, therefore, that the notice to shareholders of the scheme so far as they had notice would not operate to relieve the promoters from the result of what they did. The conclusion which I have arrived at as to the application of the equitable rule involves the following results. Speaking of equity and law for convenience as the case would have stood before the Judicature Acts, the agreement would have been avoidable in equity but would not be void at law. The rule as to equitable interference was only necessary in order to get rid of some agreement at law (by actual contract or estoppel) and in cases within its operation the agreement at law so far as it bound the offending party was kept alive as against him if it were thought by the beneficiaries more advantageous that the wrongdoer should be bound. In Ex parte Lacey, for instance, and in numberless cases which have followed it, the subject-matter of the inequitable purchase was set up for sale again on the terms that if a larger bid were made the beneficiaries were to have the benefit, but that if no larger sum were bid the purchaser should be held to his bargain. It is indeed one of the just and salutary branches of the rule that the party subjecting himself by his misconduct to the rule cannot make any advantage to himself out of it, but is bound by what he does if it turn out to his disadvantage.

In the present case there can be no doubt that if there had been an independent board of directors their affixing the seal of the company to the purchase agreement of the 18th of June, 1894, would have been an act intra vires, for the very object of the incorporation of the company was that it should enter into the agreement if that were approved by the directors. It would follow therefore that the directors who actually caused the seal to be affixed had power at law to do so, and that the agreement was not void at law but voidable only in equity. A court of equity might not be absolutely bound in every conceivable case to set aside an agreement so obtained, but would be bound to do so if the beneficiary within a proper time brought an action setting up that it was disadvantageous.

There would be no need to prove that the sale was at an excessive or undue price. The question of value need never be gone into at all. In this case, however, it is by no means necessary to press the doctrine to its extreme limit, since it is plain from the result of working that the price fixed was greatly above the real value of the property. It is said that the property was of a highly speculative nature, and no doubt it was, but this did not give to the promoter the right to speculate at the expense of other persons; and the case of the promoters is not improved by the fact (and fact it is) that they carefully secured themselves against any risk except as to shares taken by them, and threw the whole risk upon the company. The syndicate, as I have already pointed out, reserved the power of annulling the agreement of the 18th of June, unless by the 24th of the same month the whole of the shares offered to the public were allotted to responsible applicants. The application for shares far exceeded the number to be allotted. The effect, so far as the syndicate was concerned, was described by Colonel North in a letter dated the 18th of July, 1894, in which he says: "You have no doubt heard of the successful floating of the Lagunas Nitrate

C . . . The capital was subscribed considerably more than twice over. The shares of the Lagunas (i.e., the syndicate) have been divided into £5, and every £100 is therefore divided in twenty shares, and these £5 shares are now worth £22." No doubt that was eminently satisfactory to the syndicate. But there is another side to the business. The shares of the company were for a time kept at a premium, but by the date of the meeting of the 29th of July, 1896, their £5 shares stood at £2 only in the market. The contrast is instructive: £440 per £100 as to shares in the syndicate, compared with £40 per £100 as to shares in the company. The rule, moreover, specially applies where, as in this case, there was no full disclosure of all material facts. What facts the shareholders had notice of may be important when the question whether the right to rescind has been lost is being discussed. The directors of the company were appointed, not in order that they might disclose to the company what they knew as directors of the syndicate, but in order that there might be no such disclosure. They were parties to the scheme and the notice which they had in a different capacity should not be imputed to the company. I cannot, therefore, think that there is any doubt as to the original right of the company to rescind the agreement of the 18th of June on the ground of misfeasance and breach of duty quite independently of misrepresentation. The completion of the contract by assignment would not in any way affect this right since any deeds executed for the purposes of completion would be tainted with the same weakness as the original agreement. If it is suggested that the directors of the company because they were directors had the right of rescission in their hands and that the company is to be fixed with acquiescence and delay from the date of the agreement by reason of their taking no steps to rescind, the answer is that the original breach of duty in putting them in the position of directors was continued and repeated so long as they retained the position of fiduciary managers, and the act of the syndicate in wrongfully placing them there would render voidable not only the agreement itself but any confirmation of it direct or implied from their delay or want of action whilst occupying the position. Direct confirmation there was none and it would be absurd to hold that they could do by conduct what they could not do by contract—that is to say, convert against their principals a voidable contract into one not capable of avoidance. They committed themselves before the incorporation to supporting the agreement dictated by the syndicate, and the syndicate, their real principals, in relation to the agreement could have no right to treat them as invested by their improper appointment with the duty of denouncing the agreement which they were appointed to support. The obligation to make a complete and candid disclosure of all material facts existed throughout the whole time during which they had the control of the affairs of the company, and could only have been fulfilled by calling a general meeting, and laying before the shareholders at such meeting a full and complete disclosure of the material facts.

This was the last thing that the directors thought of, and their omission to take such a step was a misfeasance and continuing breach of trust as much as their original assumption of the two positions at one and the same time of vendors and purchasers. So long as they retained the control of the company's affairs they were and ought to be treated as wrongdoers, though for reasons similar to those already referred to it is not necessary to say that they acted fraudulently. If full disclosure had been made the shareholders might have been placed under the obligation of themselves moving in the matter. But whatever might be the conclusion as to misrepresentations contained in the prospectus there can, in my judgment, be no possible doubt that it contained no such fair and candid disclosure of material facts as would make it incumbent on the shareholders at once to take prompt steps to obtain rescission. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in his comments on the prospectus, and do not repeat them. I merely take note that such a disclosure would have to, but did not, include a fair statement of material facts under the following among other heads which are not touched by the prospectus—viz., (a) The amount of profit made out of the sale by the syndicate; (b) the fact that the syndicate knew that there could be no working to a profit without a combination of nitrate owners and no working of the amount of 300,000 quintals monthly with a combination, and that there was no intention or expectation of working at the rate of more than half of the 300,000 quintals per month. In fact, when a combination was formed it restricted the output of its members to 35 per cent. of full working capacity. The disclosure would also have to, but did not, include full information on the following heads, so imperfectly dealt with by the prospectus and agreement that Romer, J., gave directions, against which there is no appeal for inquiries, to ascertain the amount of damages occasioned to the company—that is to say, (c) the condition of the maquina at the time of the sale; (d) the state of the water supply. Then comes (e) the description of the property sold. The prospectus takes no notice of the fact that a considerable portion of the property had been worked out, and that a further large portion was not capable of being worked at a profit. Information on all these and other heads of perhaps less importance (as, for instance, the actual terms of the Lockett agreement) ought to have been set forth fully and candidly before the want of independent advice to which the company was entitled could be so far excused or supplied as to put the company (that is to say, the shareholders in general meeting) to their election whether to take to or repudiate the agreement. As, however, there was no sufficient disclosure of material facts, the time for applying for a rescission did not run during the period of the domination of what I will call the syndicate directors. Whether their domination should be treated as closing at the first appointment of an independent director, Mr. Porlitz (the 24th of September, 1895), or at the time when he first took his seat (the 3rd of December, 1895), or, as I am disposed to think, at the death of Colonel North (the 9th of May, 1896), when the voting power for the first time passed from the syndicate directors, is, I think, immaterial, as a reasonable—which in such a case as the present would be a very considerable—time must be allowed for investigation, obtaining advice, preparing the shareholders and other matters necessary in the case of a company. Having regard to this I am of opinion that whichever date is taken there was no unwarrantable delay before the commencement of the action on the 12th of June, 1896. The new directors took prompt measures for summoning a general meeting of the company for, among other things, obtaining the sanction of the company to a continuance of the action. The meeting took place on the 29th of July, 1896. This was the first general meeting at which anything like a disclosure on any of the matters above referred to took place, and the shareholders at that meeting by an overwhelming majority passed a resolution approving of the action for rescission and authorizing the directors to continue. The result of this meeting was that the remaining syndicate directors retired on the 7th or the 8th of August, 1896, leaving the new directors to manage the affairs of the company. After the resolution passed at the meeting the directors had no power to discontinue the action until they obtained authority from the company: see article 82, which seems to follow the form as to directors' powers contained in Table A. This circumstance, in my mind, reduces to insignificance what the board are said to have done or proposed to do with reference to the declaration of a dividend of 4 per cent. On the mere question of delay, therefore, I can see no ground whatever for saying that the right to rescission has been lost.

A further question, however, arises—Whether the company is precluded from demanding rescission by alteration of the state of the property—that is to say, the removal, manufacture, and sale of the manufactured proceeds of large quantities of the nitrate contained in the form of caliche in the purchased grounds?

I will first deal with the facts so far as seem necessary, and then consider the law applicable to them. The syndicate directors (and by reason of their acts the syndicate itself whose nominees they were) were alone and directly responsible for the removal of all caliche removed during the period of their domination. With a view also to having an effectual three months' trial for the purposes of a combination of nitrate owners, thought necessary, they stopped the working of the oficina for the months of January, February, and March of the year 1896, and at considerable expense accumulated stock for the purposes of trial in April, May, and June of the same year. The trial was nearly half way through at the death of Colonel North, and no one, I suppose, would suggest that it was the duty of the new directors, who by that event obtained a majority on the board, to put a stop to the working at high pressure arranged for the rest of the period of trial. For all the working of the caliche grounds down to the end of June, 1896, the syndicate directors were therefore directly responsible. Now it was shown by counsel for the principal defendants that the amount of the working down to the end of June, 1896, was approximately three-fourths of the whole working from the end of June, 1894, down to the end of 1897. The company under its new board is shown to be responsible for one-fourth only of the whole of the working. The amounts of caliche taken in different months varied considerably, but the figures provided us by Mr. Carson show on a rough average that during a period of two years, when the workings were under the control of or arose from the disposition made by the syndicate directors, the monthly takings of caliche were more than twice the monthly average during about eighteen months when the new board were in power.

Now no doubt it is a general rule that in order to entitle beneficiaries to rescind a voidable contract of purchase against a vendor they must be in a position to offer back the subject-matter of the contract. But this rule has no application to the case of the subject-matter having been reduced by the mere fault of the vendors themselves, and the rule itself is in equity modified by another rule that where compensation can be made for any deterioration of the property such deterioration shall be no bar to rescission, but only a ground for compensation. I adopt the reasoning of Lord Blackburn in Erlanger's case as to allowance for depreciation and permanent improvement. The noble lord, after pointing out that a court of law had no machinery for taking accounts or estimating compensation, says: [His lordship read the judgment from "But a court of equity could not give damages . . ." to " . . . the state they were in before the contract."] This important passage is, in my judgment, fully supported by the allowances for deterioration and permanent improvements made by Lord Eldon and other great equity judges in similar cases. After some observation on the duty of parties seeking relief to exercise due diligence, he cites a passage from a judgment of the Judicial Committee in Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurst, 22 W.R. 492, L. R. 5 P.C. 221 at 239 (a passage which has often been referred to as giving the best general rule applicable to such cases as the present), and part of which I quote to the following effect: "The doctrine of laches in a court of equity is not an arbitrary or technical doctrine where it would be practically unjust to give a remedy either because the party has by his conduct done that which might fairly be regarded as a waiver of it, or where by his conduct he has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, yet put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted; in either of these cases lapse of time and delay are most material." The obligation of the vendors to take back the property in a deteriorate condition is not imposed by way of punishment for wrongdoing, whether fraudulent or not, but because on equitable principles it is thought more fair that they should be compelled to accept compensation than that they should go off with the full profit of their wrongdoing. Properly speaking it is not now in the discretion of the court to say whether compensation ought to be taken or not. If substantially compensation can be made, rescission with compensation is ex debite justitiæ.

Applying these principles to the present case and first with regard to the workings down to the end of June, 1896, I ask what is practically just and whether the purchasing company has by its conduct and neglect put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if rescission were afterwards to be asserted? In my judgment there is no trace of conduct or neglect of the kind referred to. On the contrary the position of the promoters was voluntarily assumed by them as part of their original scheme and they were maintained in that position by a continuing breach of trust in keeping back from the company what they ought to have disclosed. What, then, does practical justice require? Not, certainly, that the promoter syndicate should keep intact the whole of the enormous sum of £874,000 which they have received, leaving their beneficiaries, in return for the payments made, a property of a value immensely below that sum. All that practical justice requires is that they be treated as having worked the property for themselves and should have full accounts of all profits made out of the working down at any rate to the end of June, 1896. This, as I have already pointed out, approaches to fully three-fourths of the whole working. There remains the case of the one-fourth worked by the new board during the pendency of the action. Here, again, it is of some importance to bear in mind that after the resolution of the meeting of the 29th of July, 1896, the board could not properly put an end to the pending action without getting the authority of the company in general meeting to do so. They never applied for this, and there has been no wavering on the part of the company whether the directors did or did not appreciate their position fully. The notice of the 28th of July was discussed at the meeting of the 29th, and Mr. Harvey, one of the syndicate directors who took the main part in defending the proceedings of himself and the other syndicate directors, showed that he clearly understood that if the action were successful the profits of the working were to be for the syndicate. It would be going too far perhaps to treat these remarks as a serious acceptance of the terms of the notice in the alternative of the syndicate failing in the action. Yet I do not find that either from Mr. Harvey or from any other source there was any questioning on the part of the syndicate of the assumption made in the recital to the notice that it was necessary in the interest of all parties to the action that the undertaking should be maintained as a going concern. Both at the meeting and throughout the proceedings in the action the defence of the syndicate and of the promoters was an absolute denial of the company's case. The questions whether the syndicate or its directors were promoters or held any other fiduciary position, and whether there had been any breach of trust, were put in issue and strenuously contested, and thereby the proceedings in the action were delayed and the continued working occasioned. If these points had been admitted the action need have taken very little time. I think that the promoters have thus been responsible as truly though not as directly as they were for their own working, and ought not now to be allowed to fall upon it as a bar to a claim for rescission. The following additional considerations support that conclusion. The working was not a departure from but only a carrying out of the original scheme which involved the working of the caliche by the original board in the first place, and when they found it convenient to retire by their successors in office. The working out of another fourth in addition to the three-fourths worked down to the 30th of June, 1896, did not so materially alter the position of things at the commencement of the action as to bar the plaintiffs' claim to rescission. It was the fault of the promoters, and their fault only, that the company were placed in the very difficult position in which they found themselves. They could not prudently leave the works derelict. They could not dismiss the workmen who had been collected and allow them to disperse, and the only alternative was to keep the works going. The syndicate directors apparently had expended the whole working capital of £50,000, so that the new board could not be expected to accumulate the manufactured nitrate, and were practically obliged to sell it for what it would bring in the market. They could not foresee that the action would be pending for so long a period as it actually took before judgment was obtained. I think that the course taken was one which might be properly taken having regard to the interests of all parties without involving any loss of rights. If there had been any reckless or excessive working other considerations might arise, but as I have already pointed out the average rate of production and sale during the management of the new board was less than one-half of the average rate for which the syndicate were responsible. Under the circumstances so far from holding that the company were bound to discontinue working and selling nitrate I think they were practically bound to continue it for the best commercial advantage they might be able to obtain, and in my judgment the following words of Lord Selborne in Erlanger's case are fairly applicable: "That the company should until a settlement was arrived at (or a decree made in case of litigation) continue in possession and keep the concern going in a due course of management was an inevitable necessity under the circumstances. A different course (since the vendors did not offer to take back the property) would have given the vendors much more reason to complain of the conduct of the plaintiffs (so far, at least, as my opinion is concerned) than they now have." In the present case there is nothing approaching the difficulty in making equitable allowances that existed in Erlanger's case. Profits have been made which the promoters can have the benefit of. In Erlanger's case the operation of the purchasing company had only produced loss, yet the promoters were obliged to take back the property in its greatly deteriorated condition with an inquiry as to profits (if any), which seems to have been of no value. In Erlanger's case, by the want of knowledge of the company's agents, a comparatively valueless mineral (carbonate) had been mistakenly sold for or mixed with the valuable phosphate so as greatly to lower the value of the article sold and injure the reputation of the inland deposits. Here the somewhat feeble attempts which were made to impugn the conduct of the business during the action have, in my judgment, failed. Here, again, the promoters have spent large sums out of the company's funds on property which turns out to have been all along in equity their own, and if they get back their property it must be improved to a considerable extent by this expenditure though it has been deteriorated by the withdrawal of caliche. If the promoters could establish a claim for deterioration beyond the amount of profits made they would have to submit to a possible counterclaim for improvements made at the expense of the company.

In my opinion there ought to be judgment for the plaintiffs for rescission of the agreement of the 18th of June, 1894, and orders for repayment of the cash portion of the purchase-money with interest at 4 per cent. from the date or respective dates of payment and for the sums produced by selling the £300,000 in shares with interest from the date or respective dates of receipt of the purchase-money for the shares.

Then there should be inquiries as to the amount of profits made by the company from the sale of nitrate and directions as to bringing the amount into account. Perhaps it would be sufficient to stop here with a direction that the company should be entitled to a lien upon the property for the amount due to them. But if either side insist upon it on sufficient grounds, there might be cross inquiries as to deterioration of the property otherwise than by the extraction of caliche and as to the amount of expenditure of capital moneys of the company in lasting improvements with an order for payment of the balance to the company or the syndicate as the case might require. As inquiries might occupy a very considerable time, provision should be made for payment into court at once of so much of the money as would in all probability be in excess of any sums that could be due to the company as in Dunne v. English, L. R. 18 Eq. 524. The order for payment by the syndicate should extend also to the defendant directors and the personal representatives of deceased directors and the liability should be made joint and several.

Although my judgment is opposed by three of my brethen I have sketched out the general frame of an order to show what, in my opinion, the justice of the case requires. But even though my judgment had prevailed, it would, I think, have been impossible to frame an order correct in all its details without hearing the parties, and hearing them on any points of difference between them.

In conclusion I would say that I have found it difficult to state the case without appearing to raise against the promoters a presumption of misconduct amounting to fraud. But the Lord Chancellor's observations in Adam v. Newbiggin are applicable here. My explanation of the conduct of the promoters is that they were so confident of the company being a success as to be negligent with reference both to the prospectus and the agreement, feeling sure that no objection would ever be taken. The directors of the syndicate supposed themselves to know everything about nitrate, and to be able to ensure success to the company. They turned out to be no more infallible than many other over-sanguine promoters who have preceded them. Their calculations failed, and they ought to bear the consequences of such failure, since they had no right to speculate at the risk, not of themselves, but of their beneficiaries.

COLLINS, L.J.—Fraud is not alleged or imputed in this case. The directors were under no legal incapacity to seal the contract of purchase by the company. The company came into existence for the purpose of taking over the property from the syndicate at a price already determined. By article 57 the directors of the syndicate were constituted directors of the company, and by article 5 they were charged with the duty of completing and carrying into effect the agreement, with such modification, if any, as they should think fit. Salomon's case is a clear authority that such an arrangement is not void or illegal. There is not here, any more than there was in that case, any representation, express or implied, as there was in Erlanger's case, that the board is independent. On the contrary, the true facts appear in the articles and are stated in the prospectus. Therefore no claim to relief can be based on the fact, per se, that the directors were not independent. Although not independent, they are legally-appointed directors, and are entitled to act as such. So far as a discretion is confided to them by the constitution of the company they are bound to exercise it honestly and with reasonable care.

These principles applied to the facts of this case will, I think, decide both the question of rescission as against the syndicate and the personal liability of the directors to the plaintiff company. I agree entirely in the conclusions of fact drawn by Romer, J., in this case. When the most important issue is one closely akin to one of bona fides, great weight is naturally given to the opinion of the judge who has himself seen the witnesses whose conduct is impugned. But even without this advantage, after the full examination to which the evidence has been subjected before us, I should unhesitatingly myself have arrived at the same conclusions. To the extent therefore to which he has found them, and no further, I agree that there were matters in respect of which the property contracted to be sold did not fully answer its description.

The first question is whether by reason of these defects the plaintiff company can claim rescission of the contract. I am clearly of opinion that they cannot. The plaintiffs have been in possession of, and working the property sold, from the 30th of June, 1894, until after the hearing before Romer, J., in 1898. The writ in this action was issued in June, 1896. Without considering for the moment what has been done by the plaintiffs since a change in the constitution of the court gave the dissatisfied shareholders a majority, it is clear that before that date the defects in question were remedied at considerable expense by the syndicate at the instance of the plaintiff company, represented by its properly-constituted board. Even assuming that the directors of the plaintiff company might have thrown up the contract on discovery of these defects, the result is that the syndicate, which is itself a limited company, and as such constitutes a different entity and embraces members other than the common directors, has expended large sums of money in making good the defects and cannot be restored to the position in which it would have been had the property been then thrown back on its hands. Under such circumstances I think it is clear that rescission could not have been claimed had the two boards been independent. How far are the rights of the parties affected by the fact that the boards were not independent? Though not independent they are the persons charged, as a term of the plaintiff company's existence, with the duty of carrying out the contract between the two parties. It seems to me to follow from the fact that both are properly-constituted companies and that fraud is excluded that they are bound inter se by the acts intra vires of their respective boards, and that the syndicate is therefore not debarred from insisting on its rights to restitutio in integrum because the directors of the company promoted by it are not independent. It is said that in the circumstances they could not act without laying the facts before the shareholders, even though they might honestly and reasonably believe that it would not be for the best interest of the shareholders to do so. But to hold that a discretion, however honestly and carefully exercised by its directors in the interest of the plaintiff company, could confer no rights on the syndicate who had changed their position in consequence, would be to withhold from the directors of the plaintiff company the powers conferred upon them as a term of its constitution, and I cannot think that such a limitation is to be implied where their dual capacity is avowed and underlies the scheme to which every member of the company has assented. In addition to this it seems to me that the acts done by the plaintiff company since the dissatisfied shareholders became aware of the actual facts have been far in excess of anything that has in any reported case been held not to be inconsistent with a right to rescission. There was not "inevitable necessity," as it seems to me, such as was stated by Lord Selborne to exist in Erlanger's case, obliging them to continue to work and exhaust the property as they have done in getting out and disposing of such large quantities of nitrate at the low prices then prevailing. This seems to me a very different thing from merely "keeping the concern going," which is all Lord Selborne refers to, and I agree with the observations which Romer, J., has made on this part of the case.

In my judgment the water difficulty has been greatly exaggerated by the plaintiffs. I think the defendants had in fact found a sufficient source of water for all possible needs of the oficina, and had connected it therewith by adequate system of pipes with the necessary pumps. I think the failure and intermittent character of the supply after the 30th of June was largely due to temporary causes and to bad management of the pumps and wells, and though a large sum was spent by the syndicate in remedying it, I think the greater part of this expense might have been saved had the management been more skilful. It is a remarkable fact that this ground of complaint was not even mentioned in the report of the dissentient directors, and first took shape after the case had got into the hands of counsel. The defect, such as it is, was capable of certain remedy, and was in fact completely remedied, and even if it formed an adequate ground of rescission, I do not think it created such an emergency as the directors were debarred from dealing with on their own responsibility without taking counsel with the shareholders. The like observations apply still more strongly to the case of the maquina.

For the reasons I have already given I think there was no incapacity in the directors by reason of their dual relations to guide their conduct by the plain rules of common sense as business men managing a commercial undertaking, and I think when the right of such companies to exist and carry out the purpose of their creation according to the conditions of their constitution is admitted, it would be unwise to lay down a standard of duty which would make it a practical impossibility to manage the undertaking upon ordinary business lines. The fact that there are conflicting interests is, of course, a most important factor in forming a judgment whether they acted honestly and with due care in any given case, but it does not destroy their power of acting on their own responsibility without consulting the shareholders, or make their acts voidable at the instance of the company.

It being impossible, therefore, to grant rescission against the syndicate, it remains to consider the question of the liability of the directors.

Applying the principles above stated, we have to deal with a company legally constituted with a board who by the articles can bind the company by acts done within their powers although they are not independent. These are the directors by whose acts the company and every member thereof have agreed to be bound. It seems to me that such directors were fixed with the duty of exercising their discretion within the defined limits honestly and with reasonable care when they sealed the contract. It is said they ought to have made further investigations before doing so. I think the true question is, "Having regard to their knowledge and information did they act fairly and with reasonable care in not making further investigations?" Dishonesty, as I have said, is not suggested, and I am satisfied that they did reasonably believe they had quite sufficient information to justify them in the interest of the plaintiff company in sealing the contract.

But it is said: "Having signed the contract they ought to have rescinded as soon as they learnt the facts as to the water and the maquina." Here again I think their conduct is to be tried by the same standard, and the question to be answered is: "Did they honestly and exercising reasonable care come to the conclusion that it would be wise in the interest of the company to hold to the contract and insist upon the representations being made good?" I cannot doubt that they thought and had good grounds for thinking that they were acting in the best interests of the company in doing as they did. I do not refer to the facts, which are fully stated on this part of the case by Romer, J., with whose observations upon them I entirely agree. I think also that even if there was a breach of duty on their part in not consulting the shareholders, Mr. Farwell was right in contending that no damages other than nominal could be recovered. As regards the other points raised on the appeal I desire to adopt the conclusions and reasons of Romer, J., in whose opinion on the whole case I thoroughly concur.

A elective auditor of a borough is not entitled, under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, to any remuneration for his services.

The duty of an auditor of the accounts of a corporation as urban sanitary authority, under section 246 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is not confined to a mere examination of vouchers, but extends to the consideration whether any of the payments which have been made, are illegal or improper.

Appeal from the judgment of Phillimore, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought against the corporation of the borough of Devonport to recover the sum of £405 as remuneration for services rendered by the plaintiff in auditing the accounts of the corporation during several years. The plaintiff was one of the elective auditors of the borough, having been elected to the office by the burgesses under section 25, sub-section 1, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The plaintiff claimed remuneration for auditing two sets of accounts—viz., the municipal accounts, and the accounts of the corporation in its character as urban sanitary authority of the borough.

By section 27, sub-section 1, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, "the treasurer" of the borough "shall within one month from the date to which he is required to make up his accounts in each half-year, submit them, with the necessary vouchers and papers, to the borough auditors, and they shall audit them."

By section 246 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "Where an urban authority are the council of a borough, the accounts of the receipts and expenditure under this Act of such authority shall be audited and examined by the auditors of the borough, and shall be published in like manner and at the same time as the municipal accounts, and the auditor shall proceed with the audit after like notice and in like manner, shall have like powers and authorities, and perform like duties as in the case of auditing the municipal accounts. Each of such auditors shall in respect of each audit be paid such reasonable remuneration, not being less than two guineas for every day in which they are employed in such audit, as such authority from time to time appoint."

The defendants denied that the plaintiff was entitled in the absence of express agreement to any remuneration for auditing the municipal accounts, and they paid into court the sum of £34, which they said was sufficient remuneration for auditing the urban sanitary authority accounts. This sum was calculated at the rate of two guineas a day, allowing four days for each half-yearly audit.

Phillimore, J., gave judgment for the defendants. He was of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to any payment as elective auditor under the Municipal Corporations Act, and that the sum paid into court was sufficient remuneration for auditing the accounts of the municipal corporation as urban sanitary authority. He thought that the audit of the urban sanitary authority accounts was a strictly limited one, and was not an audit of the doings of the various committees of the corporation, but was simply an audit of the accounts of the treasurer of the urban sanitary authority.

The plaintiff appealed.

Macaskie, for the plaintiff.—The Municipal Corporations Act does not expressly provide for any remuneration being paid to an elective auditor. But section 12, sub-section 1, which disqualifies any person for being a councillor, if "he is an elective auditor or a revising assessor, or holds any office or place of profit . . . in the gift or disposal of the council," seems to show that the Legislature contemplated that an elective auditor should be a salaried official. [He referred also to sections 15, 18, 25, 26, 27, 139, 140, 141, 142, and Schedule V.] With regard to the urban sanitary authority accounts the learned judge misconceived the nature of an audit under sections 246 and 247 of the Public Health Act, 1875. He thought that the duty of auditors was merely to take the treasurer's account and examine the vouchers. But it is the duty of an auditor to see that each item of expenditure has been legally expended. The plaintiff took this wider view of his duty, and it was impossible for him to get through the work in four days.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Duke, Q.C., and J. A. Hawke, for the defendants.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—With regard to the accounts of the corporation as such, there is no shadow of reason for suggesting that the plaintiff is entitled to any remuneration for his services as an elective auditor. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, by section 140, and Schedule V., provides what payments may be made out of the borough fund. But nothing is said as to any remuneration to be paid to an elective auditor. And the plaintiff is not in a position to claim, and in fact does not claim, any remuneration as a servant of the corporation.

With regard to the auditing of the accounts of the corporation as urban sanitary authority, the plaintiff is entitled, under section 246 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to remuneration at the rate of not less than two guineas a day during the time he is properly occupied in the work. I think the learned judge took too narrow a view of the duties of an auditor of such accounts. I do not assent to the proposition that the sole duty of an auditor is to take the accounts and see that there are vouchers in respect of each payment. That seems to me to be an incomplete and imperfect view of an auditor's duties. In my opinion an auditor is justified in going further than that. I think he is entitled to consider whether payments which have been made are authorized payments, or whether on the other hand they are illegal or in any way improper; and, if he shall discover any illegality or impropriety, I think it is his duty to report it to the burgesses. But even taking that wider view of an auditor's duties, I see no reason for thinking that eight days in the year was not a sufficiently long time for the plaintiff to take for the auditing of these accounts. I therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

Mortgage—Redemption—Clogging the equity of redemption—Collateral advantage to mortgagee—Leaseholds—Covenant for payment to mortgagee of one-third of the profit rent until the end of the term, though principal and interest paid before—Validity.

A mortgagee may, provided the bargain is not unconscionable or oppressive, stipulate by the mortgage for a collateral advantage to himself; and if he does so, there is no presumption that the mortgagor entered into the contract under pressure.

A covenant in a mortgage of a lease that the mortgagor will, during the residue of the term (besides paying principal and interest), pay to the mortgagee one-third of the net profit rental received from under-tenants, and provisions that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee shall continue, though all principal and interest may have been paid, do not amount to a clog or fetter upon the equity of redemption, and are therefore valid.

Decision of Byrne, J. (47 W. R. 297), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (47 W. R. 297).

On the 23rd of October, 1895, the plaintiff, being then under-lessee of the Royalty Theatre, with an option to purchase her lessor's term, which did not expire until June, 1905, entered into an agreement with the defendant that he should lend her the sum of £2,000 to enable her to exercise the option, and that the repayment of the money should be secured by a legal mortgage of the lease so purchased, the mortgage deed containing a provision for payment to the defendants of one-third of the net profit rents received by the plaintiff from her under-tenants during the residue of the term.

The arrangement for the loan was carried out, and on the 13th of December, 1895, a deed was executed providing for the repayment of the £2,000 by twenty equal quarterly payments of £100 each, the first to be made on the 25th of December, 1895, so that the whole debt would be paid off in 1900; and also providing for the payment of interest at 6 per cent. on the amount from time to time due, and further that the plaintiff would during the residue of the term pay to the defendant one-third of the net profit rents, as and when received by her.

By the same deed the plaintiff demised the premises to the defendant for the residue of the term, except the last day, subject to subsisting tenancies.

The deed contained a proviso for redemption upon payment by the plaintiff of the £2,000 and interest, and all the other moneys thereinbefore covenanted by her to be paid, and a provision that the defendant would not call in the loan if the instalments and the interest were paid within thirty days after they became due, and if the covenants on the plaintiff's part were duly observed by the plaintiff.

The deed further contained divers other provisions.

On the 20th of August, 1897, there was owing to the defendant for instalments a sum of £350.

The defendant then served on the plaintiff a notice which required her to pay off within three calendar months the principal moneys and interest owing to him on the mortgage, and which stated that in default of such payment he intended to sell the premises. The notice also required the plaintiff to pay the instalments and interest then due to him, stating that in default he would go into possession and appoint a receiver.

On the same day the plaintiff paid the arrears of instalments and offered to pay the arrears of interest, which were in fact paid at a later date.

The defendant afterwards wished to withdraw the notice, but the plaintiff refused to allow this, and gave the defendant notice of her intention to pay off the balance of the £2,000 and the interest, which she alleged to be all that was legally due by her to the defendant. The defendant refused to accept this offer, and the plaintiff then commenced the present action against him for redemption on payment off of the £2,000 and interest. The defendant counterclaimed that for the residue of the term, notwithstanding payment by the plaintiff of the principal and interest, he was entitled to hold the mortgaged property as security for payment of one-third of the net profit rental until the end of the term.

Byrne, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff on both claim and counterclaim, and the defendant appealed.

Aug. 4.—LINDLEY, M.R.—The question raised on this appeal is a very important one, and I do not profess to be able to decide it on any principle which will be in harmony with all the cases. In fact, I do not believe that any principle can be enunciated which will be in harmony with them all; but the true principle running through them all is not very difficult to discover, and I think that it can be applied so as to do justice in this case, and in all other cases on the subject which are likely to arise. The principle is this, that a mortgage is a conveyance of land, or an assignment of chattels, as a security for the payment of a debt or the discharge of some other obligation for which it is given. This is the idea of a mortgage, and the security is redeemable on the payment or discharge of such debt or obligation, any provision which it may contain to the contrary notwithstanding. That, in my opinion, is the law. Any provision inserted in a mortgage for the purpose of preventing redemption on payment or performance of the debt or obligation for which the security was given, is what is meant by a clog or fetter upon the equity of redemption, and that is void. It follows from this that "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," but I do not understand that this principle involves the further principle that the debt or obligation, the payment or performance of which is to be secured, whatever may be its nature or its amount, is a clog or fetter within the meaning of the rule: see Powell on Mortgages (6th ed.), vol. 1, ch. 6, pp. 116 et seq. ("How a Mortgage is Considered in Equity"). The right to redeem is not a personal right, but an equitable estate or interest in the property mortgaged. A clog or fetter means something which is inconsistent with the idea of a security; something which would be a repugnant condition. If I convey land in fee simple, subject to a restraint on alienation, that is a repugnant condition. So if I give a mortgage with a condition that I am not to redeem, that is a repugnant condition, and that is a clog on the equity of redemption. The courts of equity have fought for years to maintain the doctrine that a security is redeemable on the performance of the obligation for which it was given. If that obligation is the payment of a debt, the security is redeemable on the payment of that debt. That, in my opinion, is the true principle applicable to all the cases on the subject, and that is what is meant when it is said that there must not be any clog or fetter upon the equity of redemption.

If that is the true principle, this mortgage does not infringe it at all, for this mortgage does not impose any such clog or fetter upon the equity of redemption. Of course, in any particular case, the debt or obligation itself may be impeachable on the ground of fraud, oppression, or over-reaching. If that were so the debt or obligation would to that extent be tainted and invalid; but, apart from that, the rule of equity on the subject is simply that directly you get a security for a debt or obligation, that security can be redeemed on the payment of the debt or the performance of the obligation. Let us, then, see what the contract here is. It is not suggested that there has been any fraud, undue influence, over-reaching, or hard bargaining. The plaintiff had a lease of a theatre, subject to the payment of a certain rent and to certain covenants. She wanted to carry on the theatre, and for that purpose to extend the term, and she also wanted to borrow a sum of £2,000 to enable her to do this. The security for the loan, it was arranged, was to be the lease, which was, in all probability, utterly insufficient. A security of that kind is always a shaky security. The lender took that view. He said that he would lend the money, and that the plaintiff might have five years to repay it. It was quite consistent with that provision that he should further stipulate that the plaintiff must pay him a sum equal to one-third part of the clear net profit rents which she should derive from the lease. What was the lender's real position? It is obvious that his security depended not only on the solvency of the plaintiff, but also on the success of the theatre. That was the kind of security which was offered by the plaintiff, and a sum of £2,000 was lent upon that security. [His lordship then referred to the covenants by the mortgagee in the mortgage, and to the proviso for redemption, and continued:] That means this, that this lease is assigned to the mortgagee by the mortgagor as security not only for the payment of the sum of £2,000 and interest, but also for the payment of the one-third of the net profit rents to the end of the term. If I am right in the principle which I have laid down, that does not clog the right of redemption on the performance of the obligation for which the security was given. It is said that that is not good law; but that is said because the true principle underlying the statement that there must be no clog or fetter on the equity of redemption has been lost sight of. The contract between the parties being this, the plaintiff says that she will pay off the balance of the £2,000 and interest, and she asks to have back the lease and to have the covenant to pay the defendant one-third of the profit rents put an end to. Having given that notice, she says that her obligation is at an end. The mortgagee declines to accept that proposal. He says that that is not the bargain which was made between the parties, and that the plaintiff cannot redeem on those terms. He admits that she may pay off the £2,000 and interest, but contends that even if she does that, she must still continue to pay the one-third of the profit rents. On principle I think that is right; it follows from what I have already said. That is the bargain which was made, and there has been no oppression, and there is no reasonable legal ground for relieving the plaintiff of the obligation which she undertook. As to the obligation or the right to pay off the balance of the £2,000, the defendant has by giving notice and calling it in given the petitioner a right which she would not otherwise have had. If she chooses to redeem and to pay off the £2,000 and interest, she can do so; but I understand that she does not wish to do that unless she can get rid of the whole thing.

The result is, that the notice of appeal is in substance right, but the order of this court should be prefaced with the statement that the plaintiff does not desire to pay off the £2,000 and interest. The action will be dismissed with costs, and on the counterclaim there will be the declaration which the defendant asks for. There must be an account of what is due on the security from the plaintiff to the defendant. On the whole, we have endeavoured to sweep away the fetters which are not imposed upon us by any equitable principle, but which, through forgetting the true nature of the principle that governs a case of this kind, have been thought to be imposed upon us.

JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion. The case comes within the decision in Biggs v. Hoddinott. There is no doubt, in my judgment, what the bargain was, and that it was a reasonable bargain. There is nothing more reasonable than that a person lending money on the security of a theatrical business should stipulate not only for the repayment of the sum lent and interest, but also for a share in the profits which may arise from the business. If the business be a success there will be a likelihood of his being repaid; if it fails he will probaby lose his money. Are we to say that such an arrangement is bad? We can only do so if we hold that in a mortgage transaction the mortgagee can have no collateral advantage. If we were to go so far as that, it would cover such a case as Biggs v. Hoddinott. In Biggs v. Hoddinott there was an additional or collateral advantage to the mortgagee outside the mortgage. The mortgagee of a public-house had stipulated for a collateral advantage to himself as regards the sale of malt liquors, and it was felt that it was necessary to press the case so far as to say that there could be no such bargain, and that was precisely the proposition which the court rejected. It was rejected not only by the Master of the Rolls, but also by Chitty, L.J., and Collins, L.J., who laid down that it was not good law to say that a mortgagee could get no collateral advantage from the mortgage as part of the security. Another decision to the same effect is Potter v. Edwards, 5 W. R. 407, which was referred to by Kay, J., in Mainland v. Upjohn as being the first decision, which broke into the series of cases which laid down the contrary principle. That case decided that though a mortgagee lent £700 only, he might bargain that the mortgage should stand as security for £1,000—that is, that the mortgagee might, notwithstanding the sum lent, insist on the payment of the larger sum as a condition of redemption. Such a stipulation is not really a clog or fetter on the equity of redemption, as the equity of redemption only arises upon the performance of the whole of what has been undertaken.

Therefore it comes back to this. What was the bargain? On what event was the equity of redemption to arise? It arises in this case when not only the money actually lent has been paid, but when the share of profit rents has been paid also? When we see that, we see that the case is covered by Biggs v. Hoddinott and Potter v. Edwards, for there is no hardship or oppression here.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree, and I will add a few words as the case is important. Before Biggs v. Hoddinott there was, no doubt, considerable obscurity as to the extent of the rule in equity with regard to contracts between mortgagors and mortgagees. It was pointed out in that case that certain observations of the judges in particular cases which had been previously more or less looked upon as laying down that a mortgagee could not stipulate for any collateral advantage went too far, and must be treated as no longer representing the law. I refer in particular to the observations of Trevor, J., in Jennings v. Ward, and of Hargreave, J., in In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367, and to the observations of other judges in cases referred to by Kay, J., in James v. Kerr and Mainland v. Upjohn. I take it that it has now been clearly established, first, that there is no such principle as has been stated that a mortgagee shall not stipulate for any collateral advantage for himself. He may so stipulate, and if he does, nothing can be said against it; and he can obtain a collateral advantage and can enforce it, it always being understood that the bargain must not be unconscionable or oppressive. Secondly, I take it also to be clear that there is now no such principle as was suggested, that where the mortgagee has stipulated for a collateral advantage as a condition of the loan the presumption is that the advantage has been obtained or the contract made under pressure. There is no such presumption, but each case must be determined on its own circumstances, and the court must look into the circumstances of each case and see whether the bargain is unconscionable or oppressive.

These principles are now established by Biggs v. Hoddinott, and I agree with the other members of the court that the decision of Byrne, J., cannot be sustained, though I can well understand how he, as a judge of first instance, may have thought himself bound to come to the conclusion which he did.

Motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff asking that the proceedings in the action might be set aside as from the 12th of November, 1898, the date of the dissolution of the defendant company, and that the solicitor for the defendant company might be ordered to pay the costs of those proceedings.

The writ in the action was issued on the 25th of February, 1898, and on the 4th of March an appearance was entered on behalf of the company. On the 17th of March the statement of claim was delivered, on the 13th of April the defence was put in, on the 18th of April the reply was delivered, and on the 20th of April the action was set down for trial. On the 18th of November the statement of claim was amended, and on the 9th of December the defence was amended; on the 1st of February, 1899, the defence was re-amended, and on the 14th of February an order for particulars was made. The action was tried on the 16th of March, and on the 23rd of March, 1899, judgment was given for the plaintiff against the defendant company for £566 13s. 4d. and costs: 47 W. R. 462, [1899] 1 Ch. 775.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

When the plaintiff came to enforce his judgment it was discovered that the company had been dissolved on the 12th of November, 1898; hence the present motion.

At the extraordinary general meetings of the company held on the 14th of October and the 2nd of November, 1897, resolutions were passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company, and a Mr. George Henry Sharp was appointed liquidator, and was directed to carry into effect two contracts for the sale of the assets of the defendant company to two new companies proposed to be formed. One of these new companies was the Beeston Cycle Co., which took over certain assets and liabilities of the defendant company (including the liability to the plaintiff which is the subject of the present action), and by the agreement that company was authorized to defend in the name of the defendant company all actions brought against it with reference to the liabilities so taken over.

On the 26th of February, 1898, the writ in this action was left by the liquidator of the defendant company, or by his direction, with the solicitor of the Beeston Cycle Co., with instructions to attend to it. The solicitor thereupon brought the matter before the directors of the Beeston Cycle Co., and appeared to the writ and defended the action by their instructions.

The Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 142, provides that the liquidator, on the conclusion of a winding up, shall make up an account and hold a general meeting of the company.

Section 143: "The liquidators shall make a return to the registrar of such meeting having been held, and of the date at which the same was held, and on the expiration of three months from the date of the registration of such return, the company shall be deemed to be dissolved."

Jenkins, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the motion, contended that the plaintiff was damnified by the solicitor having used the defendant's name without authority.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Younger, for the solicitor.—There was complete authority. The plaintiff had suffered no damage, and there had been no fruitless proceedings or waste of time. The plaintiff got a final judgment binding on the old company.

They referred to Whiteley Exerciser (Limited) v. Gamage, 47 W. R. 296, [1898] 2 Ch. 405; Crookhaven Mining Co., 15 W. R. 28, L. R. 3 Eq. 69; Cumber v. Wane, Smith's L. C. Jenkins, Q.C., referred to In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co., 27 W. R. 713, 11 Ch. D. 140.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: It was not disputed that the solicitor had authority to appear and defend the action down to the 12th of November, 1898; but it is contended that his authority terminated on that day. It appears that on the 25th of July, 1898, the liquidator held a final meeting pursuant to section 142 of the Companies Act, 1862, and made a return of the meeting to the registrar on the 4th of August, and that such return was registered on the 12th of August, and consequently that the defendant company was dissolved by virtue of the provisions of section 143, on the 12th of November, 1898.

The solicitor swears that he did not know of the final meeting being called until the 16th of March, 1899, the day of the trial, when he was for the first time informed of it by the secretary of the Beeston Cycle Co. The learned junior counsel who appeared for the solicitor on this motion stated in court (and I implicitly accepted the statement) that the secretary gave this information at a conference held with him immediately before the trial, that he inquired whether the defendant company had been actually dissolved, but was informed by the secretary that he did not know, and that he advised that no advantage should be taken of the dissolution by way of defence, but that the action should be defended on the merits. The course was adopted and the action was tried without the learned judge, Cozens-Hardy, J., being informed of the position of the defendant company.

I do not quarrel with the advice given as to the defence of the action, but in my opinion there was a point to which sufficient attention was not paid—viz, whether either solicitor or counsel had authority to represent the defendant company at the trial. It would have been easy to send someone to examine the documents at the office of the registrar of joint-stock companies; an inspection of those documents would have shown that the company was dissolved, and I think that the fact of the dissolution ought to have been mentioned to the judge, and his opinion taken whether the trial ought to proceed.

It was contended, however, that the judgment was perfectly valid, mainly on the authority of Whiteley Exerciser v. Gamage. There on the 5th of August, 1897, the plaintiff's action was dismissed with costs. The defendant proceeded to tax his costs, and the taxing-master made his certificate on the 4th of February, 1898, the defendant took out a summons to vary the certificate, but owing to the state of business it did not come on until the 15th of July following. In the meantime on the 14th of April, the company was dissolved in the same way as in the present case. It was held by North, J., that the summons could proceed, and he made an order on it adverse to the company. This decision rested, as I understand it, on the ground that the delay was entirely due to the state of business in the court, and consequently that the maxim actus curiæ nemini facit injuriam applied: see Cumber v. Wane.

In my opinion, however, that reasoning does not apply to the present case, for the simple reason that the delay is not shown to have been entirely due to the state of business of the court. The action was, no doubt, set down for trial on the 20th of April, 1898, and would have been ripe for trial so far as the court was concerned early in May, but long after that it was found necessary to amend the pleadings and to amend the defence. The delay, therefore, was partly attributable to the parties themselves.

It was further contended that the solicitor was n t liable because he had originally authority to defend the action and had no knowledge that the authority had been revoked by the dissolution of the defendant company. [His lordship referred to Smout v. Ilbery 10 M. & W., pp. 10, 11.] This decision is approved of in Story on Agency, s. 265. It seems to me that the principle there laid down applies to a solicitor appearing for a party in an action who is an agent of a special kind and known to the opposite party to be such and that it applies just as much to the dissolution of a legal entity or corporation, as to the death of a living person. In my opinion the solicitor ought not to be held liable for any costs down to the 16th of March, 1899. I think, however, that on that day he did not use due diligence to ascertain whether the defendant company was dissolved or not and that any costs incurred by the plaintiff after that day ought to be borne by him.

There will be no costs of the present application.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Oct. 30.

Bankruptcy—Scheme of arrangement—Remuneration of trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 72, sub-section 1—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 16; s. 15, sub-section 1—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886 and 1890, rr. 305, 306—Scale of Fees, Table B.

Where a relative of the bankrupt provides a sum to pay a composition on the debts proved in the bankruptcy, the trustee cannot claim a commission on such sum as on an amount realized by him.

Application by the bankrupt and his father for a reduction of the amount of remuneration claimed by the trustee. The bankrupt was adjudicated in January, 1898, and the respondent Engel was appointed trustee. After adjudication the bankrupt proposed a scheme of arrangement by which his creditors were to receive eight shillings in the pound, and on the 30th of August, 1898, the bankrupt's father paid £5,200 into a bank to the joint account of his solicitor Ridsdale, and Engel who was reappointed as trustee under the scheme.

On the 2nd of September the scheme was approved, and on the 7th of October the creditors held a meeting at which they voted remuneration to the trustee at the rate of 5 per cent. on all moneys "brought to the credit" of the estate, and 5 per cent. on the amount distributed in dividends.

When the trustee sent in his accounts he claimed 5 per cent. on the sum paid by the bankrupt's father to provide for the composition. The bankrupt and his father objected to the claim and made the present application.

Younger, for the applicants.—The resolution of the creditors was ultra vires, for the scheme had already been approved and the money paid to provide for the composition; they were voting remuneration not out of the estate but out of the father's money. They used the words "brought to credit" because they could not say that the amount provided by the father had been "realized by the trustee," but the only remuneration allowed by section 72, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and section 15, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy, Act, 1890, is on the "amount realized by the trustee."

Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—The creditors had power to grant this remuneration. The amount in question was practically "realized by the trustee," for the estate was to vest in the father after payment of the composition, thus the transaction was equivalent to a sale of the estate by the trustee: see Ex parte The Board of Trade, In re Marsden, 9 Morrell 70. Further, the words "brought to credit" are those used in the Board of Trade order as to fees and percentages chargeable by the official receiver: Scale of Fees, Table B.

Younger, in reply, referred to rules 305, 306, as showing that commission is only payable on the amount "realized by the trustee."

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me, looking at the language of section 72, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which enacts that the remuneration of the trustee as to one part shall be payable "on the amount realized," that it is clear that the trustee cannot be voted remuneration on any amount which he has not actually earned, and this section is not in any way weakened by section 15, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890.

I do not agree that the transaction in this case was equivalent to a sale of the estate. It is true that the estate was to vest in the father on his paying the composition, but the estate was only worth about £400, and the father had to provide £5,200.

The amount on which the trustee is claiming commission was not realized by him at all, but was a fund provided by the father, and I am of opinion that the trustee is not entitled to any percentage upon it, and that this application must be allowed.

Bankruptcy—Office of trustee vacated on receiving order being made against him—Rescission of receiving order—Restoration of trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 85.

By section 85 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "If a receiving order is made against a trustee, he shall thereby vacate his office of trustee."

A receiving order had been made against a trustee, and soon afterwards rescinded on the ground that it ought never to have been made.

Held, that the receiving order should be treated as if it never had been made, and the trustee deemed not to have vacated his office.

Motion by the official receiver for an order that the respondent do hand over to him the estate of one Newman, a bankrupt.

On the 10th of July, 1894, Newman was adjudicated bankrupt, and on the 12th of July the respondent Hurt was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

On the 4th of March, 1899, a receiving order was made against Hurt, and on the 6th of April the Inspector-General in Bankruptcy ordered him to hand over the books and other assets of the bankrupt's estate to the official receiver.

Shortly afterwards the receiving order against Hurt was rescinded on the ground that it ought never to have been made, there being no petitioning creditor's debt, and he refused to hand over the estate. The official receiver thereupon launched the present motion.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—I submit that this case depends entirely on the words of section 85 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "If a receiving order is made against a trustee he shall thereby vacate his office of trustee." The respondent vacated his office when the receiving order was made against him on the 4th of March, and should be ordered to hand over the estate to the official receiver.

Hansell, for the respondent.—Where a receiving order has been rescinded on the ground that it ought never to have been made, the person against whom it was made ought to be fully restored to his former position: see Bailey v. Johnson, 20 W. R. 1013, L. R. 7 Ex. 263, and Crewe v. Terry, 2 C. P. D. 403, 25 W. R. Dig. 13. The respondent here ought to be treated as if no receiving order had ever been made against him, and continued in his office as trustee.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that this particular case is free from difficulty. It is true that a receiving order was made against the respondent, but it was speedily rescinded on the ground that there was no debt to support the petition, and therefore the receiving order ought never to have been made. I think that common sense requires that the respondent should be restored to his office of trustee subject to any new rights which may have arisen in the meanwhile. If any new rights arise they would have to be taken into consideration. If no new rights arise, which seems to be the case here, then I think that I ought to hold that the receiving order was rescinded ab initio and should be treated as though it never had been made. I think, therefore, that the trustee was restored to his original position, and that this application must be dismissed.

KING v. HUTTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Stock Exchange transactions—Bankruptcy of broker—Debt for differences due to client—Collection of assets by official assignee of Stock Exchange—Surplus after payment of Stock Exchange creditors—Claim by trustee in bankruptcy.

A sum of money due from a stockbroker to a customer for differences is not impressed with any trust in favour of the customer, but, on the bankruptcy of the broker, passes to the trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of the general body of creditors.

Interpleader issue to determine whether the sum of £286 8s. 9d. paid into court by the official assignee of the Stock Exchange was the property of the plaintiff or the defendant.

In 1898 Woodd, a stockbroker, now bankrupt, had open a speculative account in certain blocks of shares for the defendant Hutton.

On the 13th of December, 1898, Woodd bought certain stocks for the defendant which he sold on the 19th of December for the account at the end of December.

On the 28th of December, which was contango day, the account showed a balance of profit in favour of the defendant amounting to £286 8s. 9d.

On the 29th of December Woodd closed the contracts by passing on the ticket of the stocks he had sold to the jobbers, and on the same day he absconded, being largely in debt.

On the 30th of December, which was pay day, Woodd was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange.

On the 30th of December the official assignee of the Stock Exchange closed all Woodd's contracts on the Stock Exchange, and collected about £2,000 due to Woodd. After discharging all Woodd's liabilities on the Stock Exchange the official assignee had in hand a balance of about £600.

On the 14th of January, 1899, a receiving order was made against Woodd, he was adjudicated bankrupt on the 28th of January, and King, the plaintiff, was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

On the 9th of February the defendant claimed the sum of £286 8s. 9d., representing the balance due to him from Woodd, from the official assignee of the Stock Exchange.

On the 17th of February the plaintiff claimed the same sum, whereupon the official assignee took out an interpleader summons and the present issue was directed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the plaintiff.—The trustee should have this money for the benefit of the general body of creditors. It does not represent specific stock sold for the defendant, and therefore is not impressed with any trust in his favour. It only represents differences on an account, including various securities. No rules of the Stock Exchange can prejudice creditors outside that body: Tomkins v. Saffery, 26 W. R. 62, 3 App. Cas. 213.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Widnell, for the defendant.—If Woodd had remained solvent he would have been trustee of this money for the defendant, and his trustee can have no higher rights than he had.

They cited Ex parte Grant, In re Plumbly, 28 W. R. 775, 13 Ch. D. 667; Ex parte Cooke, In re Strachan, 25 W. R. 171, 4 Ch. PHILLIMORE, J.—This case has presented several difficulties, and upon the best consideration I can come to I think there must be judgment for the plaintiff on the issue. The form of the issue in this case prevents there being any question of parties or form of action to consider. It might very well be that if the official assignee had not intervened the true remedy of the trustee in bankruptcy would have been to apply to the various dealers who owed money to the defaulting stockbroker Woodd, and to request them to pay him, the trustee in bankruptcy, and to sue them if they did not do so. That would have been a most inconvenient course, and it is very much better that the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, whatever other view might be taken, should collect all these moneys, and that they should be considered as paid to him for whomsoever they might concern. But, as I have said, the form of the issue and the fact that the money is in court, render it unimportant to consider what might have been the necessary forms if there had been some other arrangement of litigation.

The real and sole question here is, whether a sum of £286 8s. 9d. less, I suppose, some costs of paying it in, is part of the assets of the defaulting debtor Woodd, or whether it is impressed with a trust in favour of the claimant Hutton, the defendant in this issue. Now, this fund was not really collected by the action of the official assignee under the operation of the rules of the Stock Exchange, by which, when a man becomes a defaulter, his actual transactions are put an end to. This particular sum of money simply represents the balance due from Woodd to Hutton on the settling day, the 28th of December, Woodd not having become a defaulter until the 30th. We have nothing to do here with any moneys which might have accrued under current transactions between the 28th of December and the settling day in the middle of January. This sum of £286 8s. 9d. represents simply differences due at the last settling day, which could have been recovered there and then, if they had so chosen, by the clients, or at any rate on the 30th of December, which was pay day. It is not an artificial fund created by the rules of the Stock Exchange, and therefore I have not to consider the questions which were raised in the case of Ex parte Grant, In re Plumbly, 28 W. R. 775, 13 Ch. D. 667. Nor again is this a case in which a broker has been directed to sell one particular parcel of stock, in which case some of the language in Ex parte Cook, In re Strachan, 25 W. R. 171, 4 Ch. D. 123, and possibly in Taylor v. Plumer, 3 M. & S. 562, might apply. Here Hutton has made Woodd his agent to buy and sell various stocks on the Stock Exchange, and the arrangement between them, as I find it, was this: not that in respect of each security the value of it when sold came to Hutton, nor even that in respect of each security the difference of profit or loss between buying and selling came to or was paid by Hutton; but that the only thing Hutton expected to get from Woodd was the balance of account, the margin of profit, if there was one, between profit and loss on the various securities dealt, as each account came through. Now, in respect of that balance, can it be said that Woodd was a trustee for Hutton? I think certainly not. I think it was a general debt due from Woodd to Hutton, and therefore a debt for which Hutton, under the circumstances, must prove for in the bankruptcy in the ordinary way. I have not here to deal, as I have said, with cases where the default occurs in the middle of a bargain. In that case I have no doubt the customer can step in, either by himself or by another broker, and complete the transaction, receive the stock or the purchase-money of the stock, as the case may be. But in this case the differences were well ascertained and fixed. There was no stock to receive, no stock to sell, on the account between broker and customer—there was merely a balance. I have considered all the cases to which I have been referred, and I come to the conclusion that it is not right to say that this balance is the specific money of the customer. It is a debt due from the broker to the customer, and the fund in question is part of the ordinary assets of the broker, and must be paid over to the trustee in bankruptcy, and Hutton must prove against the bankrupt's estate in the usual way.

Where a secured creditor has assessed the value of his security in his petition, but has not yet proved in the bankruptcy, the trustee cannot call upon him to surrender his security upon payment of the value at which it has been assessed in the petition.

Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey, 13 Q. B. D. 128, 32 W. R. Dig. 21, distinguished.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion by the trustee in bankruptcy for an order on the respondent W. H. Hart for delivery up of certain valuable securities upon payment of £3,200, being the value at which the respondent had assessed them in his petition.

The respondent in the case was the creditor on whose petition the receiving order had been made. In his petition he set forth that he held certain railway shares as security for his debt, and assessed their value at £3,200. The shares having since risen in value to £3,973, the trustee claimed to be entitled to redeem them at the value assessed in the petition, and formally tendered the sum of £3,200 in cash and demanded delivery of the shares. The respondent refused to part with them, whereupon the trustee instituted the present proceedings.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the trustee.—A creditor can never get any more for his security than the amount at which he originally values it. He is bound by the estimate which he makes, and must surrender it to the trustee on payment of the assessed value: see Couldery v. Bartrum, 30 W. R. 141, 19 Ch. D. 394; Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey, 13 Q. B. D. 128, 32 W. R. Dig. 21.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and H. Kisch, for the respondent.—The trustee's power to redeem securities depends now upon rules 11 and 12 of the second schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, and they do not apply until the creditor has valued his security in his proof. Here the creditor has not as yet sent in a proof at all, and the trustee is not yet in a position to redeem his securities. Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey, has no application to the question of redeeming a security.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I think the claim of the trustee fails on the ground that there is nothing in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, or the rules, which gives him the right to redeem a security except in cases where a creditor has proved, either under Schedule I. for the purpose of voting, or under Schedule II. for the purpose of ranking for dividend. Rule 2 in Schedule II. provides that a secured creditor shall, before ranking for dividend, state in his proof the value at which he assesses his security. Then rule 12 says that where a security is "so valued" the trustee may at any time redeem it on payment to the creditor of the assessed value, and the same words "so valued" occur again in rule 13. I think that those words "so valued" in those rules expressly refer to rule 2, and mean, as that rule says, the assessed value in the proof. Here the creditor has not proved for his debt, and therefore those rules do not apply, and whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature, there is nothing in the Act or the rules which goes further or applies to a petitioning creditor. But then I have to deal with the case of Ex parte Taylor, In re Lacey. At first I thought that it expressly applied to the present case, but, when it is looked at, it is only a case turning on the sufficiency of the petitioning creditor's debt. I do not think it is an authority on the question of redemption, because the attention of the court there was not called to the point raised in the present case.

I think, therefore, that it is not an authority for the proposition for which it is cited in the text-books —namely, that where a debtor is adjudicated bankrupt on the petition of a secured creditor, the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to redeem the security at the amount at which it is valued in the petition.

In default of children the fund to form part of the residue. He bequeathed another sum of £12,000 upon similar trusts for another daughter, her husband, and children. The residue he devised and bequeathed to his two sons absolutely in equal shares. The testator empowered his trustees to raise any part (not exceeding one moiety) of the expectant share of any grandchild of his under his will, and apply it for the advancement of such grandchild. FOX v. FOX, 23 W. R. 314, L. R. 19 Eq. 286, approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. A testator by his will bequeathed £12,000 to trustees upon trust to invest the same within ten years after his decease, and to pay the income thereof to his daughter Jessie during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death to pay £1,000 to her husband, if then living, and subject as aforesaid as to capital and income upon trust for all the children of his said daughter when they should attain the age of twenty-five years, but not before, in equal shares, and in case there should not be "any such child" the fund was to form part of the residue; and until the £12,000 should be invested the trustees were directed to pay to his said daughter, or, in the event of her decease, to her said husband and children, interest at £3 per cent. on "their respective portions." Then came another bequest of £12,000 upon similar trusts in favour of another daughter of the testator, her husband, and children, with a similar trust in default of children. The testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate, real and personal, to his sons James Neave Turney and Horace Turney absolutely. Then came a gift over in the event of either son dying in the testator's lifetime and leaving children who should attain the age of twenty-five years.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator declared that his trustees might, at their discretion, raise any part or parts (not exceeding altogether one moiety) of the expectant share of any grandchild under his will, and apply the same for his or her advancement. And he empowered his trustees to apply all or any part of the income arising from the expectant share of any grandchild under his will after the death of the preceding owner for life thereof, for the maintenance and education of each such grandchild, and he directed his trustees to invest and accumulate the unapplied income in augmentation of the capital of such share.

By a codicil to his will the testator explained that his son James Neave Turney was in bad health, and continued: "I revoke the absolute gift of one moiety of my residuary estate to my son James Neave contained in my will, and instead thereof I direct my trustees to hold the said moiety of my residuary real and personal estate in trust to pay the income thereof to my son James Neave during his life, and after his death upon trust for his child or children absolutely upon their attaining the age of twenty-five years, and in the event of the death of either or all of the children of my said son James Neave before attaining the age of twenty-five, then upon trust to pay the share of the child or children so dying to my said son Horace George absolutely." In other respects the testator confirmed his will.

The testator's four children survived him, and they were his sole statutory next-of-kin, his son James Neave Turney being his heir-at-law. James Neave Turney subsequently died, leaving a widow and two children. He left a will by which he appointed executors and trustees, and devised and bequeathed his residuary estate upon certain trusts. Each of the testator's daughters had children.

An originating summons was issued by the testator's trustees to determine the construction of his will. Kekewich, J., held that the trusts of the moiety of the residuary estate after the death of James Neave Turney were void for remoteness, and that there was an intestacy as to that moiety. He also held that the trusts declared of the two sums of £12,000 respectively after the respective deaths of the two daughters (except the trusts for their respective husbands) were respectively void for remoteness.

James Neave Turney's children appealed against the decision so far as the moiety of the residuary estate was concerned, and the children of the daughters appealed against the decision as regarded the two sums of £12,000.

Renshaw, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for James Neave Turney's children.

Warrington, Q.C., and Bassett Hopkins, for James Neave Turney's widow.

Theobald, Q.C., and Solomon, for the testator's two daughters.

Hughes, Q.C., and Broomfield, for the children of the daughters.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and P. S. Stokes, for the trustees of the testator's will.

A. Beddall, for the trustees of James Neave Turney's will.

The argument principally turned on the language used by the testator, but on behalf of the appellants the case of Fox v. Fox, 23 W. R. 314, L. R. 19 Eq. 286, was relied on as an authority that a gift to legatees to be paid on their attaining a certain age followed by a gift of the income for their maintenance was a vested gift. On the other side it was argued that since the decision of North, J., in In re Wintle, Tucker v. Wintle, 45 W. R 91, [1896] 2 Ch. 711, Fox v. Fox must be taken to be overruled.

LINDLEY, M.R.—In this case I do not think we shall gain any advantage by taking time to consider it. This case turns, of course, upon the language of these two documents, the will and codicil, and I confess that the impression upon my mind is that the learned judge is wrong in saying that there is an intestacy either as to the residue or as to the £12,000. The intestacy which the learned judge has arrived at is not an intestacy created by any ambiguity in the language of the will. It is an intestacy created by the application to the will of the doctrine of perpetuities. Of course we are not at liberty to misconstrue the will in order to avoid an intestacy brought about by the application of the doctrine of perpetuities, any more than we are in those cases where gifts are bad under the Charitable Trusts Act. We must construe the will and see what it means, and the question we have to consider is whether these gifts were vested subject to being divested or only vested on attaining twenty-five years.

Now, neither the will nor the codicil are well drawn; the language is by no means clear. It is not accurate, and, if I may venture upon a guess, I may say I do not believe the draftsman knew anything about the doctrine of perpetuities. If he had, he would not have drawn the will in the language which he has done. He has run his clients on to a shoal and the question is whether they can get off or not.

Now I will take the first appeal first. By the will the testator left the residue in substance to trustees—his two sons, as I understand. The testator had two sons and two daughters, those are the folks he provided for and their children. One of them appears to have been in ill-health; and by his will he leaves the residue to his two sons, because the word "or" obviously means "and in equal shares." Then there is a limitation that "if the sons or either of them should die in my lifetime leaving children who should survive me and attain the age of twenty-five years, then the last-mentioned child or children should take, and if more than one equally," and so on.

Now, by his codicil in which he gives his reasons, he revokes the gift of the whole of that residue so far as James Neave Turney is concerned. [His lordship read the codicil, and continued:] Now, the first observation I make upon that is this, that the expression "in trust to pay the income to my said son during his life and after his death upon trust for his child or children absolutely upon their attaining the age of twenty-five years" suggests this question, What does he mean by "absolutely"? Does he mean anything more than this, that it is to be paid to them at twenty-five? I think the language is ambiguous, but it is put in for some purpose, to make something clearer than it would be without it, and my impression is that it refers rather to payment. I do not say it is clear; it is not clear at all. But what to my mind removes the difficulty about holding this to be a vested interest is this, that he treats the children of his son James Neave as having shares although they may die before twenty-five. That is seen plainly in the clause which follows. It says "upon trust for his child or children absolutely upon their attaining twenty-five, and in the event of the death of either or all the children of my son James Neave before attaining twenty-five then upon trust to pay the share of the child or children so dying to my son Horace." Now, he treats the children of James dying under twenty-five as having shares which he bequeaths. Of course it is possible to construe it as Mr. Theobald construes it, but I doubt whether the meaning which he has suggested is the meaning of the will. Obscure as the will is, I think the preferable meaning, and that which is most in accordance with the testator's wish, is to say that there is a vested interest in this moiety given to the children of James Neave to be paid at twenty-five. Then there is a provision that if they die under twenty-five it is subject to being divested. I think that is a preferable view of that provision. Of course, if that is so, then the doctrine of remoteness goes. Quite apart from the doctrine of remoteness, I should say that that is rather the true meaning. I do not see how otherwise you can give full effect to that clause "upon trust to pay the share of the child or children so dying." Well, so much for the residue.

Now I turn to the £12,000 given to the daughters. The trustees within ten years from the date of his decease are to invest £12,000 in securities which he mentions, and then he says: "Upon trust to pay the income arising therefrom to my daughter Jessie Annie Arnold for life, and after her death to pay £1,000" (that is, £1,000 out of the £12,000) "to her husband if he shall be alive, and subject as aforesaid as to as well the capital as the annual income of the said trust fund" (that will be £12,000 if there is no husband alive, and £11,000 if there is) "upon trust for all the children of my daughter when they shall attain the age of twenty-five years, but not before," (I do not think anything turns upon the "not before" it emphasises it, that is all) "whether a son or daughter, and if more than one in equal shares."

Now, who are the legatees? Are the legatees all the children of the daughter, or are they the children who shall live to attain twenty-five? The expression "when" is not equivalent to the expression "who." It might work out so, but the language is, "the children of the daughter," and the "when" is the time. The importance of that will be seen presently because the next clause is, "and in case there shall not be any such child." I take it "such" means child of the daughter; it does not mean child of the daughter who shall attain twenty-five years. If it had been "who," I do not say it would not have been more difficult. "In case there shall not be any such child, then I direct that the fund shall form part of the residue." Then he says, "And I declare that until the sum of £12,000 shall be invested or otherwise provided for, my trustees shall pay to Jessie, or in the event of her decease then to the said husband and children interest on their respective portions." Now, what does that mean? How can you work that out unless you hold that the children take a vested interest subject to being divested. There is great difficulty in coming to any other conclusion if you attend to the words "children and their respective portions." I attach great importance to that phrase, "respective portions."

Then in addition to that there is the clause relating to maintenance which points in the same direction. I do not attach very much importance to it; but putting all these things together it appears to me that the conclusion as to the £12,000 is that it is vested in the children subject to its being divested, just as the residue is vested in them subject to the divesting. I think that is not straining the will; I think the will is badly drawn. I do not say that it is as capable of one construction as the other, but it is pretty nearly so, and if one construction leads to carrying out the intention and the other defeats it I think we ought to adopt a construction which carries it out. That is not at all misconstruing the will in order to avoid an intestacy, which we have no business to do, and which I protest against.

As regards the authorities, I say very little about them. I do not think much is gained by their consideration, but I am not at all satisfied that Fox v. Fox is wrong. My impression is that Fox v. Fox is very good sense and very good law.

JEUNE, P.—I agree especially with the view that where it is possible, having regard to the language of the will, to put upon it a construction which has not the effect of rendering a material part of it void by the application of the doctrine of perpetuities, it is desirable to do so. Of course, as the Master of the Rolls says, you have no right to misconstrue a will with that object, but if the will is ambiguous it is proper to lean rather to a construction which undoubtedly carries out the intention of the testator in the sense that it makes his will effectual and does not allow it to be rendered void by a doctrine which, if he had known it, he would certainly have desired to steer clear of.

Looking at this will it appears to me that almost every indication, which can be picked up in various parts of the will points to this gift being vested in the children.

With regard to the authorities, after reading the case of Fox v. Fox, what I should say about it is, it appears to me to be a very careful consideration of the authorities, and I confess, so far as I am able to express an opinion, I agree with the view taken by Sir George Jessel, M.R., that there is to be gathered from the earlier cases a general rule. That general rule appears to be founded on good sense. So far from thinking, therefore, that the case of Fox v. Fox ought to be considered as overruled, I confess I should be glad to think that the case of Fox v. Fox is established as law.

ROMER, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect. His lordship based his reasons entirely on the peculiar language used in the will.

*Company—Director—Dividends—Loss of capital—Ultra vires—Negligence—Fraud—Reliance of director on officers of company—Statements honestly made—Damage—Statute of Limitations.*

If the annual receipts of a company exceed the annual outgoings, dividends may be declared out of such excess of receipts, notwithstanding that there has been a loss of paid-up capital of the company. Even a limited banking company is not prohibited by law from paying dividends unless its paid-up capital is intact.

If a director make misstatements to his shareholders, he is liable for the consequences unless he can show that he made them honestly believing them to be true, and took such care to ascertain the truth as was reasonable at the time.

What constitutes reasonable care, and how far a director is justified in trusting his subordinates, are questions of degree in each case. The fact that if a director had made inquiries he might have discovered that he was being deceived is not in itself sufficient to prove that he did not act with reasonable care.

Articles of a company gave the company a lien on the shares of any shareholders who were indebted to the company. The directors were empowered to make advances to shareholders with or without security, but no advance was to be made to a director without security. Advances were made to directors, the only security being the lien on their shares conferred on the company by the articles.

Held, that, in point of law, the shares might be accepted as security if the board of directors considered them sufficient as regarded value.

A liquidator of a company, representing shareholders, is not debarred from recovering moneys which have been improperly paid by way of dividend by the fact that the claims of all creditors of the company have been satisfied.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. The material facts were as follows: The National Bank of Wales was incorporated as a limited company in 1879 for the purpose of carrying on the business of bankers. Its capital was £2,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of £20 each. The shares issued were never paid up in full, £10 being paid up and the remaining £10 being uncalled. The paid-up capital amounted in 1884 to £125,000, and it so remained till 1890, when it was increased to £225,000. The articles of association which were material were the following:

(15) Gave the company a lien on all the shares held by any shareholder indebted to the company and gave the directors a power to sell the shares of any such shareholder; (78) enabled any director to resign, and on the acceptance of his resignation by a board his office was vacated; (82) made audited accounts approved by a general meeting conclusive, except as regards errors discovered within three months; (82, 83) entitled the directors and officers to indemnity, except against their own wilful acts and defaults; (86) entrusted the management of the business of the company to the board of directors. Article (98*b*) empowered the board to appoint and dismiss branch managers and the general manager; (98 e and h) empowered the board to lend money or give credit with or without security. But there was (in 98*c*) a proviso "that no advance without security shall be made or credit given" to any director; (105) required the directors to cause proper accounts to be kept, so as to show the true state and condition of the company; (108) required them to lay before every ordinary meeting a proper balance-sheet, accompanied by a report as to the state and condition of the company, and as to the amount, if any, which they recommended to be paid out of the profits by way of dividend; (109 to 118) provided for auditing the accounts. The auditors were to have access to the company's books and accounts. By (116 and 117) they were to have copies of the statements proposed to be laid before the general meetings, and it was declared to be their duty to examine the same, with the accounts and vouchers relating to them, and to make a report thereon, and also to examine and report on the assets of the company. The auditors were also to report errors and irregularities to the board; (119) empowered the directors, with the sanction of a general meeting, to declare dividends in proportion to the amounts paid up on the shares, and also authorized the payment by the directors of interim dividends out of the profits of the bank accrued in any half-year ending the 30th of June; (120) empowered the directors to set aside out of the profits a reserve fund, and no dividend exceeding 6 per cent. per annum was to be paid until the reserve fund amounted to one-fifth of the paid-up capital; (121) provided that the reserve fund might be applied to meet contingencies, equalize dividends, repairs, or any other purpose of the company which the board may think fit.

The company's principal bank and its head office were at Cardiff, where the directors met and the general manager was in daily attendance. The company had also many branch banks, each with its own manager.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

and moreover that part of such interest and dividends were retained by the said John Cory and converted to his own use as a shareholder of the company."

The appeal and cross-appeal thus require th court to examine into Mr. John Cory's conduct as a director of the company from the time when he became a director in 1884 until he ceased to be so in December, 1890, or even later if the liquidator is correct.

The order, under review, was made on a summons issued under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, on the 14th of June, 1895, a date which is material, having regard to the Statute of Limitations, on which Mr. Cory relies as a defence to the greater part of the demands made against him.

It will be convenient to consider his appeal first. This raises the question whether the funds of the company have been misapplied in payment of dividends. Before examining the controverted facts and discussing the legal questions which arise, it is desirable to state shortly the history of the company and how the present contr versy has arisen. [His lordship then stated the facts set out above as to the incorporation of the company and the conduct of its business, and continued:] The minutes of the directors' meetings show that, speaking generally, they attended with reasonable regularity and transacted a large amount of business. No director, unless it was the chairman, attended to any details not brought before the board either by the chairman or by the general manager. Mr. John Cory stated in his affidavit the general course of business at board meetings, and his cross-examination does not substantially differ from the account he there gives.

Wright, J., has regarded this evidence as an admission by Mr. John Cory of a total abnegation of the use of his faculties, and of an entire neglect of his duties. We cannot go so far as this. His evidence does, however, show that he only attended, when present, to whatever his attention was called to; and that, having no suspicion that anything was wrong, he made no special inquiries in order to ascertain that all was right. [His lordship then referred to the circumstances of the agreement with the Metropolitan Bank, and continued:] There can be no doubt that the shareholders were grievously deceived by the reports and balance-sheets laid before them, and no one can be surprised at their anger with their directors, and especially with the chairman and general manager, both of whom have been criminally prosecuted and convicted for their fraudulent conduct. Mr. John Cory's answer, however, to the attempt to make him liable for the losses sustained, and dividends paid, whilst he was a director, is that he was himself as much deceived as the shareholders by the chairman and manager, and that he was not guilty of any breach of his duty in not making special investigation when he had no reason to suppose that anything was wrong.

Wright, J., has come to the conclusion that Mr. John Cory was not only negligent but fraudulent; or, at all events, guilty of misconduct equivalent to fraud as regards its legal consequences. The learned judge has arrived at this conclusion from the fact that in their reports the directors unjustifiably stated that they had made provision for all bad and doubtful debts, whereas they had not. That the chairman and manager knew this, is very likely true, but that Mr. John Cory knew it is quite another matter. The table of bad debts shows that sums were constantly written off for bad debts, and there is nothing to justify the inference that Mr. John Cory knew that those sums were insufficient or that he did not honestly believe them to be sufficient. It may be that he ought to have been more vigilant than he was, and that he should not have trusted his brother and Collins so much as he did. But negligence is one thing, fraud is another, and we are quite unable to adopt Wright, J.'s, view that Mr. John Cory acted fraudulently in making reports to the shareholders and laying the balance-sheets before them. At the close of the argument for the liquidator we intimated that, in our opinion, the charge of fraud against Mr. John Cory failed, and further study of the evidence has strengthened this conviction. This is not only a very important matter to him as regards character, but to a great extent it relieves him from responsibility for anything done or omitted before the 14th of June, 1889.

Another part of the case on which we are unable to agree with Wright, J., relates to the date of Mr. John Cory's retirement from the board. There can be no doubt that he sent in a letter of resignation (although it was not produced), and that his resignation was accepted at a meeting of directors held in London on the 18th of December, 1890, and that he was informed of its acceptance on the 22nd of December, 1890. There can also be no doubt that his resignation was concealed from the shareholders until after their meeting on the 21st of January, 1891, and that, in the report then laid before the shareholders, the name of Mr. John Cory appeared as a director. The evidence is conflicting upon the question whether his resignation was or was not mentioned at the meeting. On the other hand, he was not present at it, and he swears he did not know that his name still appeared as a director. The learned judge says he is unable to believe that Mr. John Cory did not know that his name so appeared, and in the view of the court below Mr. John Cory improperly allowed his retirement to be concealed and allowed himself to be held out as a continuing director and as concurring in the report of January, 1891, which the learned judge holds to be as fraudulent on Mr. John Cory's part as those which preceded it. We cannot adopt the learned judge's view of this part of the case. We are satisfied that Mr. John Cory's resignation was bonâ fide and a fact, not a sham. He was not in fact a director after his resignation was accepted. He took no part in drawing up the report nor in recommending the dividend declared in January, 1891. Even if he received the report before the meeting and saw his name as a director and did not insist that his name should be struck out or that his resignation should be mentioned to the meeting (and the case against him cannot be put more strongly than this), even then we fail to see how such knowledge and omission can, without more, make him liable for misapplying the funds of the company, when in truth he took no part in their misapplication.

With these preliminary observations we pass to consider Mr. John Cory's liability in respect of the dividends declared in July and December, 1889, and July, 1890. The liquidator has taken the view that the dividends declared and paid by the company when Mr. John Cory was a director were all paid out of the capital of the company, and the evidence adduced by the liquidator is directed to prove that such was the case. But when this evidence is examined it seems quite plain that the dividends were not in fact paid out of any part of the money forming the paid-up nominal capital of the company, but were paid notwithstanding the loss of that capital and without making it good. What was done was this. The accounts were made up annually. Such losses incurred during the year as the directors recognized as losses were written off or provided for by carrying sums of money over to a reserve fund, and the balance of the receipts in each year over the outgoings in the same year (after making some allowance for bad debts and deductions for sums carried over to the reserve fund) were treated as the profits of that year, and were divided as dividends. Losses written off in one year were not brought forward the next year so as to diminish the profits of that year, but were simply ignored, a fresh start being made every year and dividends being divided out of the excess of the annual receipts over the annual expenses. The effect of this was to throw all bad debts written off, and not provided for by an increase of reserve fund, on the capital and to diminish the paid-up capital year by year, and nevertheless to keep paying dividends out of the excess of the annual receipts over the annual expenses. It is obvious that this method of procedure, if long continued, would ultimately exhaust the paid-up capital of the company, and the first disastrous year in which the current outgoings exceeded the current incomings would produce great embarrassments Such a mode of dealing with the company's assets, however reprehensible, must nevertheless not be confounded with paying dividends out of the paid-up capital of the company. The paid-up capital of a limited company cannot be lawfully returned to the shareholders under the guise of dividends or otherwise. Even an article of association authorizing the payment of interest to shareholders on the amounts paid up on their shares cannot authorize a payment of such interest out of capital: see In re Sharpe. But paid-up capital which is lost can no more be applied in paying dividends than in paying debts. Its loss renders any subsequent application of it impossible. There was no such dealing with the paid-up capital of the company in this case as to amount to an illegal application of it. Further, it is not possible for the court to say that the law prohibits a limited company, even a limited banking company, from paying dividends unless its paid-up capital is intact. Suppose a heavy unexpected loss is sustained. It must be met if there are assets to meet it with. The capital, even uncalled capital, must, if necessary, be applied to meet it. Such an application of capital is a perfectly legimate use of it. There is no law which in the case supposed prevents the payment of all future dividends until all the capital so expended is made good. Many honest and prudent men of business would replace a large loss of capital by degrees and reduce the dividends, but not stop them entirely, until the whole loss was made good. No law compels them to pay none at all. There are cases in which no honest competent man of business would think of charging particular debts or expenses to capital. We are certainly not prepared to sanction the notion that all debts incurred in carrying on a business can be properly permanently charged to capital, and that the excess of receipts over the other outgoings can be afterwards properly divided as profit, as if there had been no previous loss. No honest competent man engaged in trade or commerce would carry on business on such a principle. But, excluding cases in which everyone can see that a particular debt or outlay cannot be reasonably charged to capital, it may be safely said that what losses can be properly charged to capital and what to income is a matter for business men to determine, and is often a matter on which opinions of honest and competent men differ: see Gregory v. Patchett, 13 W. R 34, 33 Beav. 595. There is no hard-and-fast legal rule on the subject. There can, however, be no doubt that if expenses or payments are obviously improperly charged to capital, and are so charged simply to swell the apparent profits and to make it appear that dividends may be properly declared, dividends declared and paid under such circumstances cannot be treated as legitimately paid out of profits, and can no more be justified than if they were paid out of capital. This was determined in Bloxam v. The Metropolitan Railway Co., 16 W. R. 490, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 337, and has been acted upon in many other cases—e.g., Rance's case, In re The Oxford Benefit Building Society, The Leeds Estate Co. v. Shepherd, In re The London and General Bank, 44 W. R. 80, [1895] 2 Ch. 673. It would seem that Sir G. Jessel inclined to the opinion that a limited company could not pay dividends unless its paid-up capital was kept up: see In re The Ebbw Vale, &c., Co., 4 Ch. D. 827, 25 W. R. Dig. 48. But no decision has yet gone this length, and it has since been decided that dividends may be paid, even by a limited company, although its nominal capital is not kept up: see Verner v. General and Commercial Investment Trust, and the earlier case Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co. What was lost there was fixed capital, and it is obvious that circulating capital or any other money employed in earning returns must be deducted from them in order to ascertain how much of them can be regarded as profit. If the returns do not exceed the money spent in procuring them (whether that money be called circulating capital or any other name) there can be no profits, and no ingenious process of book-keeping can alter the fact. It is not denied in this case that the annual receipts did exceed the annual outgoings, and the dividends having been paid out of the excess, the allegation that they were paid out of capital is not accurate. But, as already pointed out, it does not at all follow that the course adopted by the directors, in declaring dividends year after year as they did, was legally justifiable. It cannot be denied that the balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts concealed the truth (as now known) from the shareholders, and were, as it now turns out, grievously misleading. The shareholders were never told that the paid-up capital was being constantly diminished by bad debts, as now appears to have been the case. The shareholders were told every year that proper provision was made for those debts, and now that the case has been thoroughly investigated it is really reduced to the question whether Mr. John Cory was justified in making the statements he did and in dealing as he did with debts which have now been ascertained to be bad. It is easy to be wise after the event, and there is danger in treating a director as knowing years ago what now appears to be the fact. But it is the duty of the court to examine the state of things as they appeared to him when the dividends were declared, and to determine whether he was justified in what he did by what he knew and ought to have known. What he ought to have known is as important as what he knew. It was stated in a judgment delivered in this court a few weeks ago in the Lagunas case, ante p. 74, that if directors act within their powers, if they act with such care as is reasonably to be expected from them having regard to their knowledge and experience, and if they act honestly for the benefit of the company they represent, they discharge their equitable as well as their legal duty to that company. We believe this statement of the law to be correct, and we adopt it as our guide. It has been shown that in this case the dividends did not, in fact, come out of the paid-up capital of the company. Fraud is not established against Mr. John Cory, nor is there any proof that he was acting in the interests of his own friends or of himself and not bonâ fide with a view to the interest of the National Bank. The inquiry, therefore, so far as he is concerned, is reduced to the representations he made as to the position of the company and of his alleged want of care and attention to the affairs of the bank, and more particularly to his omission to find out that the manager was misleading the directors. In the Lagunas case it was said, and we repeat it, that the amount of care to be taken is difficult to define; but it is plain that directors are not liable for all the mistakes they may make, although if they had taken more care they might have avoided them: see Overend, Gurney, & Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 H. L. 480. Their negligence must be not the omission to take all possible care; it must be much more blameable than that; it must be in a business sense culpable or gross. We do not know how better to describe it. Some useful observations justifying the expression gross negligence will be found in Lord Chelmsford's judgment in Giblin v. McMullen, 17 W. R. 445, L. R. 2 P. C. 336. It is not, however, necessary to enlarge on this subject. The care, which in any case can be reasonably expected to be taken is, speaking generally, the measure of the care which the law requires to be taken where there is no contract affecting the question. What we have to determine is whether Mr. John Cory was justified in making the statements he made, and whether he could be reasonably expected to find out more than he in fact knew. Bad and doubtful debts were constantly considered and provided for; some being written off; some by setting aside reserve capital; £12,000 odd were written off before 1890, and £13,600, or thereabouts, were written off in that year, and £70 000 was set aside for reserve capital. Such matters were considered by the directors. The accusation is that they did not do enough in this way. But here again, even if some debts known to the manager to be bad were treated as good, it is not proved that Mr. John Cory knew this or had reason to suspect that what was done was inadequate. His evidence is clear that he neither knew nor suspected that such was the case, and that he really believed that the provision was ample. The same question arises, Was it his duty to test the accuracy or completeness of what he was told by the general manager and managing director? This is a question on which opinions may differ, but we are not prepared to say that he failed in his legal duty. Business cannot be carried on, on principles of distrust. Men in responsible positions must be trusted by those above them as well as by those below them until there is reason to distrust them. We agree that care and prudence do not involve distrust, but for a director acting honestly himself to be held legally liable for negligence in trusting the officers under him not to conceal from him what they ought to report to him appears to us to be laying too heavy a burden on honest business men. But this is the whole of Mr. John Cory's shortcomings as proved by the evidence. Even his letter of the 19th of January, 1888, on which Wright, J., placed so much stress, ceases to turn the case against him if he honestly believed it to be true, and if he was justified as a reasonably careful man in so believing; and we cannot say that he was not. Cases such as these are always cases of degree. In Leeds Estate Co. v. Shepherd the directors trusted their manager and were held liable. They did not take the trouble to see that what he did was even apparently what he ought to have done. They delegated their functions to him. The case of In re Denham & Co. is more like the present, and there the director was held not liable. It must be now conceded that if Mr. John Cory had himself studied the weekly statements and quarterly returns and had compared those for one period with those for another, and more especially if he had seen the letters addressed by the auditors to the directors, he would have been put upon inquiry, and would have found out, if he had not neglected his duty, that the affairs of the bank were not in the flourishing condition which he believed them to be in. The existence of the letters written by the auditors and accompanying their certificates were very much relied on against Mr. John Cory. Those letters are not produced. They were never found by the liquidator. His knowledge of them is derived from copies furnished by the auditors. These letters warned the directors annually, in and after 1884, and especially in January, 1890, that there were matters which required investigation, and if Mr. John Cory had known or suspected that there were such letters, and he had omitted to make inquiries into the matters to which attention was drawn, he would plainly have neglected his duty as a director and have been guilty of negligence to the degree justifying the epithet gross. But he had no reason to suppose there were any such letters, and apart from them the auditors' reports justified him in supposing that all was right. The letter from the auditors of the 13th of January, 1890, to the secretary of the bank was answered by the secretary on the 13th of February, 1890; it had been laid before the board, and this was done on the 10th. But Mr. John Cory was not there. He was apparently present at a subsequent meeting at which the minutes of the meeting on the 10th were confirmed, but the matter did not attract his attention; and, considering the terms of the minutes, this was very natural. We are satisfied that these letters from the auditors were fraudulently concealed from Mr. John Cory, and that he never knew of, or suspected, their existence. His ignorance of them was not attributable to negligence on his part. Mr. John Cory's omission to examine the weekly statements and quarterly returns is also, we think, excusable, although not on the same grounds, for they were known by him to exist, and were in the board room for inspection. We have had the advantage of an exhaustive examination of them, and of a comparison of long series of them, and we know the result and their full significance. But without a comparison of those for one period with those of an earlier period a director would derive little information that was really useful. No suspicion being aroused, Mr. John Cory's reasons for not examining them are natural, and his omission to examine them does not show want of reasonable care and attention on his part to the affairs of the bank. He had no reason to suppose that there were unsatisfactory debts beyond those written off and provided for. The evidence when carefully sifted unquestionably shows that Mr. John Cory might have found out that he was deceived by the general manager, and that the dividends declared were not in a business sense warranted by the profit made. On the other hand, the evidence shows that although he was deceived he neither knew nor suspected it. We are not prepared to say that he is guilty of any breach of duty in not discovering that those whom he trusted were misleading him; nor that in point of law he was guilty of any breach of duty in recommending the payment of dividends as and when he did. A director does not warrant the truth of his statements; he is not an insurer. But if he makes misstatements to his shareholders he is liable for the consequences unless he can show that he made them honestly, believing them to be true, and took such care to ascertain the truth as was reasonable at the time. This, we think, Mr. John Cory did. It follows that Mr. John Cory is not only not liable to make good the dividends declared, but also that he is not liable to refund those which he himself received as a shareholder, whether before or after the 14th of June, 1889, for there was no breach of trust in this matter by him. His conduct before that date was not more remiss than it was afterwards.

As regards the advances made to directors without security between the 14th of June, 1889, and the 18th of December, 1890. The lien given by article 15 came into existence automatically and gave the company an equitable charge on the shares with a power of sale, which is very important. It certainly constituted a security: In re General Exchange Bank, 19 W. R. 791, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 818. Article 98 enumerates what the board may do, and presupposes consideration and attention by them; and we are of opinion that no credit was to be given and no advance was to be made to a director without deliberation by the board nor without security, and if so made it would be difficult to justify the advance by falling back on the lien conferred by article 15. But we cannot go the length of saying that shares in the bank might not be accepted as security on reasonable deliberation if of adequate value. We do not overlook the fact that their value depends on the value of the assets of the company lending its money on them. This renders care and deliberation all the more necessary whenever the borrower was a shareholder or a director. But in either case we are of opinion that shares in the bank might be accepted as security if the board considered them sufficient as regards value. Suppose the board considered a proposed advanced, and, being satisfied that the shares would sell for considerably more than the sum advanced, authorized an advance and obtained a deposit of the share certificates of the borrower as security. We do not think they would have failed in their duty, even if the borrower were a director. This being so, we cannot hold the board liable in point of law for omitting to obtain the certificates: for their lien and power of sale under article 15 would not be defeated by the absence of the certificates, and we do not understand that any loss has been sustained by the bank by reason of the absence of certificates. In substance, therefore, we agree with the view of Wright, J., on this point.

Now let us see what was done by Mr. John Cory. Large advances were made to some directors in 1889 and 1890. We leave out of account the advances made in 1891, as Mr. John Cory was not then a director. We also pass over the errors in figures which Mr. Norris has pointed out. It is proved that in 1889 and 1890 Mr. Crawshay, one of the directors, was constantly allowed to overdraw. The branch manager at Bridgend perpetually drew attention to this and wrote for instructions, but apparently got none. Crawshay was a large shareholder in the company, and the market value of his shares exceeded his advances and overdrafts. Other deeds and documents were apparently also held by the board as a security. Other similar cases are given by the liquidator where these advances and overdrafts have resulted in large losses. The directors clearly regarded the lien as a security, and a "stop-share" book was accordingly ordered to be kept in 1884, in which all shareholders' overdrafts were to be entered. There is no proof that if the shares could in point of law be taken as security they were insufficient at the time they were taken. The securities were never reported to the board as insufficient; nor did Mr. John Cory know or suspect they were so. His cross-examination on these matters shows that many very material facts were concealed from him—e.g., the fact that a director was a partner in a borrowing firm; the amounts to which some of the directors obtained advances or were indebted to the bank; the insufficiency of the securities. Moreover, several of the advances which have resulted in loss were not sanctioned by him, and were made without his knowledge. The question, of course, again arises whether Mr. John Cory ought not to have been more vigilant. The observations already made on this head need not be repeated. Nor is it necessary to examine in detail his liability for other improper advances. Here, again, his answer is the same, and his liability depends on his omission to find out the facts. His liability for such omission has been already considered and negatived.

Having arrived at the above conclusions, it is unnecessary to decide whether Mr. J. Cory's counsel were right in their contention that, assuming Mr. J. Cory to be liable to make good the dividends declared whilst he was a director, the liquidator, as representing the shareholders in the bank, could not have recovered such dividends from him. The argument was that all moneys recovered by the liquidator would have to be distributed amongst the shareholders, who had already had the benefit of the dividends improperly declared, so that they would in effect be paid twice over. In the course of the argument it was pointed out that the money sought to be recovered was, if recoverable, an asset of the company, and that the liquidator was the person to get it in, and that Turquand v. Marshall had no application to claims by incorporated companies. We pointed out that the money which had been divided in years gone by had been paid and received as profits, and not as capital, and Mr. J. Cory could not treat the shareholders, whom on the present assumption he would have misled, as having received the dividends as capital. We said that we agreed with Cotton, L.J.'s, observations in Flitcroft's case as we understood them —viz., the court could and would prevent the liquidator from taking any proceedings which were useless and vexatious, but that this proceeding in the case supposed would be neither the one nor the other. On this part of the case we agreed with Wright, J. Lastly, we think it only due to the liquidator to add that, although Mr. J. Cory has succeeded in his appeal, his conduct justified the closest scrutiny. But the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and, having regard to the serious charges made against him, the liquidator must pay Mr. J. Cory his costs, both of the summons and of his appeal.

Fitz v. Iles, [1893] 1 Ch. 77, discussed.

By an indenture of lease dated the 27th of November, 1893, G. W. Wilson let to H. T. Bigglestone, his executors, administrators, and assigns, a house called No. 3, The Broadway, Church End, Finchley, one of a terrace of six shops, for twenty-one years, at the rents therein mentioned, and the lessee, for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted with the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he would use the premises as and for the business of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler only. And the lessor covenanted with the lessee that he would not, during the continuance of the demise, let any of the other houses, Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 in the Broadway, for the purposes of the trades of a fruiterer, greengrocer, or corn chandler.

On the 2nd of August, 1898, Bigglestone assigned his interest in the premises to William Ashby.

By an indenture of lease dated the 29th of January, 1897, G. W. Wilson let to J. H. Bebb another house in the Broadway, No. 1, for thirty-three years at the rents therein mentioned. And the lessee covenanted with the lessor that he would use the premises as and for an oil, colour, and Italian warehouse only.

This was an action by William Ashby against Wilson and Bebb. The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleged that Bebb was carrying on the trade of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler at No. 1, The Broadway, and thereby causing him loss and damage, and he claimed an injunction to restrain Wilson from letting or permitting to be used No. 1, The Broadway for the purposes of the said trades in contravention of the covenant by Wilson in the lease of the 27th of November, 1893, and also an injunction to restrain Bebb and his agents from using No. 1, The Broadway for the purposes of the said trades. Bebb by his defence denied that he was carrying on the said trades in breach of the covenant by Wilson in the lease of the 27th of November, 1893, or thereby causing the plaintiff loss or damage, and he also alleged that he had no notice or knowledge of that covenant, and further that as a matter of law that covenant did not, according to the express terms of it, affect him. Wilson by his defence also denied that the said trades were being carried on as alleged by the plaintiff, and submitted that as against him the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Gerald Wheeler, for the plaintiff.—The defendant Bebb is carrying on the trade of a greengrocer, &c., to the injury of the plaintiff, and has broken his covenant with Wilson, which covenant the plaintiff is entitled to have enforced for his benefit: Fitz v. Iles, [1893] 1 Ch. 77, 68 L. T. Rep. 108, 41 W. R. Dig. 208; Buckle v. Fredericks, 38 W. R. 742, 44 Ch. D. 244; Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phillips 774.

Warrington, Q.C., and G. Cave, for the defendant Bebb.—This defendant has not broken his covenant with Wilson; but if he has the plaintiff cannot enforce it against him. Wilson has not broken his covenant with the plaintiff. This case is covered by Kemp v. Bird, 25 W. R. 838, 5 Ch. D. 974; Stuart v. Diplock, 38 W. R. 223, 43 Ch. D. 343. Fitz v. Iles is not in point in this case.

R. J. Parker, for the defendant Wilson.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., in reply.—Fitz v. Iles, appears to be in conflict with Kemp v. Bird. The court should follow Fitz v. Iles, which is the later case.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is certainly easier, and I think more convenient, in this case to deal with the question of fact first. Now, the real question of fact is whether the defendant Bebb is carrying on the business of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler, either one or the other of them; he is restricted to the business of an oil, colour, and Italian warehouseman, by the covenant in his lease; he is only to use the premises as and for an oil, colour, and Italian warehouse. If he is carrying on the business of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler he is infringing that covenant, which is of a restrictive character; and moreover, beyond that, he is carrying on the business which the plaintiff is at liberty to carry on, and is thereby entering into competition with him and probably doing him some harm. Now on that question, notwithstanding the conflict of evidence, I confess I have no hesitation in holding that the defendant Bebb is carrying on the business of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler, all three. It is enough if he is only carrying on one of them. [His lordship then examined the evidence on the point, and continued:] I think therefore that the covenant into which the defendant Bebb entered with his landlord, the defendant Wilson, has been broken by Bebb and broken to the harm of the plaintiff.

But having put the facts out of the way—that is to say, having done my duty as far as I can as a judge of fact, now comes the question of law, which is a extremely interesting on. That question is this, putting it broadly: Can the plaintiff sue Bebb? There is no covenant between the plaintiff and Bebb. There is no evidence to show that there is any contract between them resting upon a building scheme or anything of that kind. There does not seem to me to have been any general scheme which would bind them both. The doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay has been referred to, but the question in this case really depends upon the covenant made with the lessor Wilson. The question is, Can the plaintiff sue Bebb? After what I have said it seems that the answer is, the plaintiff cannot sue Bebb directly. Then can he sue Bebb through Wilson? Certainly he can, if he is entitled to make Wilson sue Bebb. If he is entitled to call upon Wilson, his lessor, to sue Bebb, who, I have held, has broken his covenant with Wilson, then it would be convenient for the plaintiff simply to make Wilson a party here, and though his action against Bebb would remain his action against Bebb, still he would sue Bebb through Wilson. That would be right enough. It is only fair to notice that Wilson has never been remiss. He has endeavoured to do his duty as lessor. He has not sued Bebb, but he has not made the slightest difficulty over this action. He was willing to see justice done between his tenants. Now why is not the plaintiff entitled to sue Wilson? Wilson has entered into a covenant with the plaintiff to a certain effect, and if the plaintiff is entitled in this court to insist upon Wilson suing Bebb on that covenant, he can, as a short cut, sue Bebb with Wilson made a party. It then becomes necessary to see what that covenant is into which Wilson has entered with the plaintiff. It is contained in the lease of the 27th of November, 1893, of which the plaintiff is the assignee. Thereby the lessee covenants not to carry on or permit to be carried on any noisome trade, &c., and to use the premises as and for the business of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler only. Then there is a covenant by the lessor Wilson, not during the continuance of the demise to let any of the other houses in the Broadway for the purposes of the trades of a fruiterer, greengrocer, or corn chandler. Now we have got to the contract between the two. The plaintiff is bound to use the premises as and for the trades of a fruiterer, greengrocer, and corn chandler, and as the consideration for that Wilson the lessor binds himself not during the continuance of the demise to let any of the other houses for the purposes of those trades. That covenant has not been broken by Wilson because in the lease from him to Bebb there is inserted a special covenant, that Bebb is to use his premises as and for an oil, colour, and Italian warehouse only. Wilson has therefore done his duty. He covenanted with the plaintiff that he would not let for any of those trades and so far as Bebb is concerned he has let to him on the terms that he only carries on an oil, colour, and Italian warehouse business. Wilson having, then, done his duty, what claim has the plaintiff against him? I can see none at all. What Mr. Lawrence asks me to do is to construe this covenant of Wilson's with the plaintiff so as to mean something quite different—how much, I do not know. I do not think any words would justify his argument except these: "and that during the continuance of this demise the other houses shall not be used, &c." And even if those words were in the covenant there would be some difficulty; but nothing less than those words I think would justify his argument. I am then asked to say under those circumstances, Wilson not having broken his contract with the plaintiff, that the plaintiff is entitled to call upon Wilson to sue Bebb, because unless he is so entitled the plaintiff cannot himself sue Bebb in this action. The answer to that is to be found in a few words of Cotton, L.J., in Kemp v. Bird, which I do not propose to go through in detail. The words are, "I know of no authority for saying that under such circumstances as these" — of course he puts in "under such circumstances as these," and for my purpose I think the circumstances here are sufficiently similar—"a landlord is a trustee for his tenant in the sense that he must at the request of the lessee enforce a covenant against another lessee." That is what I am asked to do, to say that Wilson is bound to enforce against Bebb the covenant into which Bebb has entered with him because he has himself entered into another covenant with the plaintiff, which covenant he has faithfully observed. It seems to me that to hold that, would be to contradict Kemp v. Bird, which has been cited very properly at considerable length, and which negatives the wider construction of Wilson's covenant with the plaintiff, which I am asked to put on it, and negatives also, I think, the right of the plaintiff to sue here. But then it is said I am restrained by the decision in the case of Fitz v. Iles. Mr. Lawrence says, if the two cases are inconsistent—they are both decisions of the Court of Appeal—I ought to follow the later decision. I do not know that it is a very safe guide, although it is one which has been often adopted, to say that what is last is necessarily best. Nor do I wish to say too broadly that when there are two cases in the Court of Appeal which one finds a difficulty in reconciling that it must be left to the Court of Appeal to do the reconciliation. I confess to having great difficulty in saying that this point of law never occurred to the learned counsel and judges in the case of Fitz v. Iles, but with respect, I feel that it is possible nevertheless, because it is obvious from the report of the case, both in the Law Reports and also in the Law Times Reports, to which Mr. Cave has been good enough to refer me, and which is more correct than the other report, that the whole contest was devoted to the question whether there was an infringement of the covenant, and not to the question of the right to sue on the covenant. Lindley, M.R., in giving judgment, seems to put that beyond question. He says that the right of the plaintiff lessee to sue the defendant lessor and lessee if they were breaking the covenant was not in controversy, that the lessor was a party, and that there was no difficulty about it. I do not see in Mr. Swinfen Eady's argument, as reported, that he said that, but it is quite possible he did. It is possible that in opening his case he said: "We have not come here on a question of right to sue or anything of that kind; the pleadings are all right; we are not discussing any technicality of that kind; we have come here on a question whether the covenant was broken or not." At any rate the case of Fitz v. Iles is not consistent with the case of Kemp v. Bird. That inconsistency must be got rid of in some other way. Kemp v. Bird was not cited in Fitz v. Iles, and I think Kemp v. Bird is binding upon me. Perhaps I ought not to say that if I were to choose between Kemp v. Bird and Fitz v. Iles, Kemp v. Bird seems to me to be sounder with regard to the law, but certainly it does seem so to my mind, on the ground I have mentioned. Therefore I think the plaintiff's case fails. I do not think the defendant Bebb has been in the right—I think he has been doing wrong. But, on the other hand, when the plaintiff comes here and the court is compelled to hold that he has no case at all, no right to sue, I do not think in that case I ought to deprive Bebb of his costs (I certainly shall not deprive Wilson of his—he has done no wrong) simply because I think there has been some want of propriety on his part. I therefore give judgment for the defendants with costs.

In re PAWLEY AND THE LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANK'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Freeholds—Sale by executors—Executor named but not proving—Concurrence—Disclaimer—Land Transfer Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 65), Part I.

Real estate under section 1, sub-section 1, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, devolves to and becomes vested in all the executors named in the will who survive the testator, and in order that the legal estate may pass on a conveyance by the executors who have obtained probate, it is necessary for those executors to whom power to prove the will has been reserved, either to expressly disclaim or to concur in such conveyance.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This was a summons by the vendors under a contract of the 9th of June, 1899, for the sale of certain freehold land at Sydenham, Kent.

The vendors were two of the executors named in the will of Charles Pawley, who died on the 7th of July, 1898. A third executor was named in the said will, but the vendors alone proved the will, power to prove being reserved to the third executor, who was resident in India, but he had neither proved the will nor disclaimed the trusts thereof.

The will contained the following provision: "If any of them (i.e., the executors) shall be absent from England at the time of my death, he or she shall be at liberty to prove my will on his or her return to this country, and all the powers and trusts hereby given to my trustees may be exercised by such of them as for the time being may have proved my will."

The respondents were the purchasers under the said contract, and they required either the concurrence in the deed of conveyance of the third executor named in the will, or a disclaimer of the trusts thereof by him.

The vendors refused to comply with the request, and accordingly took out this summons asking for a declaration that they had power to convey the property without obtaining any such concurrence or disclaimer.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Percy Wheeler, for the vendors.—The vendors rely upon the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 1, s 2, sub-sections 1 and 2, and s. 3, sub-sections 1 and 2. By section 24, sub-section 2. personal representative means executor or administrator, and an executor is one who has proved the will or acted as such, for until he has done one or the other he cannot be sued. This contention is borne out by the Probate Act, 1858, s. 16, which provides that the legal estate shall be in the proving executors: see Williams on Executors (9th ed.), vol. 1, p. 226, note (i). That being so, the vendors can pass the legal estate under section 3, sub-section 1, of the Land Transfer Act, 1897. Section 23 of the National Debt Act, 1870, provides that only the executors who have proved are necessary parties to a transfer of stock. Moreover the will itself in this case empowers the executors who have proved to convey.

Warrington, Q.C., and R. M. Pattisson, for the purchaser.—The term "executors" means executors named in the will, not merely those who prove, and consequently the personal representatives for the purposes of the Act will comprize all those named as executors in the will. Under the Act the real estate on the testator's death devolved to and became vested in his personal representatives, who will be all those named as executors, for executors derive their title from the will and not from probate: Watkins v. Brent, 1 Myl. & Cr. 97; Brazier v. Hudson, 8 Sim. 67. Rules 128 and 129 under the Act bear out this contention.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., replied.

Nov. 3.—KEKEWICH, J.—To allow the objection of the purchaser is to give a limited and perhaps a narrow construction to those sections of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, which constitute a real representative. Nevertheless, it is right to construe an Act of Parliament strictly, and in dealing with real property especially to stand on the old ways. The absence of one of two or more executors, or his inability from illness or other cause to immediately prove the will, is an event of common occurrence, and the difficulties and delays caused thereby are familiar to practitioners. The Act of 1897 might, therefore, have conveniently provided, as was provided by the National Debt Act, 1870, that the executors who had proved the will should be the only necessary parties to a transfer. But the omission to thus expressly provide, supports the proposition that by the term "his personal representatives," used in the first and other sections of the Act, those filling that character were intended to be described irrespectively of the question whether they had obtained a grant of probate or not. It is common knowledge that an executor derives his title from the will, and not from the grant of probate, and that he can, in his representative character, do many things, including the transfer of chattels real, notwithstanding that he has not proved the will. According to the first section of the Act real estate becomes, on the death of a testator and notwithstanding his testamentary disposition, vested in his personal representatives as if it were a chattel real vested in them; and, having regard to what has just been said, there is, to my mind, insuperable difficulty in holding that it vests only in the executors who have proved to the exclusion of those who have not proved, unless, of course, the latter have by renunciation or otherwise made it impossible for them to obtain a grant of probate. If this view be sound, the proviso to section 2, sub-section 2, occasions no difficulty. Indeed, that sub-section is in entire harmony with the others on the above construction. Observe that it repeats the phrase "as if it were a chattel real vesting in them" used in section 1, and therefore, of course, treats all the powers of personal representatives over chattels real as applicable without more to freeholds vested in them under the Act. This makes perfectly intelligible the proviso prohibiting the sale by some or one only of several joint personal representatives which otherwise would have been possible, notwithstanding lack of probate by him or them. There is no need to examine any subsequent provisions of the Act. Reference was also made to rules 128 and 129, about which I will only say that, though apparently framed in accordance with the views already expressed, they cannot, in my opinion, be looked at on the point of construction.

The vendor makes a second point in support of his title. He says that the express direction at the end of the will empowers the proving executors to sell. This, in my judgment, is so, the words being perfectly plain. But that does not get over the difficulty, the question being whether they can pass the legal estate, and if that be under the Act vested in the three, it cannot by virtue of this direction be transferred by two only. I suggested during the argument that this power might be used by the application of the Trustee Act, and although the suggestion was not further pursued I do not at present see the answer to it in point of law. On the other hand, it would not be possible to perfect the conveyance by this method without service of process on the non-proving executor in India, and if that be necessary, no time or expense would be saved, and it would be better at once to obtain his execution of the conveyance. I must therefore uphold the purchasers' objection to the title.

Action.

A company, of the same name as the defendant company, and which may be called the old company, had been incorporated in May, 1895, with a nominal capital of £125,000, divided into 250,000 shares of 10s., of which 200,000 had been issued. Of these in January, 1897, the plaintiff company held 6,500 fully paid up.

It was resolved to reconstruct this old company and transfer its assets and business to a new company, and this, the defendant company, was duly incorporated on the 27th of February, 1897, with a nominal capital of £125,000 divided into 250,000 shares of 10s. each.

The reconstruction agreement, dated the 2nd of March, 1897, by which the old company and its liquidator were to transfer all its property to the defendant company, by clause 6 provided that as part of the consideration for such transfer the liquidator of the old company should be entitled to have allotted to him or his nominees 200,000 shares of 10s. each in the defendant company with the sum of 7s. 6d. per share credited thereon as paid up, to the intent that as many as might be required of such shares might be distributed among the members of the old company or their assigns in manner following—that was to say, holders of fully-paid shares in the old company should be entitled to have one share of 10s. (credited with 7s. 6d. paid up) of the defendant company for every fully-paid share in the old company. Provided that the defendant company should not be bound to allot to the liquidator or to any such nominee unless the liquidator within two months from the date thereof or such nominee within seven days after the giving by the liquidator of the notice thereafter referred to, as the case might be, claimed by writing addressed to the defendant company on the prescribed form his allotment, and paid up therewith 6d. per share, and agreed at the same time, on the prescribed form, to pay up the unpaid balance of 2s. per share on the shares he was entitled to as might be required by the defendant company in calls not exceeding 6d. per share at intervals of not less than two months, and it was provided that the liquidator should forthwith give to each member of the old company notice of the provisions of the said clause; but if any member of the old company failed or omitted to claim in manner aforesaid his allotment of shares in the defendant company within seven days from the giving by the liquidator of the said notice, then such member's right to such allotment should absolutely cease, and as regards all shares of the defendant company which the shareholders of the old company being entitled thereto failed or omitted to claim within the period and on the terms aforesaid (thereinafter called unclaimed shares) the liquidator should use his best endeavours to sell the same and should deal with the net proceeds arising from such sale as therein mentioned, and when any such sale was made the defendant company should, on the nomination of the liquidator of the old company, allot to the purchaser or purchasers the shares sold credited as paid up to the extent aforesaid on such purchaser or purchasers applying for such shares in the manner and on the terms as to payment or otherwise thereinbefore prescribed in the case of the liquidator or his nominees applying for shares forming part of the said 200,000 shares.

On the 26th of March, 1897, the plaintiff company, after receiving a notice from the liquidator of the old company, applied for 6,500 shares from the defendant company with 7s. 6d. paid up, making at the same time an extra payment of £162 10s., being 6d. in respect of each share. These shares were duly allotted. Prior to such allotment the agreement of the 2nd of March, 1897, had been filed with the registrar, and the question for decision was whether this was a "sufficient contract in writing" within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Farwell, Q.C., and Manning, for the plaintiffs.—Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, has not been complied with. The reconstruction agreement only showed an option of no avail to obtain shares unless properly exercised. This might never be done, and the object of section 25, to let the public know how many shares have been issued in accordance with the terms of the contract filed, has not been attained. Elsner and Macarthur's case, 44 W. R. 361, [1895] 2 Ch. 759, is inconsistent with In re Coolgardie Consolidated Gold Mines, 14 T. L. R. 277, and In re Jackson, [1899] 1 Ch. 348, 47 W. R. Dig. 27, as to whether filing a contract merely giving an option is sufficient.

Rowden, Q.C., and Hamilton, for the defendants.—The effect of the agreement filed is that there is an obligation on the new company to allot if the option be exercised, and shows the mode of payment. This is sufficient compliance with section 25: Elsner and Macarthur's case.

Farwell, Q.C., in reply.

BYRNE, J., after reading clause 6 of the agreement, continued: The point raised in the present case is this. The agreement was duly registered; but it is said that, inasmuch as there was not an agreement to issue a specified number of shares in any event, it does not amount to such an agreement as ought to be valid under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867—that in point of fact it was nothing more than a contract for an option, and that until the option should be exercised there was no contract capable of being registered, so as to come within the meaning of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. The point in question has undoubtedly been the subject of decision in Elsner and Macarthur's case. Romer, J., there had a case before him which, in my opinion, governs this case so far as the decision is concerned; but it is suggested that the particular point was not fully argued, and that the decision is inconsistent with two other cases to which I have been referred. I do not want to go at any length into the circumstances of Elsner and Macarthur's case, but Romer, J., says: "By the agreement this company were bound to allot to each shareholder of Spiel's company his proportion of shares if he applied for them; and the fact that each shareholder had an option and was not bound to apply did not the less render the agreement a contract and one binding on this company. This company had no option in the matter, and, moreover, notwithstanding the curious wording of the agreement, and the form of the assignment made in pursuance of it, dated the 30th of March, 1892, I think the option given formed part of the consideration for the sale of the property the subject of the agreement." Now I go back to section 25 of the Act of 1867, which provides: "Every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same"—there is no dispute now, after the decisions we have had under this section, that the words "the same" may be read as "the terms of payment," and, therefore, I will read it in that way—"unless the terms of payment shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing and filed." The section does not say that the contract referred to must be a contract for the issue of the shares. No question can arise under section 25 whether a share is fully paid up or not until after issue; but it appears to me that the terms of the section permit of a contract, not being a contract for the issue of the shares, being one determining that the whole amount of shares to be issued shall be taken to be paid for otherwise than in cash. If that be the true reading of the section, it seems to be perfectly consistent with the decision in Elsner and Macarthur's case, and I propose to follow that decision.

The case has been so fully and so well argued before me that I feel bound to go a little more into the case than I should otherwise have done; I should probably have contented myself with saying that I think, under the circumstances, I ought to follow the decision in Elsner and Macarthur's case inasmuch as the other cases to which I have been referred do not purport, and were not intended, to be judgments differing from that of Romer, J., in Elsner and Macarthur's case; and, moreover, they differ in the circumstances, and, as I think, in the principles to be applied. In the case that I have before me the company is bound to issue these shares, if at all, as paid up to the extent of 7s. 6l.; that is to say, the contract, if acted upon, binds the company to issue partly paid-up shares, and the company is not thereby empowered to pay otherwise than by means of partly paid-up shares. On the other hand, I have been referred to the case of In re Coolgardie Consolidated Gold Mines before Wright, J. There the contract provided that the directors of the purchasing company might discharge their obligations either wholly in cash, or partly in cash and partly in fully paid up shares, or wholly in fully paid-up shares; so that it appears that there was no final determination that the shares to be given as the purchase price were to be issued otherwise than for cash. So also in the case before Kekewich, J., In re Jackson & Co., the determination was left to the directors whether they should pay wholly, or partly in cash, shares, or debentures. I think that there is a clear distinction between these two cases and Elsner and Macarthur's case, which I propose to follow; and I see no reason to differ from the reasons which Romer, J., gave for that decision.

There is one other thing I ought to mention, as it was strongly urged upon me. That is with regard to the true object of the 25th section. Undoubtedly the object of that section was permissive, and what I have to see is whether the terms have been complied with. I may point out that the present contract does give information which is not given by the registration of the contracts in the cases before Wright, J., and Kekewich, J., although not all the information which some persons might desire. I will therefore make the declaration asked for—namely, that the contract of the 2nd of March, 1897, was a sufficient contract within section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, and all further proceedings in the action will be stayed as arranged.

RICE v. NOAKES & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Mortgage—Public-house—Leasehold—House "tied" to mortgagees—Clogging redemption—Once a mortgage always a mortgage.

All property comprised in a mortgage security must, upon payment, after the period fixed for redemption of all sums due upon the security, be reconveyed or reassigned to the mortgagor, and the mortgagee cannot retain any estate or interest in the premises, or any right to interfere with the mortgagor in his enjoyment or user of them.

Consequently, where there is a covenant in the mortgage of a public-house, collateral to the proviso for redemption, that the mortgagor should not purchase his liquors of anyone except the mortgagees, when, in conformity with the proviso for redemption, the mortgagor pays off the moneys secured by the mortgage, he is entitled to an assignment of the premises free from the covenant.

Santley v. Wilde, ante p. 90, [1899] 2 Ch. 474, distinguished.

Previously to the mortgage of the 7th of October, 1897, hereafter mentioned, the plaintiff, a licensed victualler, purchased the lease of the public-house called the Kings Arms of the second mortgagees for £6,800. The term created by the lease would expire at Christmas, 1923.

The defendants, who were brewers, were the first mortgagees, and they released their security to enable the sale to be made. Their mortgage had contained provisions almost identical with those of the mortgage next mentioned.

Upon the sale the plaintiff borrowed £4,850 of the purchase-money from the defendants, upon the security of a first mortgage of the premises, dated the 7th of October, 1897.

By the mortgage deed, in consideration of the sum lent and further sums thereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff demised the leasehold premises and fixtures and the goodwill of the business and benefit of the licences to the defendants, subject to the proviso for redemption. This proviso declared that if the plaintiff should pay to the defendants the principal sum and interest to be then due on the security, then the defendants would, at the request of the plaintiff, surrender or reconvey the premises to the plaintiff, or as he should direct; and the plaintiff covenanted to pay the principal sum and interest, and all further sums due for money advanced, or for goods sold and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff. After some other provisions, the deed continued as follows: "And for the considerations aforesaid, the mortgagor, so as to charge the premises hereby demised into whosever possession the same may come, whether by act of the party or by operation of law or by any other ways or means howsoever, and to the further intent that the obligation of this covenant may run with the land, doth hereby covenant with the company that the mortgagor shall not, nor will at any time during the continuance of the term aforesaid, and whether any principal moneys or interest shall or shall not be owing upon the security of these presents, use or sell, or permit to be used or sold, in, upon, or about the said demised premises any malt liquors, except such as shall be bonâ fide purchased by the mortgagor of the company. And, further, that, if and whenever there shall be a breach of the said covenant, he, the mortgagor, shall and will pay to the company the sum of £1,000 as and for ascertained liquidated damages for each such breach, and will sell all such malt liquors pure, unadulterated, and unmixed, and of the like strength, character, and quality in all respects as the same shall be supplied to him." It was also declared that the words "the mortgagor" and "the company," except when otherwise controlled by the context, should, throughout the deed, include all persons deriving title under them respectively.

The plaintiff was willing to pay off all money due to the defendants under the mortgage, and required them, on payment being made, to reconvey the leasehold property to him, and to release him from the covenant by which the house purported to be "tied" to the defendants during the whole currency of the lease, or to transfer the mortgage to him and assign the benefit of the covenant to his nominee. The defendants were willing to reconvey or transfer the property, but not to release or assign the covenant, and the present action was brought to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a reconveyance or transfer of the premises, and, at the same time, to a release or assignment of the covenant.

Astbury, Q.C., and Edward Beaumont, for the plaintiff.—Notwithstanding recent decisions, the rule that upon payment of all sums due under the mortgage the property must be reassigned in its entirety to the mortgagor still remains good, and any fetter upon the equity of redemption will be disregarded: Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, 40 W. R. 529, [1892] A. C. 1. Here the covenant sought to be retained by the mortgagees must come to the notice of any purchaser from the mortgagor: Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phillips 774; London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562, at p. 583; and it therefore becomes a charge upon the land. In Santley v. Wilde, ante, p. 90, [1899] 2 Ch. 474, the proviso for redemption was entirely different from that in this mortgage, and the covenant complained of was held a reasonable one. In Biggs v. Hoddinott, 47 W. R. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307, the covenant to buy from the mortgagees was only operative during the existence of the security.

They also referred to Willett v. Winnell, 1 Vern. 488; Howard v. Harris, 1 Vern. 191; and Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403.

Eve, Q.C., and Stanley Fisher, for the defendants.—A mortgagee may stipulate for a collateral advantage (Biggs v. Hoddinott), and may refuse to convey so long as there are obligations under the covenant unfulfilled: Santley v. Wilde. The covenant is not a fetter upon the equity of redemption, but a collateral matter. If it is, however, a fetter, then it is valid within the decision of Santley v. Wilde.

They also cited King v. Dickeson, 37 W. R. 563, 40 Ch. D. 596.

Astbury replied.

Nov. 16.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—The question which I have to decide is whether the "tie" can be retained by the defendants. If this case had arisen for decision a few years ago, I think no judge of first instance would have hesitated to hold that the "tie" could not be enforced after the discharge of the security. It would have been regarded as a plain case of "clogging" the equity of redemption. But the supposed ancient doctrine of the courts has been so trenched upon in recent years that it is very difficult to say what part (if any) of it still remains. It has been held that a mortgagor may be precluded from redeeming for a fixed period, such as five or seven years: Teevan v. Smith, 30 W. R. 716, 20 Ch. D. 724, at p. 729. It has been held that, during the full period in which a mortgagor is precluded from redeeming, he may be bound by covenant to buy his beer only from the mortgagee: Biggs v. Hoddinott. In that case the "tie" was objected to, not on the ground of its being a clog on the equity of redemption, but on the ground that it conferred on the mortgagee a collateral advantage which he was not entitled to retain. The objection, however, did not prevail. It has been held that a mortgagee of a leasehold theatre may, in consideration of a cash advance, take a covenant to repay the sum advanced with interest by quarterly instalments extending over five years and to pay a share of the net profits of the theatre during the whole residue of the lease extending beyond the five years, and that a proviso for redemption on payment of all moneys covenanted to be paid, including the share of profits, is not invalid: Santley v. Wilde. It will be observed that in that case the proviso for redemption was nugatory, because it only came into operation on the expiration of the lease, at which date, ex hypothesi, there would be nothing upon which the proviso could operate. If I rightly understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case, it established that a mortgage of leasehold property expressed to be a security for the due discharge of future recurring obligations cannot be redeemed before those obligations have matured, even though the period covered by the obligations may or must exceed the duration of the lease. I do not think any other or larger principle can be extracted from that case. On the other hand, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," is still a sound legal maxim. Anything which is comprised in a mortgage security must, when the debt is paid or the obligation is discharged, be returned to the mortgagor. It must be returned in its entirety. No part of it can be retained by the mortgagee. A remarkable instance of this doctrine is to be found in Salt v. Marquis of Northampton. This doctrine is not questioned, and indeed is expressly admitted by the Court of Appeal in Santley v. Wilde. It remains to apply to the present case, as best I can, the principles to be gathered from the authorities both ancient and modern. In the first place, the mortgage is in terms a security only for the moneys covenanted to be paid—i.e., principal and interest, and the price of goods sold and delivered. All these moneys the plaintiff offers to pay. It does not profess to be a security for the performance of the negative covenant which is commonly called a "tie." In the second place, on payment of that which the plaintiff offers to pay, the event will happen upon which, by the terms of the deed, the defendants are bound to "surrender or reconvey the premises." In the third place, such a surrender or reconveyance is inconsistent with the retention of any charge on or interest in the premises. In the fourth place, the negative covenant or "tie" is expressed to be a "charge" on the premises. I doubt whether this phrase is strictly accurate. The precise operation of such a covenant has been described in different ways. Lord Cottenham in Tulk v. Moxhay calls it "an equity attached to the property by the owner." Sir George Jessel in London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 20 Ch. D., p. 583, calls it an "equitable burden." This much at least is clear, that, in the hands of the plaintiff and of any person taking with notice, this covenant imposes a fetter upon the enjoyment of the property and materially lessens its value. And in the present case no purchaser of the lease could escape being effected with notice. Upon the whole I think the "tie," though perfectly valid during the continuance of the security, cannot be maintained when all moneys due upon the security have been paid off. It seems to me to be involved in the very idea of a mortgage that a mortgagee, when paid off, shall have no estate or interest in the mortgaged premises, and no right to interfere with the mortgagor in his enjoyment or user of the premises. I must therefore declare that, on payment off of all moneys due, the plaintiff is entitled to have a reconveyance of the property, or at his option a transfer of the security, free in either case from the tie.

REG. v. COUNTY COUNCIL OF GLAMORGAN. (a.)

Local government—County fund—County rate—Military aid for suppression of riots—Maintenance of troops —Mandamus.

The justices of a county, having applied to the military authorities to send soldiers into the county for the purpose of suppressing riots, made arrangements with tradesmen for the housing and lodging of the soldiers at certain agreed rates of payment, and pledged the credit of the county for such payment.

Held, that the tradesmen were not entitled to a writ of mandamus to the county council to make such payment out of the county fund.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills, Darling, and Channell, JJ.) discharging an order nisi for a writ of mandamus, [1899] 2 Q. B. 26, 47 W. R. Dig. 106.

The order nisi was granted at the instance of certain persons who had supplied food and lodging to soldiers who had been brought into the county of Glamorgan for the purpose of suppressing riots in connection with a strike of miners in South Wales. It called upon the county council of Glamorgan to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding the county council to pay to the prosecutors out of the county rate the expenses incurred by them in supplying food and lodgings to the soldiers.

The facts of the case are fully set forth in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J.

The Divisional Court discharged the order nisi.

The prosecutors appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., C. A. Russell, Q.C., H. Sutton, and S. G. Lushington, for the prosecutors.

Asquith, Q.C., and H. L. Stephen, for the defendants.

Aug. 10.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: In this case the Queen's Bench Division has refused to make absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus calling upon the county council of Glamorganshire to show cause why it should not make an order for the payment to the relators out of the county funds of the amounts expended by them for housing and feeding troops in their county, or, in the alternative, why the county council should not levy a county rate whereby to make these payments, which were incurred in the circumstances hereafter mentioned.

The point is whether, when the justices of the peace call in troops to aid the civil power in quelling riots in a county, there is or is not a legal duty upon the ratepayers of the county to pay for the housing and feeding of the troops so called in. Although by section 3 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), the making, assessing, and levying of county rates, and the application and expenditure thereof, is transferred to the county councils, and by section 9 the powers of quarter sessions and justices out of sessions with respect to county police are vested in quarter sessions and the county councils jointly, this case should be dealt with as if the powers and jurisdiction of justices of the peace for counties theretofore existing had not been affected by this Act, for in reality it has no bearing upon the case.

In the month of June, 1898, in consequence of serious riots in Glamorganshire, it became necessary for the public safety and the preservation of the peace that troops should be imported into and kept at Aberdare, Aberavon, and Mountain Ash in that county, and the military authorities were applied to by the justices of the peace for that county for the necessary troops, which were thus obtained. These troops had to be housed and fed in the districts into which they were imported, and it therefore became necessary that arrangements should be made in that behalf, and accordingly the justices of the peace for the county in meeting assembled sanctioned these arrangements and agreed that certain ascertained payments should be made to tradesmen for housing and feeding the troops during the time they were in these districts, and the credit of the county for these agreed payments was pledged by the agents of the justices to the tradesmen who undertook to render the desired services. These tradesmen are the relators in the present application, and the law officers of the Crown appear on their behalf.

Upon the 31st of July, 1898, the tradesmen sent in their accounts for the services rendered up to that date, made out upon the agreed prices, and these were certified as being correct by two of the justices of the peace, and there was then no dispute as to these charges. Upon the 13th of September, 1898, the accounts of further expenditure from the 31st of July, 1898, were sent in by the tradesmen amounting to £2,500; but these accounts were disputed, and the county council offered to pay £1,350 of this amount. This the tradesmen refused to accept; and thereupon the county council took up the position that, if the tradesmen would not take what was offered, the county council would pay nothing, and would deny its liability to pay anything, and hence the application for the rule nisi by the tradesmen, which rule was obtained, and which, as before stated, the Queen's Bench Division (consisting of my brothers Wills, Darling, and Channell) has discharged, holding that no duty is imposed upon those who administer the county funds to pay out of those funds the expenses of the maintenance of troops brought into their district for the purpose of suppressing riots.

It seems to me that the circumstances of this case are such as to induce the court to be astute to find, if possible, a duty imposed by law upon the ratepayers of the county to pay that which is now demanded; but the question remains, can such a duty be found? In considering this application for a rule nisi, it matters not, in my judgment, whether the credit of the county has or has not been pledged by the justices to the tradesmen, for the same point arises in either case. If the justices had the power to pledge the credit of the county ratepayers to the payment of the sums now demanded by the tradesmen, it is because there is a duty upon the ratepayers to pay them; but if there be no such duty, the pledging of the credit, which the Solicitor-General much insisted upon, comes to nothing, for the point is—whether the credit was pledged or not—can the law officers of the Crown appearing for the relators show that there is a legal duty on the part of the ratepayers of the county to pay what is now demanded by the tradesmen?

Justices of the peace for the counties are appointed by Special Commission under the Great Seal, which, as appears from Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 1, p. 351, was settled by all the judges as long ago as the year 1590. By this commission they are appointed to keep the peace in the particular counties named—viz., "to keep and cause to be kept all ordinances and statutes for the good of the peace." By 13 Hen. 4, c. 7, s. 1: "If any riot . . . against the law be made in any part of the realm, that the justices of peace, three or two of them at the least, and the sheriff or under-sheriff . . . shall come with the power of the county, if need be, to arrest them and shall arrest them"; and by 2 Hen. 5, c. 8, the King's liege people being sufficient to travel shall be assistant to them upon reasonable warning to ride with them in aid to resist such riots upon pain of imprisonment and to make fine and ransom to the King; and by this Act it is further enacted that "the said justices, and other officers, aforesaid, shall execute their offices aforesaid, at the King's costs, in going, continuing, and returning in the doing their said offices, by payment thereof to be made by the sheriff of the same county for the time being, by indentures betwixt the sheriff and justices and other officers aforesaid to be made of the payment aforesaid, whereof the sheriff upon his account in the Exchequer may have due allowance." From this statute it would seem that the Crown rather than the county is liable for expenses incident to the quelling of riots; but I have not to decide as to the Crown, and the subsequent Police Acts play an important part in this matter.

I do not doubt that it is the duty of justices of the peace in counties to quell riots within their respective counties, and, indeed, if they neglected to do so, they might be proceeded against by information (see Rex v. Pinney, 5 C. & P. 254, and Rex v. Kennett, 5 ib. 282), but the question is, Who is to pay for the performance of this duty? The argument on the part of the county council is that if justices are willing to undertake duties which they are bound to perform, and expense is thereby incurred, the justices who undertake the duties must pay the expense incurred in their performance, unless they can show that they are relieved therefrom, or that the obligation to pay is cast upon some other person or persons, which is the same thing. Upon the present rule nisi I have not to determine whether the justices who pledged the credit of the county can or cannot be sued personally for having represented to the tradesmen that they had the authority of the county to pledge its credit, whereas they had not, and I say nothing as to this one way or the other, nor have I to determine whether the Crown is the paymaster, for the sole question I have to solve is whether there is a legal duty upon the ratepayers of the county to pay to the tradesmen their accounts for housing and feeding the troops in the present case. I do not doubt that in cases of necessity justices of the peace have power to call in troops, and it is clear that, when called in to quell a riot, they can only be called in to act either as civilians or as soldiers. In my judgment they are called in to act as soldiers, for their services are asked for as being soldiers, they come as soldiers under arms and military command, they remain under arms and military command, and depart under arms and military command; but, as this is not conceded, I will first assume that they are called in to act as civilians, and see how the matter then stands.

In Burn's Justice of the Peace (30th ed.), vol. 1, p. 1340, I find it stated that "the expenses to which counties are liable, and which are to be levied by county rates, are provided for by various Acts of Parliament, which will be found under their respective titles throughout this work." In 1739 the statute 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, was passed, which was the first County Rate Act. Prior to this Act there had been in counties particular rates for particular purposes levied under particular Acts, and the county rate created by the Act of 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, which recites these Acts, represented the aggregate of the small rates previously levied, and it is enacted by sections 1 and 6 that a county rate should thereafter be levied "for the uses and purposes of the said recited Acts, and for any other uses and purposes to which the public stock of any county . . . is or shall be applicable by law." I can find no trace of the public stock of any county being liable for the housing of troops called in to quell riots either before or after the passing of this Act of 12 Geo. 2. I have looked through the Acts which relate to the county rates, both those cited in Burn's Justice of the Peace, at p. 1340, and others cited at the bar, and there is not a single Act which casts the housing and maintenance of troops when called into a county upon the county rate, and the Act of 41 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 2, to which I shall refer hereafter, is the only Act I can find which can by any possibility be pointed to as having any semblance of a reference to the matter. The Acts which deal with the public peace deal with chief constables, high constables, special constables, and police, the charges of which are by the different Acts placed upon the county rate, and it is by means of these Acts that justices of the peace, as it appears to me, are released from the charges of keeping the peace in their counties, which I apprehend they would otherwise have to pay as incident to the performance of their duty. But the maintenance of troops, assuming them to be acting as civilians, is not to be found mentioned in these statutes. Soldiers are not per se "chief constables," "high constables," "special constables," or "police," even assuming that they happen to act as civilians.

I will now take it that the troops are what they really are—namely, acting as and being soldiers—and, as this is so, it seems to me, if possible, to be an a fortiori case, for the cost of housing and feeding soldiers is clearly not cast upon the county rate in terms by any statute whatever.

It was next argued by the Solicitor-General that, even if so, and if the obligation of the county ratepayers to defray these expenses cannot be found in any statute, yet this court should hold that by the common law of England the justices were entitled to be recouped by the county that for which they had pledged the credit of the county to the tradesmen in the performance of their duty. As to this suggested common law obligation, there is no evidence that it has ever been the practice of the county to bear these expenses. The Solicitor-General, with all the research at his command, has only been able to produce one case upon the subject, and that he cited out of the Times newspaper of the 21st of February, 1879, and the question there raised was whether an order by the county treasurer for the payment of money to the high constable in respect of the lodging and feeding of troops brought in to quell riots at Blackburn was a valid order. The order was sought to be upheld, not at common law, be it noticed, but by reason of section 2 of 41 Geo. 3, c. 78, which enacted that it should be lawful for any two justices to order and direct such reasonable and necessary allowances to be made to any high constable for extraordinary expenses incurred by him in the execution of his duties in any case of tumult, riot, or felony. The rule nisi for a mandamus which had been obtained was made absolute by Cockburn, L.C.J., and Mellor, J., the Lord Chief Justice saying, "there being a serious question raised they would leave it to be raised on the record and carried if necessary to the House of Lords." This is the sole case the Solicitor-General has been able to bring to our attention—a poor authority indeed upon which to infer a common law obligation. I must point out that the present rule nisi is not moved under the Act above mentioned; and whether if it had been, it would have been successful I give no opinion, for it is not before me, and I may add that, if it had been, the facts of the case do not seem to me to fit in with the section. The present rule is to pay out of the county fund, or to levy a county rate to pay the tradesmen who are the relators, and not to pay a high constable for any extraordinary expenses he may have incurred, and indeed none, as it appears to me upon the affidavits, have been incurred by any high constable.

I will now turn to the work of a man who had peculiar knowledge on the matters now in question—I mean the late Mr. Charles Clode of the War Office. I find in his work, Military Forces of the Crown, vol. 2, s. 47, p. 142, and a note thereon, that which shows how erroneous it would be for the court to declare the existence of an obligation upon the ratepayers of counties at common law to pay the cost of soldiers imported into their districts to quell riots as suggested by the Solicitor-General. At section 47 Mr. Clode says, with regard to the employment of military in lieu of the police, there is this apparent defect in the present law—namely, that the military are sent to and remain in the particular town, not at the expense of the local, but of the general community, giving thereby a present instead of inflicting a pecuniary mulct upon the inhabitants of the town or place for their insufficient ordinary police arrangements, and the example he gives in the note is peculiarly pertinent to the common law point, now for the first time, I believe, suggested by the Solicitor-General. The note is this: "For example, if the Manchester magistrates request 500 men of the Metropolitan Police to be sent down to aid in maintaining the peace and order of the town, the magistrates provide for the men and the ratepayers of Manchester bear their expenses; but if the same magistrates request 500 soldiers to be sent for the same purpose, the taxpayers of the kingdom have to bear all the expenses of the 500 soldiers and the ratepayers of Manchester nothing." Where is there any ground for holding a duty imposed at common law upon the ratepayers to pay for the housing and feeding of soldiers? There is none, for no such obligation at common law in fact exists, and if this obligation is to be imposed it must be by statute. The case of Rex v. Inhabitants of Essex, 4 T. R. 591, was pressed into the service of the Solicitor-General in order to show that the county rate might be liable for expenses not cast upon it by statute. That case was whether the justices of a county might pay the expense of litigating as to a fine which they thought had been illegally imposed upon the county, and it was held (see specially by Buller, J.) that on the true construction of the Act 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, the necessary expenses of everything relating to the subjects therein mentioned must be borne by the county and paid out of the county stock; but as this Act in no way relates to the payment of the maintenance of soldiers in a county, the case, in my judgment, has no application to the case in hand. For the above reasons I think that the tradesmen make out no duty in the county ratepayers to pay the expenses in question, and I agree with the Divisional Court that the rule nisi should be discharged. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: In my opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court must be affirmed.

The key to the whole question is to be found in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Rex v. Inhabitants of Essex. Lord Kenyon, C.J., says: "If the contest in this case had been whether the justices of the county could arbitrarily impose taxes on the county, the only answer that could have been given would have been in the negative. But the question here is whether by any express law or by precedent and long usage that which has been done was not lawfully done. And if it be warranted by precedent and long usage and by many analogous cases in the law, the order may be supported, though there may be no precise Act of Parliament to direct it." Now, in the present case it is not suggested that there is any statute authorizing the levy of a rate for the payment of the expenses incurred in the maintenance of the soldiers called in to maintain order, or that there is any statute that authorizes the payment of such expenses out of the county fund, neither is it suggested that these expenses are the necessary expenses of things relating to subjects mentioned in such Acts, within the principle laid down by Buller, J., in the same case, who says: "In my opinion the true construction of this Act is that the necessary expenses of everything relating to the subjects therein mentioned must be borne by the county and paid out of the county stock."

The mandamus asked for in the present case is a mandamus to the county council of the administrative county of Glamorgan, ordering them to pay certain sums to certain tradesmen who had provided food and other things for the maintenance of the soldiers. This distinguishes the present case from the case which was before Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., on the 21st of February, 1879, in which case the application was for a mandamus directing the treasurer of the county fund to obey an order of two justices, confirmed at quarter sessions, to pay to the chief constable the extraordinary expenditure incurred for the maintenance of a military force called in by the justices on the occasion of riots at Blackburn. It was contended that such an order could be justified by 41 Geo. 3, c. 78, s. 2, which provides that it shall be lawful for two justices to order such reasonable and necessary allowances to be made to any high constable for any county for any extraordinary expenses incurred by him in the execution of his duty in any case of tumult, riot, or felony. The section goes on to provide for the confirmation of the order at quarter sessions. The writ of mandamus was granted, the court saying that the question could then be raised on the record and carried to the House of Lords if necessary, but suggesting that it might answer the purpose to appeal against the decision before incurring the expense of issing the writ. The rule was made absolute for the issue of the writ, but there does not seem to have been any appeal. In that case there was an affidavit by the chief constable, saying that in his opinion the expenses were necessarily incurred in providing lodgings, rations, and otherwise maintaining the military force, and that in his opinion such military force was necessary to aid and assist the civil authority in maintaining peace and good order, and that without such military force it would not have been possible for him to have maintained peace and good order in the division. As the Lord Chief Justice pointed out, the affidavit did not state that the force was obtained by the chief constable, although when the soldiers were there he availed himself of their assistance. Indeed, it did not appear that the lodging and rations were ordered by him.

I have dealt with that case at some length because the facts are uncommonly like the facts in the present case, and I wish to guard myself against being supposed to decide that, if the application had been for a mandamus to order payment to the chief constable of expenses incurred by him, instead of being, as it is, an application for an order to make payments to certain tradesmen who provided food, &c., for the soldiers, a mandamus might not have issued. I note, however, that there is no affidavit in the present case by Captain Lindsay, the chief constable, and that the affidavits as to his approval are very vague.

SMITH v. RICHMOND. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Market garden—Land covered with greenhouses—"Agricultural land"—"Buildings or other hereditaments"—Agricultural Rates Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 16), ss. 1, 5, 9.

Glasshouses within a market garden used solely for purposes connected therewith, are not "agricultural land" within the meaning of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, so as to entitle the occupier to the partial exemption given by that Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (46 W. R. 401, [1898] 1 Q. B. 683, affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., and Rigby, L.J., Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), reported 46 W. R. 401, [1898] 1 Q. B. 683, reversing that of the Queen's Bench Division.

The question was whether buildings within a market garden were to have the benefit of the partial exemption from rates provided for by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 16).

The Court of Appeal held that land covered with glasshouses for the purpose of its cultivation was, though used solely as a market garden, "a building or other hereditament" and the occupier was therefore not entitled to the partial exemption from rates granted to "agricultural land" by the Act of 1896.

The special case as stated by the Lord Chancellor was as follows:

The question arises under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and was whether the ground covered by glasshouses or greenhouses in a market garden is entitled to the benefit of the Act, section 1 of which makes the occupier of Agricultural land in England liable, in the case of every rate to which the Act applies, to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of buildings or other hereditaments. By section 9 of the Act, "The expression 'agricultural land' means any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, cottage gardens exceeding one quarter of an acre, market gardens, nursery grounds, orchards, or allotments, but does not include land occupied together with a house as a park, gardens other than as aforesaid, pleasure grounds, or any land kept or preserved mainly or exclusively for purposes of sport or recreation, or land used as a racecourse." The same definition was incorporated with and set out in article 1 of the Agricultural Rates Order, 1896, issued by the Local Government Board, and having statutory effect.

The appellants had, in the case of certain hereditaments consisting of land partly covered by glasshouses, inserted the gross estimated rental and rateable value of the whole of such hereditaments under the description of agricultural land. The assessment committee, on the objection of the surveyor of taxes (respondent in the House of Lords), decided that land so covered was not entitled to the exemption. The appellants appealed to quarter sessions, and on the hearing of the appeal it was agreed, inasmuch as the hereditaments included in the notice of appeal were practically identical in character, to take the hereditament of Robert Piper, numbered 140 in the said notice, as a test case for the purposes of the appeal.

With regard to this hereditament the following were the agreed facts: "The said Robert Piper was a grower of fruit, vegetables, and flowers at Worthing, and described himself, and was commonly known, as a market gardener and nurseryman. He was the owner and occupier of a piece of land rather more than four acres in extent on which fifty-seven glasshouses or greenhouses of various sizes were erected; the houses were used by the appellant for the purpose of growing tomatoes, cucumbers, and grapes, and to a smaller extent other vegetables for the purpose of sale. The plants and crops grown therein were watered and heated by artificial means, and grown upon soil placed upon prepared beds inside the houses, and matured much earlier than in the open ground. The vines are planted inside the houses and the roots run partly in the soil under the houses and partly pass through the apertures in the walls into the soil outside. Fifty-one of the glasshouses are thus used for growing vines. In the cucumber-houses (which are six out of the fifty-seven houses) there are, inside the houses, dwarf brick walls supporting corrugated iron sheets, upon which sheets, earth taken from the other parts of the nursery ground is placed. In this earth, so placed upon the iron sheets, the cucumber plants are planted. Beneath the iron sheets, and between them and the ground, there are hot-water pipes. The area actually occupied by the fifty-seven houses is rather more than two acres. The rest (rather more than two acres) consists merely of vine borders, paths, and the stokeholes. The whole of the houses were built upon dwarf brick walls like an ordinary greenhouse." In the overseers' statement the property was described as "market gardens and nursery grounds," of the gross estimated rental of £662 19s. 6d., and of the rateable value of £431 5s. It was entered under "agricultural land," and no separate estimate was given of the buildings and other hereditaments.

Asquith, Q.C., and Clavell Salter, for appellants.—Market gardens are expressly mentioned in definition of "agricultural land," in section 9, and all market gardens have glasshouses.

They referred to Purser v. Worthing Local Board, 35 W. R. 682, 18 Q. B. D. 818.

Sir R. E. Webster, A. G., and S. H. Day (Arthur H. Trevor with them).—Under the Act no buildings are included. The greenhouses are alone assessed.

Clavell Salter replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—This appeal raises the question what is meant by the words "occupier of agricultural land" in the statute 59 & 60 Vict. c. 16. Apart from the provisions of the statute in question, the word "land" would be variously understood by different persons. To a farmer the word "land" would not mean his farm buildings; to a lawyer the word would include everything that was upon the land, fixed immovably upon it; but the statute has given an interpretation clause, and has also in the enacting clause itself pointed out not obscurely with what subject-matter it was dealing. The very enacting part of it gives the antithesis between land and buildings, since the relief the occupier is to get is that he is to be liable in the case of every rate to which the Act applies "to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of buildings and other hereditaments." Now the special case here finds that "the land" sought to be treated as agricultural land is of the character described in the 14th paragraph of the case as agreed to. [His lordship stated the agreed facts.] I have emphasized some parts of this description; and it is extraordinary that any claim should be made that what is there described, is agricultural land. It would be quite as reasonable to claim that any building, however solid and substantial, used for agricultural purposes was agricultural land, because to a lawyer land would include it, and as its use was agricultural, it therefore became agricultural land within the meaning of the Act. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the term "land and buildings" in this Act are mutually exclusive of each other. I must say I feel no difficulty in applying the interpretation clause to the construction of the Act, which seems so plain. A market-garden or a nursery-ground may, as part of it, have agricultural land, and if such part is used as arable, meadow, or pasture-ground only, it will not forfeit its claim to relief because it forms part of such an industry; but in what sense can these buildings be described as arable, meadow, or pasture? They are buildings, and not agricultural land at all. I am very clearly of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord WATSON.—I have done my best to examine the statute in question, and I have been quite unable to arrive at any result other than that which is embodied in the judgment appealed from. I agree with all the observations of the Master of the Rolls, and with the brief but cogent reasoning of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

TRINIDAD ASPHALT CO. v. AMBARD. (a.)

Easement—Right of support—Adjacent land—Asphaltum or pitch.

The right of support from adjacent land which will keep the surface from subsidence still exists, though the land supported consists of asphaltum, for the nature of the strata is an immaterial consideration.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Trinidad.

The facts are set out in their lordships' judgment.

Haldane, Q.C., G. Lawrence, and Previté, for the appellants.

(a.) Reported by C. H GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The judgment of their lordships (Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, and DAVEY) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—At La Brea, in the Island of Trinidad, where the land slopes down from the Pitch Lake to the sea, a distance of about a mile, there is found near the surface a stratum of asphalt or pitch. Pitch lands, as lands within this district are called, are not cultivated, nor are they apparently suitable for cultivation. Their whole value depends on the pitch they contain. Of late years there has sprung up a great and increasing demand for this substance. It is now worth 20s. a ton. With the increase in the value of pitch there has been a corresponding rise in the value of pitch land. A lot which might have been bought for 40 dols. a few years ago would now, it seems, probably fetch not less than 4,000 dols.

In some few places the pitch crops out on the surface of the ground. For the most part it lies at a depth varying from 4 to 7 feet. So long as it is undisturbed it is stable and firm enough to support the soil above in its natural state. But if an excavation is made, and the stratum of pitch cut through, the consequence is that the edge exposed to the influence of the heated atmosphere begins to melt and the pitch oozes out. It may then be collected at the bottom of the excavation or caught as it is exuding. "Pitch," as one witness said in answer to a question by the court, "bulges out, and they shave it off each morning. That," he added, "is the plan adopted when you want to dig your neighbour's pitch."

The original plaintiffs, the Trinidad Asphalt Co., to whose rights the new company lately added as appellants have succeeded, were the owners of a lot of pitch land containing about a quarter of an acre and known as Lot 15A. The lot immediately adjoining it on the side towards the sea and lying at a somewhat lower level belonged to the defendant Ambard. It was known as Lot 15. In January, 1896, the Defendants began digging for pitch on Lot 15. They dug right up to Lot 15A to a depth of 12 feet, and so close to the boundary that some of the boundary posts fell in. The excavation was continued the whole length of the boundary line except for the space of about 10 feet on one side, which was left as a loading place.

The usual results followed. The section of the stratum of pitch thus exposed to the atmosphere began to melt. The pitch oozed out and the excavation yielded abundantly. Between 200 and 300 tons of pitch were "won," as the phrase goes. The surface of the plaintiffs' land began to sink and crack. A depression was formed, in shape like half a saucer, about 5 feet deep in the centre at the boundary line, and going back in a semi-circle with a radius of about 60 feet. A series of cracks appeared on the surface from 8 to 10 feet long by 6 to 18 inches wide, and some buildings or sheds of no great value were more or less wrecked.

For this injury to their property the plaintiffs sued the defendants, asking for an injunction and damages.

The action came on for trial before the Chief Justice, Sir John Tankerville Goldney. His honour granted an injunction restraining the defendants from digging and winning or otherwise removing asphaltum from the parcel of land known as Lot 15 in such a way as to destroy or seriously injure the surface of the plaintiffs' Lot 15A, and the sum of £100 was awarded by way of damages.

From this judgment there was an appeal to the full court. The appeal was heard by the Chief Justice and Nathan and Lewis, JJ. The learned Chief Justice adhered to the opinion he expressed at the trial. The other two learned judges differed from him and differed from each other. Nathan, J., was for dismissing the plaintiffs' action altogether with costs. Lewis, J., was of opinion that as a matter of law the plaintiffs were entitled to support for their lands, but his conclusion was that no injunction ought to have been granted and that the damages should be reduced to £10. He thought £10 "would amply compensate the plaintiffs for damage through mere subsidence." He considered that the injury caused to the plaintiffs' land by the withdrawal of pitch from it ought not to have been taken into account at all. In the result the order of the court was that the judgment of his honour the Chief Justice be set aside so far as regards the injunction, that the sum of £100 allowed as damages be reduced to £10, that the Chief Justice's order as to costs be set aside, that each party do bear their own costs of the hearing before the Chief Justice, and that the plaintiffs do pay to the defendants the costs of the appeal.

From this order both parties have appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

Their lordships have to determine between the conflicting views of the Chief Justice and Nathan, J. The judgment of Lewis, J., who agreed to a certain extent with each of his colleagues, may be laid on one side. If Lewis, J., is right in his premises it is plain that his conclusion is opposed to the principles and practice of the court. Assuming that the plaintiffs were entitled to have their land in its natural state supported by the adjacent land belonging to Ambard, it would seem to follow as a matter of course that this right which the defendants have invaded should now be protected by injunction, and not the less so because, in his honour's view, the damages that could be recovered at law would be only trifling. Certainly the decision of the learned judge, if it were to prevail here as it did in the full court, would leave the plaintiffs in a very unfortunate position. The defendants were not to be restrained from digging. They might, therefore, drain as much pitch as they could from the plaintiffs' land and sell it and pocket the price. They would only be liable for consequential injury to the surface of the plaintiffs' land overlying the stratum of pitch and for injury to the plaintiffs' buildings. The buildings all told are only worth a few pounds. The surface without the buildings is of such a sort that it would be little or none the worse for cracks and depressions. Even if the plaintiffs cared to bring actions in which they could recover no substantial damages and would not be wholly indemnified against costs, the defendants at the outside would only have to pay in each case damages all but nominal and the costs of an undefended action. Of course the defendants would go on with their digging as long as there was any pitch to be got. The pitch won from the plaintiffs' land would pay the costs and damages over and over again. And in the meantime the plaintiffs would have to look on and see the value of their land destroyed for the time, if not for ever, by the withdrawal of the one valuable element in its composition. A conclusion so lame and impotent seems hardly in accordance with the principles of equity or common sense.

The judgment of Nathan, J., is not inconsistent with itself. But it appears to be founded on a mistaken analogy. Water dropping from the clouds on the face of the earth and percolating the ground in no definite channel is not the property of any man until it has been appropriated. The pitch which is the peculiar product of this strip of land in the Island of Trinidad resembles water in one respect. At a certain temperature it becomes liquid. When it is liquid its behaviour is more or less like the behaviour of water or any other fluid. It has no angle of repose. From these premises Nathan, J., infers that this underground stratum of pitch is no man's property until it has been appropriated, and his conclusion is that, just as no action will lie for collecting or pumping up underground water percolating the earth in no defined channel, though the supply may be withdrawn from a neighbour's property, and the withdrawal may leave his well dry and useless, so anybody and everybody who owns a lot in the village of La Brea may with impunity win the pitch lying under his neighbour's land. So far the two learned Puisne judges were agreed. They differed only on one point. Nathan, J., thought that it was decided that an owner of land has no right at common law to the support of subterranean water. That is the head-note in Popplewell v. Hodkinson, 17 W. R. 806, L. R. 4 Ex. 248. Lewis, J., thought that the head note was not warranted by the decision. Nathan, J., therefore came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had no case at all, while Lewis, J., thought they were right up to a certain point and gave them a barren victory.

The judgment of the learned Chief Justice is short and to the point. The argument which Nathan, J., has elaborated with much ingenuity and learning is dealt with by anticipation in a single sentence. "Asphaltum," observes the Chief Justice, "is a mineral—not water." He found that the defendants had interfered with the plaintiffs' right of support, that they had let down the surface of the plaintiffs' land, and consequently done injury to the plaintiffs' house, and also that the plaintiffs had suffered injury by the loss of the asphaltum, which, on the removal by the defendants of the lateral support of their land, passed into the defendants' land and was appropriated by them to their own use.

Their lordships agree with the learned Chief Justice. It is not necessary to discuss the question on which Lewis, J., differed from Nathan, J., as to the right of support from subterranean water, because, as the Chief Justice observes, the substance which afforded support in this case was not water. As was laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739, the nature of the strata must be immaterial; it is impossible for the court to measure out degrees to which the right of support for the surface may extend. "The only reasonable support," as Lord Campbell observed, "is that which will protect the surface from subsidence and keep it securely at its antient and natural level." The damages awarded by the Chief Justice do not appear to their lordships to have been assessed on a wrong principle or, under the circumstances, to be excessive.

One argument was addressed to their lordships which perhaps ought to be noticed. It was said that digging for pitch was the common industry of La Brea, and that if an injunction were granted the industry would be stopped altogether. In the first place there is no evidence that that would be the result. Whatever the result may be, rights of property must be respected, even when they conflict or seem to conflict with the interests of the community. If private property is to be sacrificed for the benefit of the public it must be done under the sanction of the Legislature, which can and generally does provide compensation. If the inhabitants of La Brea cannot dig their own pitch without invading their neighbours' rights, it is quite possible that the hope of reciprocal advantage and the apprehension of mutual liability may lead to some arrangement for their common benefit, or the difficulties of the case may induce the Legislature to step in and regulate the digging of pitch and the management of the pitch lands.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the plaintiffs' appeal ought to be allowed and the cross appeal dismissed, and the decision of the full court set aside with costs, and the judgment of the Chief Justice restored.

The respondents Ambard and François will pay the costs of the appeal and cross appeal.

Where the statutory provisions enabling a proprietor to irrigate his land from external sources are permissive merely, the right of action of neighbouring proprietors for injury done to their lands consequent upon any such irrigation are preserved; and this is so though the injury was not occasioned by the negligence of the irrigator.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Blake, Q.C., for the appellants.

Haldane, Q.C., and Crawford, for the respondents.

The judgments of their lordships (Earl of HALSBURY, L.C., Lords WATSON, HOBHOUSE, MACNAGHTEN, MORRIS, SHAND, and DAVEY) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The appellants are owners of the Dominion Railway, known as the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, in its course through the Yale district of British Columbia, passes near to the Thompson River, at the distance of about half a mile from the lands belonging to the respondents, which lie to the eastward.

The respondents' ranch, which appears to be about 320 acres in extent, is situated—to use provincial phraseology—upon benches, or, in other words, upon a series of tablelands, rising gradually to the eastward, above the level of the Thompson River. The land was originally acquired from the Crown, under a pre-emption title, by one William Rice Puckett, before the province of Columbia had been admitted into the Union. Puckett, in the year 1872, transferred his interest to James Robinson; and in July, 1884, Robinson transferred his interest to T. G. Kirkpatrick, who, in April, 1894, sold and transferred his interest in the same to the respondents, the transfer being duly recorded.

The British Columbian Land Ordinance of 1870, by section 30, provided that "every person lawfully entitled to hold a pre-emption under this ordinance, and lawfully occupying and bonâ fide cultivating, may divert any unrecorded and unappropriated water from the natural channel of any stream, lake, or river adjacent to or passing through such land, for agricultural and other purposes, upon obtaining the written authority of the Commissioner of the district to that effect, and a record of the same shall be made with him. after due notice as hereinafter mentioned, specifying the name of the applicant, the quantity sought to be diverted, the place of diversion, the object therefor, and all such other particulars as the Commissioner may require. For every such record the Commissioner shall charge a fee of two dollars, and no person shall have any exclusive right to the use of such water, whether the same flow naturally through or over his land, except such record shall have been made."

Section 33 of the Ordinance enacted that "the right of entry on or through the lands of others for any lawful purpose upon, over, or under the said land, may be claimed and taken by any person lawfully occupying and bonâ fide cultivating as aforesaid, and (previous to entry) upon paying or securing payment or compensation, as aforesaid, for the waste or damage so occasioned, to the person whose land may be wasted or damaged by such entry or carrying of water." Section 34 makes provision for the assessment of the amount of compensation payable, in case of dispute, either summarily, or by a jury or five persons.

The 36th section of the Ordinance enacts that "All assignments, transfers, or conveyances of any pre-emption right heretofore or hereafter acquired shall be construed to have conveyed and transferred, and to convey and transfer, any and all recorded water privileges in any manner attached to or used in the working of the land pre-empted."

The provisions already referred to of the Ordinance of 1870 were in substance re-enacted by No. 144 of the Laws of British Columbia consolidated in 1871, which is entitled "An Ordinance to amend and consolidate the laws affecting Crown lands in British Columbia." Sections 39-50 of chapter 66 of the Consolidated Statutes of British Columbia, 1888, relate to the same subject. Section 41 provides that "the owner of any water privilege, or right acquired by record, shall have no exclusive right to the privilege so recorded until he shall have constructed a ditch for carrying the water to the place where it is intended to be used; and, in case any such ditch shall not be of sufficient capacity to carry the quantity of water recorded by the owner of such ditch, then the exclusive right of such owner shall be limited to the quantity which such ditch may be capable of carrying, notwithstanding such record, until such ditch shall be enlarged so as to be capable of carrying the quantity of water recorded by such person." Section 47 of the statute of 1888 empowers the proprietors or occupiers of any lands subject to irrigation, with the consent in writing of the commissioner, by means of flumes, ditches, or drains through the adjacent lands, to run their surplus and waste water into any creek, gulch, or channel. The power thus given is qualified by the condition that it shall be "subject to the provisions of the law for the time being in force respecting compensation for entry upon occupied lands for carrying water through or over them." Section 49 provides that all assignments, transfers, or conveyances of any pre-emption right, when the same are or were permitted by law, and all conveyances of land in fee, whether such assignments, transfers, or conveyances were or shall be made before or after the passing of the Act, shall be construed so as to carry any and all water privileges in any manner attached to, or used in the working of the land pre-empted or conveyed. Section 56 enacts and declares that, whereas, in times past, many records of water rights and privileges had been honestly but imperfectly made, in all cases where the validity of any water record, made before the 6th day of April, 1886, might be called in question, and the court or judge before whom the case was pending should be of opinion that the record was made bonâ fide, the same should be held to be good and valid so far as the making and entry thereof is concerned, and effect should be given thereto according to the intent thereof.

In the valley of the Thompson River, and in other districts of British Columbia, irrigation is indispensably necessary in order to develop the fertility of the soil. Accordingly there have been a considerable number of provincial Acts passed from time to time in order to the sanction and regulation of water privileges. Their lordships have not thought it necessary to refer to these in detail, but have noticed all the statutory enactments to which their attention was directed in the argument upon this appeal.

Puckett, the original pre-emptor of the lands now belonging to the respondents, on the 21st of November, 1868, acquired a record of 300 inches of water to be taken from McCallum's Creek, and on the 10th of April, 1871, he acquired a record of 300 inches of water to be taken from McCallum's and Pennie's Creek, for the purpose of irrigating the lands. The respondents, as his successors, have now right to the water privileges which were so acquired by him.

The Canadian Pacific Railway, as it passes the lands of the respondents, was constructed by the Dominion Government, and was thereafter transferred to the appellant company, and opened for traffic in the year 1886. The railway, and the whole undertaking now carried on under the name of the Canadian Pacific Railway, were, by patent of Her Majesty, under the Great Seal of Canada, dated the 25th of May, 1896, granted to the appellant company. The grant was made under the proviso that "should our title to any portion or portions of the said tract of land hereby granted be found to be defective, neither the company, nor its successors or assigns, shall have any claim in respect thereof by virtue of anything contained in these presents." No question arises in this action as to any defect of the Crown title, the only question relates to the powers which the respondents are entitled to exercise, by virtue of the water privileges attached to their lands.

The appellant company brought their writ on the 20th July, 1895, and an amended statement of claim was delivered on the 27th of October, 1896, before the Supreme Court of British Columbia. The amended statement sets forth that the respondents brought large quantities of water upon their lands for the purposes of irrigation, that they did not carry off the surplus water by means of flumes, ditches, or drains, but allowed it to mingle with the subsoil, with the result of causing a slide of the land in the direction of the Thompson River, and thereby occasioning, from time to time, serious damage to the line of railway. The appellant company claimed, "that the defendants, their servants, agents, and workmen, be restrained, by the order of this honourable court, from continuing to bring water upon their lands, and to allow such water to escape to the plaintiffs' line of railway, and to cause land slides thereon as mentioned."

The case went to trial at Vancouver, before Drake, J., and a special jury. The learned judge submitted these two questions to the jury: "(1) Is the water brought by the defendants upon their land for the purpose of irrigation the sole cause of the damage done to the plaintiffs' line of railway by the slide in question? (2) Is the water brought by the defendants on their land for the purpose of irrigation the substantial cause of the damage done to the plaintiffs' line of railway by the slide in question?" The jury answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

The learned judge who presided at the trial, having considered the verdict returned by the jury, refused the injunction craved, and dismissed the appellants' action with costs. On appeal, the full court of British Columbia, consisting of McCreight, Walkem, and McColl, JJ., affirmed, with costs, the judgment of Drake, J.

The learned judges of the Supreme Court fully recognized the gravity of the legal issues which were raised, and their importance to the parties. Drake, J., said: "The jury found, after a trial extending over many days, that the substantial cause of the injury done to the plaintiffs' railway was the water brought on to the lands of the defendants for irrigation purposes, and on that finding the plaintiffs move for judgment, asking that the defendants be restrained from further damaging the plaintiffs' line by irrigating the lands in question. The effect of such an order will be to prevent the defendants carrying on farming operations upon the lands in question."

Drake, J., at the same time, clearly explained the origin and nature of the slide, or landslip, which, during periods of irrigation, encroached upon and damaged the appellants' line of railway: "The defendants irrigated about 34 acres of land on the high bench above the railway with water brought by a ditch capable of carrying 160 inches of water. An inch of water means 12,960 gallons in 24 hours, or 1,728 cubic feet. The soil which the defendants irrigated was proved to be of a very porous quality, consisting of many feet of gravel underlying a slight deposit of sandy loam, and below the gravel was a very large bed of what is called silt, a mineral that absorbs water rapidly, and when its saturation reaches 78 degrees it is converted into liquid mud. At a point on the banks of the Thompson, above and below the plaintiffs' line, a large slide has been formed by water percolating through the soil and causing the earth to slip. This slide is continually moving towards the river, forcing the rails out of position, and frequently large masses of more or less liquid silt carrying away the road bed drop from under the line. This slide is now about sixty-six acres in extent and continually increasing."

The damage done to the railway of the appellant company by the slide, and the constant repair and renewal which it necessitates, may be gathered from the uncontradicted evidence of Henry John Cambie, the chief engineer, since its opening in 1886, of the Pacific Division of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Speaking of that portion of the railway which is affected by the slide in question, he says: "We keep a resident watchman there living on the spot, and no train is allowed to pass over without his signal giving permission. In addition, we have been obliged to divide up the section, and put an extra section gang in order to have three or four men at all times. Besides that we must keep over a great part of the reach twenty-five or thirty men working along for weeks together on this particular piece. They are not able to do it alone. We must put on working trains to bring material, in order to keep up the railway embankment. Notwithstanding all that, there is a very great danger to the trains passing over it."

In coming to the conclusion that the application of the appellant company ought to be dismissed, Drake, J., and McCreight, J., with whom Walkem, J., agreed, proceeded solely upon the ground that the British Columbian legislation, which has been already referred to, gives to the holder of land under a pre-emption title, who has taken a supply of water for irrigation purposes, and has recorded his privilege in accordance with its provisions, an absolute right to use for irrigation the water so taken by him, no matter how injurious the use may be to neighbouring landowners, and that he was under no liability to compensate them for the injury done, unless it were shown that his use was negligent. In other words, they held that his irrigating the surface of his land, by bringing to and pouring upon it foreign water, which immediately percolated to the substratum of silt, with which it mingled, and then escaped from his land as liquid mud, and seriously damaged the adjoining land, was the necessary consequence of his exercising his statutory right, and did not constitute negligence, or afford the owner of the adjoining land any cause of action. McColl, J., without expressing the same conclusion, proceeds to consider whether the appellant company would have been entitled to an injunction, if they had offered to make compensation to the respondents, in ceasing to irrigate so as to cause a land slide, and the consequent destruction of the railway line. The learned judge, however, does not go so far as to solve the question, seeing it had not been argued, and his brethren had been able to come to the conclusion that the judgment should be affirmed. It may be added, that the record in this appeal contains no materials for raising the question which was discussed by the learned judge.

Their lordships think that the judges of the Supreme Court were right in considering the crucial question in this case to be, whether the Columbian legislation, which they had to construe, was, as between the person using the powers hereby conferred and the owners of adjacent lands, imperative or merely permissive. They examined the leading authorities bearing upon the point, and their conclusion, as expressed by Drake, J., was: "The difference in the present case is that there is no direction that irrigation waters should be used, but only a permission to use them; but the permission to use implies a legal right of use which will bar an action for damages when the use has been non-negligent." The proposition is somewhat too broadly stated. Wherever, according to the sound construction of a statute, the Legislature has authorized a proprietor to make a particular use of his land, and the authority given is, in the strict sense of law, permissive merely, and not imperative, the Legislature must be held to have intended, that the use sanctioned is not to be in prejudice of the common law right of others.

The leading authorities in the law of England upon this question, which though not numerous are of considerable weight, are Managers of Metropolitan Asylums District v. Hill, 29 W. R. 617, 6 App. Cas. 193, and London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Truman, 34 W. R. 657, 11 App. Cas. 45. In the first of these cases the managers were authorized by a public statute 30 & 31 Vict. cap. 6, no locality being specified, to erect hospitals for the reception of the sick poor of the metropolis. In virtue of these statutory powers, they commenced the erection of a small-pox hospital at Hampstead, when an injunction was applied for by the respondents who were the proprietors of houses in the vicinity. At the trial, it was found by a jury that the hospital was, or would be to the nuisance of the respondents. The House of Lords decided in favour of the respondents, upon the express ground that the statute was permissive, and gave the managers no authority to erect a hospital which was injurious to neighbouring proprietors. The Lord Chancellor (Selborne) said (6 App. Cas., p. 202): "I am clearly of opinion that the Poor Law Board and the managers had no statutory authority to do anything which might be a nuisance to the plaintiffs, without their consent." In the same case (6 App. Cas. 208) Lord Blackburn said: "It is clear that the burthen lies on those who seek to establish that the Legislature intended to take away the private right of individuals, to show that by express words, or by necessary implication, such an intention appears." The noble and learned lord also observed (at p. 203): "The Legislature has very often interfered with the rights of private persons, but in modern times it has generally given compensation to those injured; and, if no compensation is given, it affords a reason, though not a conclusive one, for thinking that the intention of the Legislature was, not that the thing should be done at all events, but only that it should be done, if it could be done, without injury to others."

In the second case, a railway company were empowered by a local and personal Act, passed after due inquiry, to purchase additional lands not exceeding fifty acres, for the purposes inter alia of receiving, depositing, or keeping any cattle, or any goods conveyed or intended to be conveyed on the railway. They were required by the Act to sell superfluous lands within ten years from its passing. Under that power, they purchased between two and three acres of ground adjacent to one of their stations. For nearly ten years the ground was used as a market garden, when the company devoted the land to the purposes of their cattle traffic, and constructed a yard or dock for the cattle carried by them. Certain occupiers of houses in the neighbourhood of the yard, who complained of it as constituting a nuisance, but did not allege negligence on the part of the company in using it, applied for an injunction, which was granted by North, J., and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Their decisions were reversed by the House of Lords, who held that the provisions of the Act which related to the acquisition and use of the yard were intended by the Legislature to be imperative in the same sense as its provisions relating to the use of the railway, and that, no negligence having been shown on the part of the company, the injunction ought to be refused.

In the present case, the legislation of British Columbia is perfectly general, and applies to all lands within the province which had been, or at any future time might be acquired by a subject, under a pre-emption title from the Crown. It provides that the proprietor of land held under that title, with consent of the commissioner, and upon making payment of compensation, may compulsorily divert water from any stream, lake, or river adjacent, and may convey it to his own land for the purpose of irrigation; and he has also the right, if lawfully occupying and cultivating his own land, to convey the water through or over land which does not belong to him, upon paying due compensation for waste or damage. Then the statute of 1882 empowers him, after the water has been used for irrigation, to run the surplus or waste water through the adjacent lands by means of flumes, ditches, or drains, subject to the same provisions as to compensation.

The legislation in question, in so far as its provisions relate to the use of the water by the irrigator, after it has been conveyed to his own land, is undoubtedly conceived in language which is permissive. He is allowed to use it for the ordinary purposes of irrigation, which primâ facie imply that the water is to be distributed over, and absorbed by the soil; and it is a circumstance not to be overlooked in construing these statutory provisions that the Legislature has contemplated, and has provided compulsory means of carrying off surplus water, which has not been absorbed by the soil, by flumes, ditches or drains through the adjacent lands of other owners. The real question therefore, in this case, comes to be, whether these provisions ought to be construed, as being in their substance, as well as in their form, permissive merely, and, subject to the obligation, which, in that case, is implied at common law, that the irrigator must use his water supply so as not to do damage to adjacent lands; or, whether they are to be construed as imperative, and therefore as empowering the irrigator, so long as he is not convicted of negligence, to inflict any amount of injury upon his neighbour without incurring responsibility. The respondents contended for the second of these alternatives, which has been adopted by the courts below, but, in order to justify their contention, it is incumbent upon them to show, that the Legislature deliberately intended to take away the rights of individuals to protect their property against invasion. The respondents maintain that, so long as they are not negligent, the Legislature has given them the absolute privilege, for the consequences of which they are not responsible, of causing, by means of their irrigation, a landslip which will have the ultimate effect of carrying the lands situated at a lower level than their own, together with all erections upon them, whether consisting of houses or railways, into the Thompson river.

Their lordships have been unable to discover, in the statutory provisions submitted to them, any sufficient ground for holding that the privilege of irrigating his own soil with foreign water was meant by the Legislature to be imperative, and was intended to exclude all right of action by neighbouring proprietors for injury done to their lands, save in the case where such injury was occasioned by the negligence of the irrigator. It is evident that no such circumstances occur in this case as led to the decision of the House of Lords in London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co. v. Truman. The company could not, under the power conferred upon them, acquire and use additional land for the enlargement of one of their stations, without incurring a statutory obligation to the public, to use that additional land as part of their railway, so long as their line was open for the accommodation and conveyance of traffic. The land added was, in these circumstances, just part of the railway, and within the principle of Hammersmith and City Railway Co. v. Brand, 18 W. R. 12, L. R. 4 H. L. 171. In the present case, the irrigator is at liberty, subject only to the consent of a commissioner, who is not charged with the duty of seeing that no injury results to lands adjacent to those which are to be irrigated, to determine the quantity of water he desires to appropriate, the means by which it is to be conveyed to his land, and the means by which surplus or waste water is to be discharged. When the water has been conveyed to his land, he is authorized to use it for purposes of irrigation; but it is left to his discretion to determine whether, as circumstances permit, he will use in irrigation, the whole, or part, or none of it. These provisions are certainly consistent with the view that no part of it was meant to be employed to the injury of neighbouring lands.

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to reverse the judgment appealed from; to grant an injunction restraining the respondents, their servants, agents, and workmen, from so irrigating the respondents' lands, as to cause a land slide or slip, and thereby to injure the appellant company's line of railway; and to order that the respondents do pay to the appellant company their costs of action in both courts below. The respondents must pay to the appellant company their costs of this appeal.

In an action against a tug and a tow for damage by collision, the owners of the tow allowed judgment to go by default, and the proceeds of the sale of the tow—viz., £855—were paid into court. The plaintiffs' vessel and the tug were found both to blame, and judgment was given against the tug for half the damage. The total damage sustained by the plaintiffs' vessel was £4,146.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to take the £855 out of court, and that the owners of the tug were liable to pay the plaintiffs £2,073 without having any credit given to them for the £855.

Appeal from an order of Bucknill, J.

The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Mourne against the owners of the barque Morgengry and the owners of the steam-tug Blackcock for damage by collision.

At the time of the collision The Morgengry was in tow of The Blackcock, and the actual collision was between The Mourne and The Morgengry.

The owners of The Morgengry, who were foreigners, made default in delivering a defence, and a decree was accordingly pronounced in favour of the plaintiffs against the owners of The Morgengry subject to a reference to assess the damage, and The Morgengry was condemned in the said damage and costs, and was decreed to be appraised and sold.

The sum of £855 was realized by the sale and was paid into court.

The action, as against the owners of The Blackcock, came on for trial before Bucknill, J.

The learned judge held both vessels, The Mourne and The Blackcock, to blame, and condemned the owners of The Blackcock in a moiety of the damage proceeded for by the owners of The Mourne, subject to a reference. The registrar reported that the total damage sustained by The Mourne was £4,146.

The plaintiffs moved for an order that the sum of £855 which had been paid into court might be paid out to them.

The owners of The Blackcock resisted the application, and asked that the sum might be credited to them.

Bucknill, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to take the £855 out of court and to receive from the owners of The Blackcock the sum of £2,073.

From this order the owners of The Blackcock appealed.

It appeared that in an action for limitation of liability the owners of The Blackcock had obtained a decree limiting their liability to £1,802.

one being liable for the whole and the other for half. It is also to be observed that there is no judgment or finding that The Mourne was to blame as against The Morgengry. If the owners of The Blackcock wished for such a finding, I think they should have asked for it by their defence.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

According to the plaintiff's allegations the facts were as follows: In September, 1897, the defendant Fanny Bew (since deceased), who was then a widow named Fanny Walker, and the plaintiff were engaged to be married. In that month the defendant Mrs. Bew having agreed to advance a sum of £600 to one Moss, a friend of the plaintiff's, upon the security of a mortgage of freehold property belonging to Moss, the plaintiff lent to the defendant a sum of £300 for the purpose of assisting her to make up the sum she was to advance to Moss. It was agreed that the mortgage should be made to the defendant alone, and the deed, which was executed on the 6th of September, 1897, was prepared in that form accordingly. Shortly after the execution of the mortgage the intended marriage between the plaintiff and Mrs. Bew was duly solemnized. After living together for a short time they separated. In December, 1897, Mrs. Bew called in the mortgage. The £600 was accordingly paid to her, and she refused to pay any part of that sum to the plaintiff on the ground that, as she alleged, the £300 which she had received from him was intended not as a loan, but as a gift, and was to be used by her for her maintenance before the marriage. The plaintiff, on the contrary, alleged that the defendant was a trustee of the money secured by the mortgage for the plaintiff as to £300, part thereof, and interest thereon. The plaintiff therefore brought this action against the defendant Mrs. Bew, claiming a declaration to that effect, or alternatively a declaration that £300, part of the money secured by the mortgage, was money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant for the purpose of the mortgage. On the application of the plaintiff, Stirling, J., made an interlocutory order that Mrs. Bew should pay £300 into court, and this was done. Mrs. Bew afterwards died, and the plaintiff revived the action against her executors. The action ultimately came on for trial before Kekewich, J., who, on the 8th of December, 1898, made a declaration that the defendant Mrs. Bew had been a trustee for the plaintiff for the sum of £300 with interest, and ordered that the costs of the defendants, "including the costs, charges, and expenses of the late defendant Fanny Bew as trustee" should be taxed as between solicitor and client, and should be paid out of the fund in court, and that the remainder of that fund should be paid out to the plaintiff. The costs, charges, and expenses directed to be paid out of the fund in court were, it was stated, nearly sufficient to exhaust the fund. The plaintiff appealed against so much of the order as directed payment to the defendants out of the fund in court of their costs of the action as between solicitor and client, and of costs, charges, and expenses beyond the costs of the action; and contended that the defendants ought to be ordered to pay his costs of the action and of the appeal as between party and party. The principal question argued was whether the appeal was not an appeal for costs only, and therefore prohibited by section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873.

Aug. 2.—LINDLEY, M.R.—We have taken time to consider our judgment in this appeal, and have consulted our colleagues in the other branch of the Court of Appeal, in order that there may be no doubt on the point in the future. The difficulty arises in this way. [His lordship read section 49 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and proceeded:] Now, that section has been construed in two ways which are inconsistent with each other. The first case in which it came before the court was The City of Manchester, decided in 1880. The question there was whether an order giving the plaintiffs their costs of the action in a case of collision where both vessels were to blame was right. The objection was taken that it was an appeal as to costs only, and the court took this view, as expressed by James, L.J., by way of interlocutory observation, at p. 222 (5 P. D.): "Where costs are given with regard to the conduct of the parties there is no appeal; but where a general rule is laid down and costs given according to it an appeal will lie." That clearly lays down this rule, that though the costs may be in the discretion of the court, yet if it appears that this discretion was not exercised, but that the judge applied a rule instead of and as excluding his discretion, the order made is still appealable without leave. When the language of section 49 is looked at there is a good deal to be said for that view, the object of the section being simply that the Court of Appeal should not review the judge's discretion.

The case which conflicts with that is Charles v. Jones. There The City of Manchester was not cited, and the view expressed by Cotton, L.J., 33 Ch. D., at p. 82 (33 Ch. D.), is this: even if the judge did not in the particular case exercise his discretion, yet "if it is a case in which the Act leaves the costs to the discretion of the judge, it takes away the power of this court to entertain an appeal from his decision."

If the case of The City of Manchester had been brought to the attention of the court it is probable that Cotton, L.J., would not have expressed himself in quite those terms. But it is obvious that the two views cannot stand together, and the conclusion at which we have arrived is that the interpretation put upon the section in The City of Manchester is the correct one. That view is that if the costs are in the discretion of the judge the Court of Appeal will assume that the judge exercised his discretion, unless it is satisfied that he has not exercised his discretion, but has applied some rule which in fact excluded his discretion.

There is one other point. There is a discrepancy between Charles v. Jones and In re Chennell, Jones v. Chennell. In In re Chennell, Jessel, M.R., laid down that an appeal without leave would lie as to costs, charges, and expenses, and that if those three things were included together in the same order an appeal would lie as to the costs only, without reference to the question whether anything else in the order was appealed against. That is inconsistent with Charles v. Jones, and on that point we think that Charles v. Jones ought to be followed. You cannot get an appeal as to costs by invoking in aid another part of the order about which you are not making any complaint. On that point, therefore, we adopt the view of Cotton, L.J., that in such a case you cannot appeal as to costs only if there is nothing wrong with the order as to charges and expenses.

Now we must consider what is the nature of the present case. It is a contest as to the ownership of £300, part of £600 invested on mortgage in the name of Fanny Bew (now deceased). The action was by a husband against his wife to assert his right to the £300. The wife's defence was to claim that £300 as her own, denying that she was a trustee of it for her husband. Obviously in such a case the costs ought to follow the event. But the learned judge, though he has decided in favour of the husband on the merits, has yet ordered the whole of the wife's costs to come out of the fund in court, which he has found belongs to the husband. It is said that he did that in the exercise of his discretion, but from the very imperfect note of his judgment, which has been read to us, it seems that he looked on this as a trust fund, and has not exercised his discretion, but has applied a rule applicable to trustees, and which, if applicable, excluded the exercise of any discretion. The learned judge not having exercised his discretion, the appeal can be heard on the merits, and his decision must be reversed, and the defendants must pay the costs.

The order will be varied as follows: The declaration as to the late defendant Fanny Bew being a trustee of the £300 for the plaintiff will stand; discharge the subsequent part of the order as to costs, and the payment schedule, and in lieu thereof order the defendants Botterill and Hargreaves to pay the plaintiff's costs of this action, such costs to be taxed, and the last-named defendant alleging that the late defendant Fanny Bew incurred as trustee of the £300 certain costs, charges, and expenses (not being costs of this action), which were properly payable out of the £300 or the funds representing the same, refer it to the taxing-master to tax such costs, charges, and expenses (if any); pay such taxed costs, charges, and expenses (if any) out of the funds in court; transfer or pay the balance of such funds to the plaintiff. Liberty to apply.

Appeal from an order of Channell, J., at chambers.

An action for infringement of a patent was brought by the Pneumatic Tyre Co. against Marwood & Cross, a firm of cycle manufacturers at Leicester, in respect of tyres which had been supplied to them by the present defendants, the Mutual Cycle Manufacturing and Supply Co. This latter company accordingly undertook to defend the action. A company, called the Puncture-proof Pneumatic Tyre Co., were also defendants in an action for infringement brought by the Pneumatic Tyre Co.; and, as the defences to the two actions were the same, it was agreed between Mr. Holmes, the managing director of the Mutual Cycle Co., and Mr. Lee, the managing director of the Puncture-proof company, that the action against Marwood & Cross should be fought, and that the two companies should share the costs equally.

The plaintiff in the present action acted as solicitor for the defendants in the action of Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Marwood & Cross. The action was tried before Romer, J., and at the commencement of the trial the learned judge asked if a shorthand note of the evidence was going to be taken. Counsel for the Pneumatic Tyre Co. said that, unless the other side were willing to come to an arrangement to join in taking the shorthand notes, he would object to a shorthand note being used at the trial. Counsel on the other side then said that an arrangement had been come to, and accordingly a shorthand note of the evidence was taken. It appeared that the present plaintiff, acting on the instructions of Mr. Lee, who had a general authority to act for all parties in the defence of the action, made an agreement before the trial with the solicitor for the Pneumatic Tyre Co. that a shorthand note should be taken of the evidence and printed from day to day, and that each party should pay one half of the costs thereof, and according to an affidavit made by the plaintiff it was agreed that the costs thereof should be costs in the cause and paid by the unsuccessful party. Mr. Holmes in an affidavit denied that he was told that it would be necessary to have a shorthand note taken, or that he authorized the agreement to pay half the expenses thereof, or that he was told of it; and that he was never informed by the present plaintiff, nor was it ever explained to him that whatever would have been the result of the action the cost of the shorthand notes might not be allowed on taxation as between party and party. Mr. Lee in an affidavit, on the other hand, stated that he told Mr. Holmes previous to the trial that it would be necessary to have a shorthand note taken of the evidence, and

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Holmes agreed that it should be taken; and that Holmes was present during nearly the whole of the trial, and used to see the daily transcript of the shorthand notes.

The trial lasted several days, and shorthand notes were taken and printed each day, and the present plaintiff paid one half of the cost thereof.

In the result judgment was given for the Pneumatic Tyre Co., and upon taxation of their costs they were allowed the costs of the shorthand notes, less the amount paid by the present plaintiff. It was stated on behalf of the present defendants that this item was not contested on taxation, as it should have been.

The Puncture-proof Co. paid one half of the costs of defending the action, including one half the expense of the shorthand notes. The Mutual Cycle Co. disputed their liability to pay half the costs, and the present action was brought to recover the costs.*

Judgment was given for the plaintiff subject to taxation of the bill.

Upon the taxation the master disallowed the sum paid for the shorthand notes.

Upon an objection being carried in by the plaintiff to the disallowance, the taxing-master stated in his certificate that the item had been properly disallowed, as it was an "unusual expense," and was not sustainable unless the authority of the client had been first obtained, and he had been informed that the costs thereof might fall upon him in any event (In re Blyth & Fanshawe, 31 W. R. 283, 10 Q. B. D. 207; In re Broad & Broad, 15 Q. B. D. 420, 34 W. R. Dig. 48); and that in this case no such authority was obtained.

Channell, J., at chambers dismissed a summons to review the taxation.

The plaintiff appealed.

S. T. Evans, for the plaintiff.—The agreement arrived at between the parties was that the costs of the shorthand notes should be treated as party and party costs. The shorthand notes were printed each day and were used during the trial, and it was impossible to have got on without them. In a patent action shorthand notes of the evidence are indispensable. In such an action the expense of shorthand notes cannot be called an "unusual expense," as in In re Blyth & Fanshawe. Romer, J., asked at the trial if shorthand notes were going to be taken, and they were treated as the authentic notes of the evidence. In Castner Kellner Alkali Co. v. Commercial Development Corporation, 47 W. R. 534, [1899] 1 Ch. 805, the costs of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence for the purpose of the appeal were allowed, as they were necessary to enable the court to follow the arguments. The master and the judge were, therefore, wrong.

R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Montague Shearman, for the defendants.—Though the parties agreed to share the expenses of the shorthand notes, there was no agreement that they should be costs in the cause. If the shorthand notes were necessary at the trial, Romer, J., ought to have been asked to allow them as part of the costs. In the absence of any such order of the judge at the trial the costs of the shorthand notes should not have been allowed on taxation between party and party: Ashworth v. Outram, 27 W. R. 98, 9 Ch. D. 483; Earl de la Warr v. Miles, 30 W. R. 35, 19 Ch. D. 80. Upon taxation between solicitor and client the costs cannot be allowed against the client, even though he has authorized the shorthand notes being taken, unless he has been informed that such costs may not be allowed upon taxation between party and party: In re Blyth & Fanshawe. That decision was approved in In re Broad & Broad.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I do not intend to decide in any way contrary to any of the authorities, for in my opinion this case is outside them all. The question arises on the taxation of a bill of costs as between solicitor and client. The Pneumatic Tyre Co. brought an action against Marwood & Cross for infringement of a patent, and the action was defended by the Mutual Cycle Co., who may be considered as the real defendants. The Puncture-proof Pneumatic Tyre Co. agreed to share the expenses. The present plaintiff acted as solicitor for the Mutual Cycle Co. The action lasted ten days before Romer, J., and the Pneumatic Tyre Co. were successful. Upon taxation the Pneumatic Tyre Co. were allowed the amount paid by them for the costs of the shorthand notes. The present plaintiff carried in his bill of costs against his clients, in which he claimed to be repaid the sum which he had paid for the expenses of the shorthand notes. The Puncture-proof Pneumatic Tyre Co. paid one half of the costs, but the Mutual Cycle Co. resisted payment of the other half. The present plaintiff thereupon brought this action against them upon his bill of costs, and recovered judgment subject to the bill being taxed. The question now raised is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the defendants' share of the expenses of the shorthand notes. It has been held by this court in In re Blyth & Fanshawe that a solicitor cannot charge his client with an unusual expense unless he first informs his client that such expense may not be allowed on taxation between party and party. In that case Baggallay, L.J., said: "I take it to be the general rule of law, and an important rule which is to be observed in almost all cases, that if an unusual expense is about to be incurred in the course of an action it is the duty of the solicitor to inform his client fully of it, and not to be satisfied by taking his authority to incur the additional expense, but to point out to him that such expense will or may not be allowed on taxation between party and party whatever may be the result of this trial." Lindley, L.J., said: "It was the duty of the solicitors to Mr. Wells to give him advice and protection against unnecessary expense, and to point out to him that if he chose to engage shorthand writers the cost of having the transcript of shorthand notes might not be allowed as between party and party." Baggallay, L.J., used the word "unusual," and Lindley, L.J., used the word "unnecessary." The decision was that the expense of the shorthand notes should not be allowed as the solicitors had not informed their client that the expense was one which might not be allowed on taxation as between party and party. In the present case Romer, J., at the trial took the initiative about the shorthand notes, and asked whether a shorthand note was to be taken. One knows how essential it is in most patent actions to have a shorthand note of the evidence. Counsel who appeared for the plaintiffs in that action then said that unless the other side were willing to come to an arrangement to have a joint note taken, he would object to the shorthand notes being made use of at the trial. Counsel on the other side said that an arrangement had been come to, and a shorthand note was accordingly taken on behalf of both parties, and it was used at the trial as the record of the evidence. It is clear to my mind that that amounted to a bargain between the parties that a shorthand note should be taken, and that the expense thereof should be borne equally between them. It was said, however, that there was no agreement that the expense thereof should be costs in the cause. I cannot agree. I think that the agreement implies that the expense so incurred should be costs in the cause. The plaintiff paid for half the shorthand notes. Why cannot he recover the sum so paid from his clients? It is said that the decision in In re Blyth & Fanshawe prevents the plaintiff from recovering. The decision, however, can only apply where the expense is unusual or unnecessary. In the present case it was clearly necessary to have a shorthand note taken, and to my mind the decision cannot apply in such a case. After the arrangement come to in court as to taking and using the note for the purposes of the trial, it would be contrary to justice to hold that the solicitor must pay for the expense of the shorthand note out of his own pocket. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. During the argument I have looked at most of the authorities upon the question, and I have also looked at the text-book upon Costs of Actions by Mr. W. E. Gordon, and I cannot state the general result of the cases more accurately and more concisely than it is there stated. On p. 227 he says: "The general rule is that the costs of shorthand writers' notes of the evidence are not primâ facie to be allowed on taxation between party and party; if there is any special reason for allowing them, application should be made at the hearing for a special direction from the court." For that proposition he cites several authorities, but I will only refer to one—namely, Ashworth v. Outram. That statement of the law is perfectly accurate with one qualification not material for the purposes of to-day, that, according to Ashworth v. Outram, if there is an appeal from the judgment, the Court of Appeal may order the costs of the shorthand notes of the evidence to be allowed on taxation between party and party. Of course there is this possible further qualification, where the client, having received due warning of the nature of the expense proposed to be incurred, and having been told that the costs may not be allowed on taxation between party and party, enters into an agreement that they shall be treated as party and party costs. That is the rule, and it is a rule of old standing, and I should be loth to say one word which should trench upon it. There is the further rule established by In re Blyth & Fanshawe, as to which Mr. Gordon in his book, at p. 228, says: "It is the duty of a solicitor, who in the course of an action is about to incur unusual expenses—such as the costs of shorthand notes of evidence given at a reference—to point out to his client that the additional expenses so incurred will not"—I should add, to be quite accurate, or may not—"be allowed to him even if successful in the action, on taxation between party and party; and in default of so doing the solicitor will not be entitled to charge the costs so incurred on taxation between solicitor and client." I believe that to be an accurate statement of the law. I am not going to base my judgment on a patent action being a peculiar kind of action, and shorthand notes being a usual expense in such an action. I do not say whether the costs of shorthand notes are or are not a usual expense in such an action, and before holding that they are, I should like to take further time to consider the matter, and to inquire from the taxing-masters what is the practice in such cases. If their practice is to treat the costs as an unusual expense, I should think it wrong to interfere. Nor do I place my decision upon any agreement between the solicitors or between the clients. I have little doubt upon the affidavits that Mr. Lee's authority extended to doing what was right and proper in the action, including the power to make an agreement that the costs of the shorthand notes should be party and party costs. The ground upon which I base my decision is this. It seems to me to be clear from the shorthand notes of the proceedings before Romer, J., that with the consent of the learned judge it was arranged in such a way as to bind both parties that a shorthand note of the proceedings at the trial should be taken and should be the authentic record of the evidence in the case, which notes from that moment both parties were entitled to use as of right, and if an appeal were brought both parties would be entitled to use them upon the appeal. In my judgment, when that state of facts exists, the rules as to the disallowance upon taxation of the costs of the shorthand notes do not apply. That seems to me to be the result of the arrangement made in the patent action, and in these circumstances I think that the plaintiff is entitled to be recouped the out-of-pocket expenses which were incurred by him in obtaining the authentic record of the evidence for the use of the judge and of the parties at the trial. I have no doubt that in truth and in fact the transcript of the shorthand notes was furnished to the judge, and was used not only by the parties, but also by him, as the authentic record of the evidence. I wish to add that such an arrangement is frequently made in a patent action, and judges take the view that the shorthand notes so taken should be the authentic record of the evidence. When that is done I do not think that the rules as to the disallowance of the costs of the shorthand notes apply.

VALENTINE'S MEAT JUICE CO. v. VALENTINE EXTRACT CO. (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Trade name—Defendant using his own name—Sale of same to a company—Imitation—Tendency to deceive—Fraud—Costs.

A trader, if he is honestly carrying on a business in a particular article, cannot be restrained from using his own real name in connection with that business, because an old-established trader of the same name has made a reputation in a similar but distinct article.

The plaintiffs had long made and sold meat juice, put up in bottles, and used chiefly by invalids, and known on the market by various titles, including "Valentine's" simply. The defendant invented a method of putting up solid meat extract in the form of portable globules, chiefly used by travellers. Before any sales he sold his invention and the goodwill of the business "being created" to the defendant company, bearing his name.

Held, that an action for injunction must fail, as, although there were features of suspicion, want of good faith on the part of the defendants was not established either in the inception of the business or in the sale to the company.

This was an action for an injunction brought by the Valentine Meat Juice Co., founded in the United States of America in 1871, and since that date occupied solely with the manufacture and sale of a preparation of meat juice. Their annual consignment to English firms now reached upwards of a quarter of a million bottles, the article being mainly used by sick people and invalids, but also by persons in good health. It was proved to be sold under the various titles of "Valentine's Meat Juice," "Valentine's Extract," and "Valentine" simply. Until 1898 there was no other similar preparation on the market connected with the name "Valentine."

The defendant company was incorporated in England on the 16th of October, 1897, with a nominal capital of £4,000, one of its objects being the carrying on of the business of meat extract or meat juice manufacturers or extractors, and vendors either wholesale or retail. It had been got up by the defendant C. R. Valentine, then and since its managing director. This defendant, after being employed in 1893 and 1894 as a dairy expert by the Governments of New South Wales and New Zealand, became in 1895 the manager of the produce department of a company formed to take over the English business of the firm of Nelson Brothers. This company did no business in any extract of meat until February, 1897, when it began to receive and sell large consignments of extract of meat in bulk. C. R. Valentine himself was well known to those connected with colonial produce.

Towards the end of 1895 he had the idea of putting up solid meat extract in a globule form, as a portable food for travellers and others. After many experiments he applied in March, 1897, for a patent, which was granted to him. Between then and November, 1897, he showed his globules to various persons, some of whom promised to support the business proposed. By an agreement of the 11th of November C. R. Valentine agreed to sell to the defendant company his invention, patent, &c., and "the goodwill of the business of a meat extract company which is now being created or established by the vendor in connection with the use of the said trade marks"; he further covenanted for a period of ten years not to allow his name to be used in connection with business in meat extract. A few independent and substantial persons held preferred shares, but C. R. Valentine had throughout had the largest interest in the business. The sale of the globules began in February, 1898; they were at first packed in boxes labelled "Valentine's Valtine Meat Globules" ("Valtine" being one of the registered trade marks assigned to the company). Since the beginning of the action the word "Valentine's" had been dropped from such labels. In the same February the defendants issued 90,000 circulars, in two editions, to chemists, nurses, doctors, and grocers, describing the article, and speaking of C. R. Valentine as having "for some years been identified with the manufacture and handling of extract of meat." Out of about 1,000 replies, fifty or sixty showed confusion in the minds of intending customers, but it appeared that in every instance the defendant company at once sent an answer explaining the independence of their business, and the novelty and nature of their articles. Among instructions to travellers, the defendants wrote to one a letter containing the following words: "If the question arises, it is most essential to make it understood that the company has no connection whatever with Valentine's meat juice." From the evidence it appeared that the belief that the defendants' goods were of the plaintiffs' manufacture arose simply from the use of the name "Valentine." It further appeared to the satisfaction of the learned judge that the two articles were of different natures, one being a medicine best used with cold water, the other a food to be used with hot water, and that really there was no substantial competition between them.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and L. B. Sebastian, for the plaintiffs.—It is settled law that a person now has no control over the name under which another man trades unless special circumstances exist, such as are found where it is shown that some name which he is using is so identified with the goods as to lead the market to believe that goods put on the market under that name are the plaintiffs': Reddaway v. Banham, 44 W. R. 638, [1896] A. C. 199, setting aside the dicta in Turton v. Turton, 38 W. R. 22, 42 Ch. D. 128, and Jamieson v. Jamieson, 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 169, at p. 180, 42 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 197. Once decide that deception has taken place, and it is immaterial to discuss whether he has used his own name: Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896. [STIRLING, J., referred to Warner v. Warner, 5 T. L. R. 327, 359.] The issue to be proved is, not the intention to deceive, but the probability of deception: Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 664, 3 App. Cas. 376, at p. 391; Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., 28 W. R. 966, 14 Ch. D. 748, at p. 752; Saxlehner v. Apollinaris Co., [1897] 1 Ch. 893, 901, 45 W. R. Dig. 164. The case reserved by Stirling, J., in Tussaud v. Tussaud, 38 W. R. 503, 44 Ch. D. 678, appears to be dealt with in Brinsmead v. Brinsmead, 12 T. L. R. 631, 13 T. L. R. 3. In Pinet v. Pinet, No. 1 in 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 933; No. 2 in 46 W. R. 506, [1898] 1 Ch. 179, the injunction went, although there was no actual deception, nor was it until the second case that the defendant's name was found to be an assumed one.

Upjohn, Q.C. (A. Sims with him), for the defendants, contended that they had done everything which could reasonably be done for the purpose of distinguishing their article from that of the plaintiffs. The case seems identical with Turton v. Turton. There is no such obvious fraud as in Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, or in Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co. Excepting that there is no "get-up" common to the trade, the case falls within Jamieson v. Jamieson. The defendant C. R. Valentine, by his experiments and reputation, has created a connection of his own which distinguishes the case from Tussaud v. Tussaud.

Nov. 14.—STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said:—It may now be convenient to consider the law applicable to such a state of facts upon the assumption that all the acts complained of were being done by the defendant C. R. Valentine, personally. The law on this subject has been very shortly stated by Halsbury, L.C., in the case of Reddaway v. Banham, [1896] A. C. at p. 204, in this form: "Nobody has any right to represent his goods as those of somebody else." If a plaintiff complains that such representations are being made by a defendant, it is not necessary, in order to obtain an injunction, that he should prove any attempt to deceive on the part of the defendant. This point was decided by Lord Cottenham in Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338, and again more recently by the Court of Appeal in the case of Reddaway v. Bentham Hemp Spinning Co., [1892] 2 Q. B. 639, 41 W. R. Dig. 253, and has been distinctly stated to be the law by the Lord Chancellor in a case before the House of Lords, reported since the argument in the present case. I refer to the Cellular Clothing Co. v. Maxton, [1899] A. C. 326, 47 W. R. Dig. 193. I will read a few words from the report at p. 334. [His lordship read from the words: "It seems to be assumed that a fraudulent intention," down to the words: "That, my lords, I believe to be the law."] It lies, therefore, on the plaintiff, in a case such as the present, to establish that the defendant is selling his goods in such a way as to represent to the public that they are the manufacture of the plaintiff. Where the defendant bears the same name as the plaintiff it is not an easy task to satisfy this onus. "If a man," says Lindley, M.R., in Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., 44 W. R. 688 at p. 689, "uses his own name to denote his own goods it would be intolerable to confer on him the right to prevent other people of the same name from honestly using their own name to denote their own goods, even although they might be of the same kind and be undistinguishable from them." He refers to Burgess v. Burgess and Turton v. Turton. The point has recently undergone very careful consideration in the case of Jamieson v. Jamieson, 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 169, a case which was referred to in the argument of the present case. Byrne, J., who tried the case, there laid down the law as follows: [His lordship read from the report: "Every trader may use and advertise . . . greater care than another person."] The learned judge was therefore of opinion that the burden was cast on the new trader to take care to distinguish his own goods from those of the original trader, and on the facts he was of opinion that the defendant had not discharged the onus which lay on him. The Court of Appeal, as I read the decisions of the learned judges, did not differ from the law thus laid down, but did differ on the question of fact, being of opinion that the defendant had taken sufficient care to distinguish his goods. [His lordship further examined the decisions in Jamieson v. Jamieson, and after reading from the judgments of Lindley, M.R., at p. 181, and Vaughan Williams, L.J., at p. 193, proceeded as follows:] It was sought in the argument to distinguish Jamieson v. Jamieson from the present case, on the ground that the plaintiffs had established that in the market their goods have come to be known by the name of "Valentine." I think the evidence does show that the plaintiffs' preparation has been designated as "Valentine's Meat Juice" or "Valentine's Extract" or "Valentine" simply, and if the defendants were selling a preparation similar to the plaintiffs' it may be that the latter would have succeeded in establishing what the Lord Justice calls the first premise (viz., that in the market the goods of the plaintiff have come to be known by his name). The plaintiffs, however, have never manufactured or sold any goods such as the defendants have put on the market. The articles sold by the defendants are both in appearance and in reality different from that made and sold by the plaintiffs. No one buying the defendants' article could possibly suppose that he had ever bought such an article from the plaintiffs. The defendants' article has never been known on the market as the plaintiffs'. If the well-known firm of Bass & Co. brewed nothing but pale ale and that ale had acquired the name of Bass, could that firm restrain another brewer of the same name from selling porter or stout in bottles with labels simply stating that the liquor was porter or stout manufactured by the second brewer, giving his name and address? I think that the answer must be in the negative, and in my judgment the defendant C. R. Valentine, if he were honestly carrying on the business of selling these meat globules in his own name and on his own account, could not be restrained from using his name in connection with that business. That, however, does not dispose of the case. I have still to inquire whether, in the language of Lindley, M.R., the defendant C. R. Valentine has not done something more than use his own name in such a way as to render him liable to be restrained from carrying on business as he has done. [His lordship considered an attack made by the plaintiffs on the good faith of the said defendant in respect of the signing by him of a declaration as to a foreign trade mark, and added:] "For the purpose of this action I must say that the acts and evidence of a man who permits himself to do what this defendant admitted that he did, cannot be regarded in the same way as those of one whose integrity is beyond suspicion." [After examining the evidence as to the circulars containing "very loose and exaggerated statements as regards C. R. Valentine's connection with extract of meat," as to alleged misrepresentations by the defendants' travellers, his lordship discussed the plaintiffs' contention that the travellers should, without waiting to be asked questions, have offered information as to the difference of the goods.] It seems to me that this would have been what was termed in Jamieson v. Jamieson "extra precaution," such as was there held to be unnecessary, and it would be still less necessary in the present case, where the goods are much more different from those of the plaintiffs. On the whole, although the case has many features of suspicion, I have come to the conclusion that want of good faith on the part of the defendants is not established.

It still remains to inquire whether the defendant company is entitled as against the plaintiffs to make use of the name "Valentine." If the defendant, C. R. Valentine, had himself commenced the business and carried it on under his own name, I think that he would have been entitled to assign to a company formed for the purpose the goodwill of that business and the right to use his name in connection with it, always supposing that all this was done in good faith. The defendant, C. R. Valentine, however, never himself carried on the business of manufacturing and selling these globules. He formed the defendant company, giving it his own name and making over to it a so-called goodwill consisting of the benefit of promises made to him by persons well-disposed towards him and the business proposed to be carried on. Such a goodwill could not be of any substantial value, though it is possible that the right in respect of it might have been enforced in equity upon the principles laid down in Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225, [1896] A. C. 7. Still, C. R. Valentine was the inventor of the globules. He had a certain reputation as a man of business, though not in connection with extract of meat, and he intended that the business of globules should be carried on for his own benefit, though apparently his own resources were not sufficient to enable him to start it. I think that under these circumstances he was entitled, acting in good faith, as I have come to the conclusion that he did, to give his own name to the company which he founded. It is true that that company consisted, and consists to a large extent, of real shareholders who have never been mere trustees of their shares for him. Still, he was and is the largest shareholder, the managing director, and unquestionably the life and soul of the defendant company. I do not think this falls within the principle of such cases as Croft v. Day, where a man having no real interest in a business was introduced into it simply to give it the desired name. In my judgment, therefore, the action fails and must be dismissed.

I have had considerable difficulty as to the proper mode of disposing of the costs of the action. On the one hand the plaintiff fails, and fails on a charge of bad faith against the defendant C. R. Valentine. On the other hand, the acts of that defendant gave reasonable ground for suspicion. The admission which he was compelled to make added substantially to the length and expense of the trial, and in the original label the defendants went to, if not beyond, the extreme verge of their rights. On the whole, I think that the action must be dismissed without costs.

MOXHAM AND OTHERS v. GRANT. (a.)

*Company—Winding up—Misfeasance—Director—Unauthorized payment of capital to shareholders—*Ultra vires act—Order on directors to refund—Right of indemnity from shareholders.

The directors of a shipping company, having received a sum of money under a policy of insurance on one of the company's ships which had become a total loss, distributed the money among the shareholders, who had notice of the facts and consented to the distribution. Subsequently the company was wound up. An order was made in the winding up under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, declaring that the payments to the shareholders were payments in reduction of the capital of the company, and were unlawful, and the directors were ordered to repay the amount to the liquidator.

Held, that the directors were entitled to recover from the shareholders the money paid to them.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (47 W. R. 282, [1899] 1 Q. B. 480) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) affirming the decision of the Swansea County Court judge in favour of the plaintiffs: reported in 47 W. R. 282, [1899] 1 Q. B. 480.

The plaintiffs were the directors of a company called Cory's Steamers (Limited), and the defendant was a shareholder in the company. In February, 1894, The Primrose, a steamer belonging to the company, became a total loss. The Primrose was insured, and the underwriters paid to the company £719 2s. 6d. in respect of the loss. On the 10th of April, 1894, the directors of the company sent the following circular to the shareholders, including the defendant: "We have a sum of money in hand from insurance received on account of the loss of The Primrose. We propose remitting 10s. per share. If you see no objection we will send you £ , being 10s. on your shares, on your sending a receipt on enclosed form, and provided all the shareholders consent. There will be a considerable sum more to receive for insurance of The Primrose." The receipt was as follows: "Received of Cory's Steamers (Limited) the sum of £ , being a reduction of 10s. per share on the shares held by me." The defendant wrote a letter in answer to the circular, in which he said: "I quite agree with the proposition of your letter of the 10th of April, and enclose my receipt for £13, being 10s. on my twenty-six shares." Further payments were made to the shareholders out of the insurance money of The Primrose, the total amount received by the defendant being £35 15s.

On the 29th of December, 1896, a winding-up order was made against the company, and on the 22nd of December, 1897, the liquidator of the company obtained an order under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, declaring that the payments made to the shareholders out of the moneys received in respect of the insurance of The Primrose, amounting in all to £719 2s. 6d., were payments of part of the capital of the company, and were unlawfully and improperly paid in reduction of the capital of the company, and it was further ordered that the directors should pay to the liquidator the sum of £719 2s. 6d. This order was expressly made without prejudice to the right of the directors to be recouped by the shareholders the sums paid to them.

The present action was brought by the directors against the defendant to recover £35 15s. paid to him.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Divisional Court affirmed his decision.

The defendant appealed.

Witt, Q.C., and Poley, for the defendant.—This was a payment of money with full knowledge of the facts, under a mistake of law, by the directors to the shareholders, and cannot be recovered back. The doctrine that a trustee, who pays money to his cestui que trust in breach of trust, can recover the money back, does not apply here, because the directors are not trustees for the shareholders. A company is not a trustee for its shareholders: Salomon v. Salomon & Co., 45 W. R. 193, [1897] A. C. 22; and, therefore, the mere agents or servants of the company cannot be trustees for the shareholders. Even if the directors held this money as trust money for the company, they cannot recover it back from the shareholders in a court of equity, as it was money paid under a bonâ fide mistake of law: Rogers v. Ingham, 25 W. R. 338, 3 Ch. D. 351; In re Sharpe, 40 W. R. 241, at p. 242, [1892] 1 Ch. 154, at p. 166; Lindley on Companies (5th ed.), pp. 389, 390. Holmes v. Newcastle-upon-Tyne Freehold Abattoir Co., 24 W. R. 505, 1 Ch. D. 682, is not in point, because there the shareholder, who was the plaintiff, and who complained of the payment of the company's money to the other shareholders as ultra vires, was no party to the illegal payment, and therefore the rule as to a payment made under a mistake of law not being recoverable did not apply. That distinction was pointed out by this court in Blackburn Building Society v. Cunliffe, Brooks, & Co., 34 W. R. Dig. 25, 29 Ch. D. 902, at p. 910. Nor does the common law principle, that money paid by one person to another at the implied request of a third person can be recovered from that third person, apply to the present case, because this was a voluntary and not a compulsory payment by the directors to the shareholders. That rule is exemplified in Bonner v. Tottenham Building Society, 47 W. R. 161, [1899] 1 Q. B. 161. In accordance with that principle, if an executor pays the residue to the residuary legatee with knowledge of a debt, and he is afterwards obliged to pay the debt, he cannot call upon the residuary legatee to refund: per Cotton, L.J., in Whittaker v. Kershaw, 39 W. R. 22, at p. 24, 45 Ch. D. 320, at p. 325. Even if the obligation of the directors to refund the moneys to the liquidator is to be looked at, which is not admitted, the payment by the directors to the liquidator was not in relief of the shareholders, so as to bring the case within the rule stated in Bonner v. Tottenham Building Society, and therefore cannot be said to have been made at the shareholders' request, inasmuch as the liquidator could not have taken proceedings against the shareholders under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. That section does not make the shareholders liable to the liquidator.

They also referred to Deering v. Winchelsea, 2 Bos. & P. 270; Wye Valley Railway Co. v. Hawes, 29 W. R. 177, 16 Ch. D. 489.

Meager, for the plaintiffs.—It was argued in the court below that the directors and shareholders were joint tort-feasors, and that there was no right of contribution between them. The doctrine that there is no contribution between joint tort-feasors does not apply to a breach of trust committed by the directors and the shareholders, as it is not a case of tort at all: In re Exchange Banking Co., Flitcroft's case, 30 W. R. 695, at p. 697, 21 Ch. D. 519, at p. 527. The right of directors to recover moneys of the company paid to shareholders is recognized in In re National Funds Assurance Co., 27 W. R. 302, 10 Ch. D. 118; In re Alexandra Palace Co., 30 W. R. 771, 21 Ch. D. 149; In re Oxford Building Society, 35 W. R. 116, 35 Ch. D. 502; and Leeds Estate Co. v. Shepherd, 36 W. R. 322, 36 Ch. D. 787; as the order against the directors was in each case made without prejudice to their rights over against the shareholders. In re Sharpe does not affect that question. Secondly, directors are in some cases trustees for the shareholders, and having improperly paid trust money to the cestuis que trust can recover it back: Ferguson v. Wilson, 15 W. R. 80, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 77. The directors in the present case were acting as trustees for the shareholders. Again, the directors were trustees of the money for the company, and the shareholders who received the money knowing that it was part of the capital of the company were constructive trustees, and the rule in equity as to indemnity or contribution between two trustees applied: Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co., 23 W. R. 887, at p. 888, L. R. 20 Eq. 474, at p. 479.

Witt, Q.C., in reply.—The test is not whether the shareholder is a constructive trustee, because he would be equally a constructive trustee if he received the money in ignorance that it was being improperly dealt with. In such a case the shareholder is clearly not liable to refund the money.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by the directors of a company to recover the sum of £35 15s. which they have paid to the defendant as a shareholder, and which they have been compelled to refund to the liquidator of the company under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. Part of the capital of the company was invested in the steamship Primrose. In 1894 the steamship was lost, and the underwriters paid in respect thereof the sum of £719 2s. 6d. to the company. This sum was admittedly part of the capital of the company, as it represented the ship which had been lost. The directors and the shareholders seem to have come to the conclusion that this sum was not wanted as capital, and they agreed to distribute it. The shareholders therefore had notice that they were receiving part of the capital of the company. It was not a case in which the shareholders received money of the company in ignorance that they had no right to receive it. Everything would have been in proper form if an order of the court had been obtained for the reduction of the capital of the company, but no such order was obtained. The company then got into difficulties, and was wound up. The liquidator discovered how the money had been applied. In my opinion he might have taken proceedings against anyone who had, with notice, received any portion of the £719 2s. 6d. As the shorter and more convenient course he took proceedings against the directors who had received the money and distributed it among the shareholders, and recovered the whole sum from them. Thereupon the directors sought to recover from each shareholder the money received by him which they had been compelled to pay to the liquidator. For that purpose they brought an action in the county court against the defendant to recover the sum paid to him, and they recovered judgment, and that judgment was upheld by the Divisional Court.

It is necessary to consider the position of a shareholder who has received money of the company with notice that it forms part of the company's capital. It seems to me that the position is that laid down by Sir George Jessel in Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. The money of the company is a trust fund, and a person taking it from the agents of the company with notice that it is being applied to improper purposes cannot say that he is not a constructive trustee. That being the position of the defendant, I must now see what is the rule in equity as between two trustees who are both guilty of a breach of trust. The rule is now well settled, and I need only refer to a late case upon the subject: Chillingworth v. Chambers, 44 W. R. 388, [1896] 1 Ch. 685, where the subject was fully gone into by Lindley and Kay, L.JJ., and by myself. In that case I said that "as between two trustees who are in pari delicto, the one who has made good a loss occasioned by a breach of trust for which the two are jointly and severally liable may obtain contribution to that loss from the other." The case cited in support of that proposition is Lingard v. Bromley, 1 Ves. & B. 114. In such a case the rule as to there being no contribution between joint tort-feasors does not apply. In the present case the defendant received his share of the £719 2s. 6d. with notice that it formed part of the capital of the company. He thereby became a constructive trustee, and according to the rule in equity he must recoup his co-trustees, who have made good the loss occasioned by the breach of trust, the amount received by him. Upon that ground I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court was right. I also think that the doctrine stated in Bonner v. Tottenham Building Society applies to this case, but it is not necessary to decide it, as I rest my judgment on the ground given above.

I desire to add this, that the passage in Lindley on Companies (5th ed.), pp. 389, 390, which has been relied upon by the defendant, does not apply where, as in this case, the defendant received the money with notice, nor where one person has been compelled by process of law to pay in relief of another.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When the circumstances of the case are understood, it becomes clear that the liquidator of the company could have enforced against each shareholder repayment of the moneys received by him. That he could have enforced repayment against the directors to whom the whole fund had originally passed lies at the root of the matter. Therefore we begin the discussion with these facts. The directors, being the persons who collected and distributed the fund, were liable to the liquidator. The persons to whom they distributed it were also liable to the liquidator, and the directors were compelled to pay to the liquidator the whole sum so distributed. Furthermore, that payment necessarily operated in relief of the liability of the shareholders. Upon these facts—that is, a payment by compulsion by one of a sum for which another was liable to the same person—there arises by implication of law a right in the person so paying to be recouped by the person in whose relief the payment was made. Having got those facts, which entitle the person so paying to indemnity or contribution, what is the answer attempted to be set up? The only possible answer seems to me that these persons are joint tort-feasors, and that, consequently, there is no right of indemnity or contribution. In Betts v. Gibbins, 2 A. & E. 57, at p. 74, Lord Denman, in dealing with the case of Merryweather v. Nixan, 8 T. R. 186, 1 Sm. L. C. (10th ed.), 383, said that that "case seems to me to have been strained beyond what the decision will bear. The present case is an exception to the general rule. The general rule is that between wrongdoers there is neither indemnity nor contribution; the exception is where the act is not clearly illegal in itself." I do not suppose for one moment that those who dealt with this money thought that they were acting illegally. The only illegality was a technical one; the act was ultra vires. It has been held over and over again that the fact that money is paid in breach of trust to a person who receives it, knowing it to be paid in breach of trust, does not constitute those so dealing with the trust money joint tortfeasors. Channell, J., has in the court below dealt with that point and with the line of cases relating to it, and there is also the case of In re Exchange Banking Co., Flitcroft's case, where Bacon, V.C., held that in such a case there is no tort at all.

That disposes of the case, but I will deal with the point whether there is a trust in this matter. The only bearing this has is for the purpose of establishing that the person who received the money received it in such circumstances as made it capable of being recovered back. If the money were paid to the shareholder unearmarked in such a manner that the liquidator could not claim it as money had and received to his use, the chain of consecution out of which the right to indemnity arises would be broken. Unless the payment by the person claiming the indemnity is made in relief of the person against whom the indemnity is claimed, the claim for indemnity is gone. Therefore it must be shown that the liquidator was entitled to sue the shareholder. That is established if the liquidator can follow the money. That is so in the present case, because the shareholder received the money with notice, from which, if he knew his law, he must have known that the directors had no right to pay it to him. The liquidator therefore could follow the money, and the whole chain of consecution is thus established. The payment by the directors to the liquidator was in relief of the existing liability of the shareholders, and it was a payment which the directors were compelled to make. Therefore, both at common law and on the general rules of equity, a right to indemnity is established, and that right is not affected by any question of joint tort-feasors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — I am of the same opinion. In my opinion the doctrine under which one who has made a voluntary payment cannot recover the sum so paid has no sort of application in the present case, for the following reason. The money which was paid by the directors and which is now sought to be recovered from the defendant by those who paid it was not money voluntarily paid, but money paid under compulsion, as pointed out by Collins, L.J. In that state of things primâ facie the doctrine applies which may be shortly stated thus: Where two persons are equally liable to be sued by another, and one of those persons is sued and has to pay, it follows that the person so paying will have a right over against the other person liable, which right over will be measured by the benefit which that other has received. It may sometimes be a right to indemnity, it may sometimes be a right to contribution. In each case the principle is the same. That seems to me to be the doctrine of Bonner v. Tottenham Building Society, a doctrine which is applicable at common law and in equity. Why should not that doctrine apply to the present case? It is said that it does not apply because there is no right of contribution or indemnity between joint tort-feasors. That objection cannot be successfully urged here because the directors who paid and the shareholders who received the money were not joint tort-feasors within the meaning of the rule laid down in Merryweather v. Nixan.

This does not seem to me to be a case in which the parties were guilty of any fraudulent act. The directors merely made a wrongful distribution of the capital of the company among the shareholders in circumstances which gave rise to the legal presumption that they were both aware of the illegality of the act. That does not make it a tort.

Bankruptcy — Property vesting in trustee — Exception of personal earnings limited to what is necessary for support of bankrupt and his wife and family—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

Personal earnings beyond the amount required for this purpose vest in the trustee under section* 44.

Appeal from Wright, J., in bankruptcy.

The debtor, John Roberts, the celebrated billiard player, was adjudicated bankrupt in April, 1898.

On the 5th of October, 1898, an agreement was made between the debtor and the Benzoline Manufacturing Co. (Limited), by which the company agreed to supply the debtor every year with 2,000 billiard balls, he on his part agreeing not to play billiards in public (except in genuine championship matches) with any balls except those made by the company. It was stated that the balls were of the value of about 6s. each.

On the 24th of July, 1899, Wright, J., sitting in bankruptcy, made an order that the debtor should deliver to his trustee all billiard balls, up to the value of £200, which were in his possession on the 1st of May, 1899. It was stated that the balls in the debtor's possession were worth £70 or £80.

The debtor appealed against the order.

Nov. 10.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the judgment of the court. His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded: The trustee claims these billiard balls under section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Mr. Roberts contends that he is entitled to retain them upon the ground that they are his personal earnings, and are therefore excepted from the operation of that section. The alleged exception is not to be found in the Act itself, but is said to be an implied exception based upon a long series of authorities, and well recognized for the last hundred years. On looking into these authorities we are of opinion that they have no application to the present case.

The exception is based upon the case of Chippendall v. Tomlinson, decided in 1785. In that case a solicitor who had become bankrupt brought an action for professional services rendered by him after his bankruptcy. His assignees made no objection, and made no claim to the money which he sought to recover, and it was held that under these circumstances the bankruptcy of the plaintiff was no bar to the action. That was the only point really decided. Lord Mansfield said: "The only question is whether the assignees of a bankrupt are entitled to the profits arising from his personal labour. The assignees cannot let out the bankrupt; they cannot contract for his labour." Attempts have been made to establish on the foundation of these statements the doctrine that whatever a bankrupt earns by his personal labour or ability after the bankruptcy belongs to him. Chippendall v. Tomlinson is not an authority for any such proposition, and both Buller, J., and, according to a note in Douglas, Lord Mansfield also, stated that if a bankrupt acquired a large sum of money or considerable effects these would undoubtedly belong to his assignees. So also said Lord Alvanley in Hesse v. Stevenson, 3 Bos. & P. 565, in which it was held that a patent acquired by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy passed to his assignees. Lord Alvanley's observations on pp. 577-8 appear to us to represent the true doctrine on this subject. It may be that a bankrupt's trustee cannot maintain an action for money earned by the bankrupt since his bankruptcy by his personal exertions if such money is required by him for his support and maintenance: see Williams v. Chambers (the pleadings in which, however, alleged promises to pay to the assignees for work done by the bankrupt). The Bankruptcy Act of 1883, like its predecessors, excepts a bankrupt's tools, and contemplates the acquisition of future property by a bankrupt, and he must live to use his tools and to acquire such property. The present Act, like previous Bankruptcy Acts, must be construed so as to enable him to do this; and the language of section 44, clear and express as it is, must not, therefore, be taken so literally as to deprive the bankrupt of those fruits of his personal exertions which are necessary to enable him to live. But, on the other hand, the necessity is the limit of the exception.

This is in entire accordance with modern decisions: Mercer v. Vans Colina; see In re Graydon, Wadling v. Oliphant, Emden v. Carte, Ex parte Benwell does not conflict with other cases. That case turned entirely on section 53, and is only an authority for the proposition that a prospective order cannot be made impounding the future personal earnings of a bankrupt. Similar observations apply to In re Shine. These cases are no authority for the proposition that property of a bankrupt acquired by his personal exertions since his bankruptcy, and not wanted for his present support, does not belong to his trustee. No such doctrine can be maintained in face of section 44. After bankruptcy, and before his discharge, whatever property a bankrupt acquires belongs to his trustee, save only what is necessary for his support. He may sue for and recover his earnings if his trustee does not interfere; but what he recovers he recovers for the benefit of his creditors, except to the extent necessary to support himself and his wife and family. The exception seems to include them.

In this case we have not to consider the right of the trustee to sue a stranger for money payable to the bankrupt, for the bankrupt has in his own possession the property ordered to be delivered up. Moreover, that property is not wanted for the bankrupt's support; he can, and does, support himself without it. Even if, therefore, the billiard balls can be regarded as obtained by the personal exertions of the bankrupt, the order for their delivery to the trustee would be quite right. This being so it is necessary to consider whether the billiard balls can be properly regarded as personal earnings. They are delivered to the bankrupt under an agreement which imposes no obligation on him to play billiards or otherwise exert himself. All he undertakes to do is not to play in public (except in genuine championship matches) with any billiard balls except those made by the Benzoline Co. The agreement is no doubt based on the assumption that Roberts will play billiards in public; but, after all, its object is to advertise the company's balls; and as Roberts need not play at all, or otherwise exert himself, it is not easy to see how the case can be brought within the exception, even if it were wider than upon examination it turns out to be.

The appeal must be dismissed.

Nor is such a bye-law repugnant to section 23 of the Metropolitan Streets Act*, 1867, which prohibits three or more persons assembling together in a street for the purpose of betting.

White v. Morley, 47 W. R. 583, [1899] 2 Q. B. 34, approved.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal against a decision of Kekewich, J. The real question involved was whether a bye-law of the London County Council, prohibiting street betting, was valid or not. The bye-law in question came into force on the 1st of October, 1898, and it provides that "no person shall frequent and use any street or other public place, on behalf either of himself or of any other person, for the purpose of bookmaking, or betting, or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager with any person, or paying, or receiving, or settling bets." The point was raised in the present case in a peculiar way. The plaintiff claimed the dissolution of a partnership between himself and the defendant, and the taking of the usual accounts. The defence was that the principal business of the partnership, and for the carrying on of which it was formed, consisted of betting transactions in streets and public places within the County of London, and that in the course of that business both the plaintiff and the defendant necessarily frequented and used the said streets and public places for the purpose of betting and of paying and receiving of payments of bets. In these circumstances the defendant submitted that by reason of the bye-law the partnership was illegal, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action. In answer to this the plaintiff contended that the bye-law was invalid.

Kekewich, J., following White v. Morley, 47 W. R. 583, [1899] 2 Q. B. 34, held that the bye-law was valid.

The plaintiff appealed.

Section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which, by section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, is made applicable to county councils, provides that "the council (of a borough) may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough." The bye-law in question purported to be made under these sections.

Stutfield (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the appeal.—This bye-law is too wide. Its application must be limited to cases which are necessary for the good government of the county. I admit that White v. Morley is against me, but that decision is contrary to the following series of cases which go to show that a bye-law cannot be made to regulate moral conduct, under a power to make bye-laws for good government: Calder and Hebble Navigation Co. v. Pilling, 14 M. & W. 74; Macdonald v. Lochrane, 51 J. P. 629; Heap v. Burnley Sanitary Authority, 32 W. R. 661. 12 Q B. D. 617; Johnson v. Mayor of Croydon, 16 Q. B. D. 708, 34 W. R. Dig. 129; Strickland v. Hayes, 44 W. R. 398, [1896] 1 Q. B. 290. This bye-law really creates a new offence, and is bad on that ground. The question of street betting is dealt with by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 22, s. 23, and this bye-law must be held to be repugnant to that: Burnett v. Berry, 44 W. R. 512. [1896] 1 Q. B. 641; and Kruse v. Johnson, 46 W. R. 630, [1898] 2 Q. B. 91.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Cautley, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I do not think this case presents any difficulty at all. I agree with Mr. Stutfield that in considering the validity of any bye-law, we must look to the power which exists to make it. The power here to make the bye-law in question is conferred by the 23rd section of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which says that the council of a borough "may from time to time make such bye-laws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough." Now, the power which is conferred on the borough council is conferred upon the county council by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 16. I need not read that. It simply gives them the same power in their district that the borough council has in theirs. Therefore I come back to the law-giving power which is to be traced to and depends upon the true construction of section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Now I cannot conceive any reason why we should limit that language, why we should not give it full effect. If authority is wanted for so construing that section and similar sections, we have it in the case of Kruse v. Johnson, to which Mr. Stutfield has referred.

Now, when we come to look at that, what is there in the bye-law which can be said to be unreasonable or objectionable, having regard to the very wide power of making bye-laws which is conferred by section 23 of the Act of 1882? It is a bye-law, one of a set made by the London County Council for the good rule and government of the County of London. Under that section they may make any such bye-laws as to them may seem meet for that purpose.

They see meet to make this bye-law about betting. [His lordship read the bye-law, and continued:] Now, the governing and important words there are "frequent and use" and "for the purpose." That does not prevent two people walking down the street from either making a bet or paying one. If they choose to amuse themselves in that way they can do it so far as I can see. But they shall not frequent or use the street for the purpose. That is the bye-law.

Now, it is said there is something unreasonable in that. As regards the authorities the cases of Burnett v. Berry and White v. Morley are in favour of this bye-law, and we are asked to overrule them. Why should we? There is no reason to my mind that can be urged. Mr. Stutfield has done the best he could, but when you come to examine his reasons they are reduced to this, that the decision, which I took part in, of Strickland v. Hayes goes the whole length of his argument. He very ingeniously puts it in this way. He says there is an Act of Parliament here—viz., the Metropolis Streets Act, 1867, which deals with betting in streets, and as Parliament has directed its attention to betting in streets and regulated that in the mode in which Parliament thought best, there ought to be no further bye-law upon it. except one possibly to better carry that out. There is something in that argument, and in the case of Strickland v. Hayes I thought a good deal turned upon it. Although I have not the slightest doubt now, as I had not then, that the bye-law there in question was hopelessly bad, it struck me it was necessary to consider whether it might not be amended, and if amended, whether it would be good; and the reason I came to the conclusion that if amended it would be bad was this, that there it did deal precisely with a matter with which Parliament had dealt in an Act of Parliament addressed to the very same thing, and I gave my decision on that reason so far as the amended bye-law went.

But the difference between that case and this is obvious enough to my mind. In inserting section 23 in the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, one sees what Parliament was aiming at. It was not aiming at betting at all. It was aiming at street traffic. The whole object of the Act is to regulate the traffic in the metropolis, that is the whole purpose of the Act. It is very true that the Legislature has put in section 23, and with reference to the traffic has said, "that three people assembling for betting shall be deemed to be obstructing the street." That is the only point that Mr. Stutfield has. I decline to stretch or extend the case of Strickland v. Hayes, which I think was perfectly right, to the length of holding that because there is a regulation of that kind in a traffic Act, therefore the county council have no power to regulate the streets with reference to another matter—viz., betting without obstruction. It strikes me there is nothing in the point at all; and taking the whole case it appears to me that it would be going a great deal too far to say that this is not and cannot reasonably be construed as a bye-law for the good rule and government of the borough. The county council have ample power to say that in their opinion it is, and unless there is some good reason to the contrary, unless there is some clear excess of the jurisdiction, we ought rather to uphold than to invalidate the bye-law. I think the bye-law is perfectly good and the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

JEUNE, P.—I agree, though I confess I thought this matter was entirely governed by several decisions of late years and that the ghost of these objections to bye-laws was by this time fairly laid. We have had to-day put very forcibly, not for the first time, an objection of the kind which has been dealt with over and over again.

In the first place it is said that this bye-law is too wide, or rather, deals with matters outside the powers of the county council, because their powers are limited to making bye-laws for the good rule and government of the borough, and this is a matter which goes outside the good rule and government of the borough, a matter which it is suggested rather deals with the morals of the community than the actual management and government of the borough. I do not feel certain that even in the narrower sense this bye-law is not perfectly justifiable (quite apart from any question of the morality of the inhabitants or the respectability of the place) on the ground that it deals with matters which may cause annoyance or obstruction; but for myself I confess I should not shrink from saying that I cannot take any such limited view of the power of the county council.

A case like that of Calder v. Hebble Navigation Co. appears to me to be wholly different. I quite agree a navigation company has powers given it to make bye-laws for the good management of their canal, that is, matters which relate to the supply of water and so forth, and which do not relate to the question of the morality or good behaviour of the persons who use it. That is outside their functions. That is a matter of the general law and not a matter for the canal company, whose business it is to keep their canal going and not to provide for the good behaviour or morals of the persons who use it, or matters of that kind. In the case of a muncipality dealing with the good order of their streets the power to make bye-laws appears to me to go far beyond that. I should hesitate long before I said that a municipality had not a perfect right, and indeed a duty, to deal with matters which affect the respectability and moral conduct of the persons in their streets—of course in so far as they are matters of public interest and affecting persons who use the streets.

Then it is said that Parliament has already dealt with this matter and dealt with it in such a way that the bye-laws ought not to deal with it again. I quite agree if you had a case of difference between the bye-laws and the Act—I mean if a bye-law decided something to be legal which the public law declared to be illegal, or vice versâ—you might well say that that bye-law had no right to set itself up against an Act of Parliament in that sense; but there is nothing of that kind in this instance. It is an Act of Parliament, as the Master of the Rolls has just pointed out, dealing with traffic regulation, which provides that no more than three persons shall assemble together for betting in a street so as to cause obstruction. That is a provision intended solely for the purpose of keeping the streets clear and nothing else.

It may be that the bye-law goes beyond that, but I cannot see myself any objection to the bye-law even if it does go somewhat beyond an Act of Parliament. An Act of Parliament speaking for the whole country, renders certain things illegal. It does not at all follow that a bye-law, speaking for a particular locality, may not make some more stringent regulations with the same object. That appears to me to be perfectly within the competency of the borough. On the contrary, where you find an Act of Parliament has made provision forbidding certain Acts to be done in certain places, it seems to me to be perfectly consistent with that, that a municipality with regard to their particular locality should go somewhat beyond the Act of Parliament, not affecting the spirit, but carrying out its spirit and providing regulations somewhat wider than those found in the Act of Parliament. That is what has happened in this case, because the Act of Parliament has forbidden the assembling together of people in the streets for the purposes of betting, while the municipality, acting in the same spirit as that regulation but no doubt going somewhat further, have provided that persons shall not frequent or use the public streets for the purposes of betting or matters connected with betting.

That is a matter which has been dealt with by more than one authority, but I refer especially on these points to the decision of Darling, J., in White v. Morley, and I desire only to express my acquiescence in his opinion on this point without occupying time by reading it.

Now, Mr. Stutfield has fallen back on an objection which I think also has been disposed of by previous decisions. He has said that the bye-law is too wide, unless it contains some words in effect saying that a nuisance or annoyance is caused by the particular act prohibited. Now that was exactly the matter which had to be dealt with in the case of Kruse v. Johnson. That was a case of music, and the whole objection in that case was that there were no such limiting words as Mr. Stutfield insisted there must be. It was said that you could not by a bye-law prohibit music altogether, even if some persons took objection, and therefore you must have some such words as, "if a nuisance or annoyance is caused thereby." For my own part it seemed to me sufficient in that case to say that the fact that it was required that persons should complain, was evidence that to that person, at any rate, annoyance would be caused. But I might have gone further, and I am not sure that I did not go further, for I find I said: "It is never necessary to give evidence of actual annoyance. It is enough if the circumstances render annoyance certain or even probable." Now, I desire to repeat that language. I will not quote the authorities which I cited then and which appear to me to bear out that rule, but, dealing with this case, it appears to me sufficient to say that to consider that if persons assemble in a street for betting it is certain or probable that annoyance will be caused is a reasonable view to be taken. And it is not unreasonable for a municipality to pass a bye-law forbidding public betting in the streets without any provision that actual annoyance should be caused; for this reason, that the thing in itself is such that it is highly probable—nay, almost certain, that annoyance will be caused. That is sufficient to justify a bye-law which prohibits a thing from which annoyance is very probable and almost certain to follow. For these reasons I am of opinion that the previous authorities, Burnett v. Berry and White v. Morley, were cases which were quite rightly decided and decided for the right reasons. I think, therefore, Kekewich, J., was perfectly right in not only following those cases, but in expressing approval of them.

ROMER, L.J.—Under the Act in question I think that a local authority may make a bye-law to prevent its public streets or places from being habitually used, not in the ordinary way for the purpose of passing to and fro, but for the purpose of carrying out transactions which, though they may not be illegal in themselves, tend against the morality of the locality and the welfare of its inhabitants, and on this ground alone I think the London County Council was entitled to make a reasonable bye-law preventing the public streets or places under its control from being frequented or used for the purpose of carrying on or carrying out betting transactions. And further, I think that the particular bye-law in question was not too wide or unreasonable in its terms, and certainly not repugnant to section 23 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867. I therefore agree in thinking that this appeal should be dismissed.

A married woman married before 1882, was, as administratrix of a deceased intestate, ordered to pay into court a sum forming part of the estate. In default a motion was made for leave to issue a writ of attachment against her.

Held, that, in the absence of proof of a breach of trust or devastavit, an order for payment by the defendant out of her separate estate would not be appropriate and that the order for the issue of the writ of attachment ought to go.

Motion for attachment.

In this action the defendant, Agnes Nicholas, a married woman, administratrix of the estate of an intestate, had been by two orders of the court, dated the 8th of May and the 10th of July, 1899, directed to deliver an account of the personal estate which had come into her hands, or, by her order or for her use, into the hands of others. An account having been at last delivered, the defendant, by a further order, dated the 10th of August, was ordered within four days of service to pay into court the sum of £277 13s. 7d. in respect of the account.

The order was served on the 23rd of August; payment had not been made by the 5th of September; notice of motion to attach the defendant was dated the 6th of September.

G. Henderson, in support of the motion, submitted that the defendant could be attached, having been married before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (Otway v. Wing, 12 Sim. 90); Debtors' Act, 1869, s. 4, sub-section 3, expressly exempting the abolition of imprisonment for debt where "default is made by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum of money in his possession or under his control."

Pemberton v. MacGill, 4 W. R. 1, 25 L. J. Ch. 49, was also referred to.

H. L. Fraser, for the defendant, resisted the motion on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to commit the defendant, being a married woman and administratrix, on a devastavit: Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120; Married Women's Property Act, 1882, ss. 13, 24. It was agreed to dispose of the case on the hearing of the motion as if the defendant had given notice of motion to vary or discharge the order of the 10th of August, 1899.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said that by ord. 42, rr. 4 and 24 of the R. S. C. of 1883 an order for payment of money into court might be enforced by writ of sequestration or, in cases in which attachment was authorized by law, by attachment. As was pointed out by Chitty J., in In re Greer, 43 W. R. 547, [1895] 2 Ch. 217, attachment there meant attachment of the person. By virtue of the third exception contained in section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, such attachment was authorized by law in the case of default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control. If the defendant were not a married woman there would clearly be jurisdiction to order the issue of the writ. What was decided in Scott v. Morley was that there was no power under section 5 of the Debtors Act to commit to prison a married woman for her default in paying a sum for which judgment had been recovered against her in a court of law, and which under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 2, was payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise. His lordship, after referring to the form of judgment as settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley, said that that decision plainly did not govern the present case; but it was necessary to consider the reasons on which it was based, and to ascertain how far they applied. Shortly, the ratio decidendi appeared to be this: Section 1, sub-section 2, of the Act conferred on a married woman the capacity of entering into and rendering herself liable on any contract in respect of and to the extent of her separate estate, and of suing and being sued either in contract or tort as if she were a feme sole, but the damages and costs recovered against her in any action or proceeding against her were to be payable out of her separate estate and not otherwise; and this enactment (in the words of Bowen, L.J.) created only a proprietary, and not a personal liability. On the other hand, section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, only authorized a committal where there was a "debt due from" the defendant; and a debt payable out of the separate property of a married woman was not a debt due from her. The order in the present case was not an order for payment of a sum to a person but for payment of a sum into court. The distinction between the two was pointed out and explained in In re Greer. The present order did not create a debt, and the provisions of section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, had no application. The material sections of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, were section 1, sub-section 2 (which was dealt with in Scott v. Morley), and sections 18 and 24. These enactments introduced very considerable changes in the law. They enabled a married woman to accept the office of a trustee, executrix, or administratrix without the consent of her husband, which she could not previously do; they made her separate estate liable for her breaches of trust and devastavits, which it previously was not (Wainford v. Heyl, 23 W. R. 848, 20 L. R. Eq. 321), and they relieved her husband from liability and from being sued in respect of her acts. If the object of the order of the 10th of August, 1899, was to compel the defendant to make good a loss occasioned by some act of hers amounting to a devastavit or breach of trust, then much of the reasoning in Scott v. Morley as to the nature of the liability might apply to the case before him, and the order might have been held wrong in form and proper to be discharged or varied so as to make it accord with the form settled by the court in Scott v. Morley. His lordship thought however that such was not the object of the order. So far as appeared from the evidence on which the order was made, no breach of trust or devastavit had been committed, nor any liability by reason thereof incurred by the defendant. What did appear was that the defendant had in her hands a sum of money forming part of the intestate's estate. That sum of money ought not to have been mixed up with the defendant's separate estate, but ought, if the defendant had performed her duty, to be standing to a separate account in her name as administratrix with some bank; and the object of that order was to get that sum, for greater security, transferred from the bank into court. It seemed to his lordship that an order for payment of the sum by the defendant out of her separate estate would not be appropriate to such a state of facts and that the order was properly made in the present form. That being so the case fell within the third exception in section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869; and an order for attachment might be made, if there was jurisdiction to make such an order previously to the passing of that Act. Upon that, authority was very scanty; for, previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the husband was liable and orders would be naturally sought for and made against him, and not against the wife. The cases of Bell v. Hyde, Prec. in Ch. 328, and Otway v. Wing, appeared to show that attachment might in a proper case issue against a married woman; so far as at present appeared, this seemed to be a proper case. The provisions, however, of the Debtors Act, 1878, must be taken into consideration. Upon the motion for the attachment, an affidavit had been made by the defendant's present solicitor to the effect that she had applied the sum appearing by the account to be in her hands, or part of it, in payment of the intestate's debts or liabilities, or otherwise improperly. The affidavit, however, was insufficient to enable his lordship to exercise the discretion which was vested in him under the Act of 1878, and it contained no explanation as to how the balance, if any, of the fund in the lady's hands had been disposed of. His lordship was quite unable to understand why a further affidavit had not been made, and so he was willing to believe that it might be due to the illness of the defendant, and under the circumstances it seemed to him that the order for the issue of the writ ought to go, but that it ought to lie in the office for a fortnight or three weeks to enable the defendant to make a proper affidavit showing how the funds had been actually dealt with. To secure further discussion of this important matter, if necessary, his lordship desired to add that if it were made to appear that a breach of trust or devastavit had been committed, so that the case fell within the terms of section 1, sub-section 2, and section 24 of the Married Women's Property Act, he should as at present advised feel great difficulty in allowing the writ to go.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SILKSTONE AND HAIGH MOOR COAL CO. (LIMITED) v. EDEY AND OTHERS. (a.)

Company—Sale set aside—Interest on rents and profits—Breach of trust—Sale by trustee to himself—Liability of trustee.

Where the sale of an undertaking of a company effected by its liquidator, nominally to another company, but really to himself, had been set aside on the ground of fraud, and the re-transfer of the undertaking to the original company had been ordered,

Held, that the liquidator, being in a fiduciary capacity, should repay the rents and profits which had accrued, but that he was not to be charged with interest on the same.

Motion to vary proposed minutes.

In this action the court had declared that a sale of the undertaking of the plaintiff company by its liquidator, the defendant Edey, nominally to the defendant company, but really to himself, ought to be set aside on the ground of fraud. It had been decreed that the colliery and a certain number of leases and depôts in London and elsewhere should be re-transferred by the defendants to the plaintiffs. It was proved at the trial that while the defendants were carrying on the business, they created certain incumbrances upon not only the property which they had originally acquired from the plaintiff company, but also upon certain other properties subsequently acquired, which by the decree went back to the plaintiffs as accretions to the original property. The order as to accounts and inquiries contained (inter alia) the words "an account of the profits made and other benefits, if any, received."

Jenkins, Q.C. (Rowden, Q.C., with him), for the defendant Edey.—The defendants ought not to be charged with interest at 4 per cent. on rents and profits, as proposed in the minutes. Moreover, the words "and other . . . received" ought to be struck out, as the court intended to substitute therefor a special inquiry directed "at the plaintiff's request and risk, and without prejudice to any question." There is analogy in an action for rescission of contract between vendor and purchaser: see precedent in 3 Seton, p. 1929, also Plowright v. Lambert, 52 L. T. 646 (in which Field, J., appears to have been taking Chancery actions), where a plaintiff gets capital back and he elects to take defendant's profits, then the profits are the interest, and there is no precedent for the addition of interest to sums due. The remedy of a cestui que trust is given by Romilly, M.R., in Jones v. Foxall, 15 Beav. 388. [STIRLING, J.—Supposing Edey has put in his pocket £2,000, being profits of this concern, and has had them in his pocket ever since, and had the benefit of this sum, why is not he to account for that benefit?] He is accounting for it; the money he has put in his pocket is part of his profits, but you cannot go on following his profits.

Gatey (Warmington, Q.C., with him), for the defendant company, to same effect.

Upjohn, Q.C. (Norton with him), for the plaintiff company.—It is immaterial whether the defendant was technically a trustee or whether he was in a fiduciary capacity. I am getting the property back on the footing that the profits were my profits all along; and where a person in a fiduciary position makes a secret profit, he is to be charged with interest thereon, at least simple interest: 3 Seton,

The shortest and least expensive plan would be to say that where profits were made or moneys taken out of the concern and applied not for the purposes of any businesses that the plaintiff company is taking over, then simple interest at the low rate of 4 per cent. should be allowed.

STIRLING, J.—The question on which I reserved my judgment was this, whether the defendants are to be charged with interest upon profits and rents received by them and withdrawn by them from the business of the defendant company. As the minutes stand, interest is proposed to be charged on all rents and profits received by the defendants; but it was properly admitted that that went too far, because it is clear that large amounts of rents and profits have been retained in the business of the company, and of these the plaintiff will get the benefit in the ordinary way, and the question which I have to decide is limited to that which I have stated. Now, the plaintiffs rely on the decisions which show that a trustee who makes a secret profit is charged with interest thereon: see Seton, vol. 3, pp. 1939-1940, and Imperial Mercantile Credit Association v. Coleman. These decisions are in strict accordance with the principle laid down in Attorney-General v. Alford and Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 530, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 453. The trustee has retained in his own hands part of the trust property, and is liable to be charged with the interest he actually received or that which the court is entitled to say that he ought to have received. The present case, however, is not precisely of that character; it is one in which the point to be considered is what are the proper terms on which a sale, improperly made by a liquidator, standing therefore in a fiduciary relation to the plaintiffs, ought to be set aside. The law is thus stated in the successive editions (and I have referred to several dating from the second) of Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), pp. 558-559, citing the Irish case of Macartney v. Blackwood, 1 Ridg. Lapp. & Sch. 602: "The cestui que trust, if he chooses it, may have the specific estate reconveyed to him by the trustee, or, where the trustee has sold it with notice, by the party who purchased, the cestui que trust on the one hand repaying the price at which the trustee bought, with interest at 4 per cent., and the trustee or purchaser on the other accounting for the profits of the estate, but not with interest, and if he was in actual possession, being charged with an occupation rent." [After reading from the facts and judgment in the case thus cited, his lordship continued:] The judgment in Macartney v. Blackwood is based on the fact that the rents and profits were received not by the trustee, but by the purchaser. His title was bad as against the plaintiff, but he did not himself stand in a fiduciary relation to the plaintiff, and it might be thought that a trustee who received rents and profits ought to be charged with interest on them. It was pointed out, however, that it did not appear to have been the practice to charge such interest, and I was referred to various cases in which the reports show or appear to show that interest had not been charged. I have examined the original records in some of these cases, particularly those in Watson (or Whatton) v. Toone (6 Madd. 153; also see 5 Madd. 54) and in Tate v. Williamson (14 W. R. 449, L. R. 1 Eq. 528, the decree in which is also given in Seton, vol 3, p. 1929), and these bear out the contention of the defendants' counsel. I have myself failed to find any case in which a trustee has been clearly and explicitly charged with interest on rents upon a sale to him being set aside. In the absence of any express authority on the point and having regard to the statement which has been made in Lewin on Trusts for so long a period, I must take it that the settled practice of the court is as stated by that learned author, and the minutes must be altered accordingly.

In re WEST.
GEORGE v. GROSE. (a.)

Will — Construction — Trust for sale — Trustees' indemnity and reimbursement clause — Unexhausted residue—Resulting trust.

A gift of property to trustees on trust for sale, followed by the declaration of a particular trust which does not exhaust the whole of the property thus given, will be treated as creating a primary general trust of the whole of such property, so that there will be a resulting trust of the unexhausted residue in favour of the testator's heir and next-of-kin. The insertion of a trustee's indemnity and reimbursement clause will further strengthen the conclusion thus drawn from the presence of the trust for sale.

Further consideration.

This was the further consideration of an action for the administration of the estate of Elizabeth Ann West, who died on the 28th of February, 1896. By her will, dated the 15th of February, 1887, Elizabeth Ann West devised and bequeathed unto W. R. Grose, J. George, R. Pengelley, and R. G. Pollard, all her moneys and securities for money, plate, linen, china, household goods, and furniture, and also her freehold property consisting of her farms called Pellingallow and Rose in the Vale in the parish of St. Kew, and Hendra Wether in the parish of Minster, upon trust that, as soon as conveniently might be after her decease, they should sell the same, either together or in parcels, and either by public auction or private contract, with full power to buy in and to rescind any contract for sale and to resell without being responsible for any loss occasioned thereby, and to do and execute all such acts and assurances for effectuating any such sale as they should think fit. And the testatrix declared that the said W. R. Grose, J. George, R. Pengelley, and R. G. Pollard should, out of the moneys to arise from any such sale, pay her funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and certain specific legacies therein more particularly mentioned; and the testatrix further declared that the trustees for the time being of her will should be chargeable only with such moneys as they respectively should actually receive, and should not be answerable for any moneys they might not receive. And that the trustees might reimburse themselves out of the moneys that should come into their hands under the trusts aforesaid, for all expenses which should be incurred in or about the aforesaid trusts. And the testatrix appointed the said W. R. Grose, J. George, R. Pengelley, and R. G. Pollard executors of her will.

It appeared from the evidence that after the sale of the property devised and bequeathed to the trustees and executors, and after payment by them, out of the proceeds of the said sale, of the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts of the testatrix, and the various legacies in the said will, there remained in the hands of the executors and trustees a certain unexhausted residue. The question now arose on further consideration whether, in the events which had happened, there was a resulting trust of the said residue in favour of the co-heirs and next-of-kin of the testatrix, or whether the trustees were entitled to retain it beneficially.

Warrington, Q.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the trustees—There is here no resulting trust, and the trustees are entitled beneficially to the residue: Croome v. Croome, 59 L. T. Rep. 582, per Cotton, L.J., at p. 584; Williams v. Roberts, 6 W. R. 33, 27 L. J. Ch. 177, 4 Jur. N. S. 18. In these cases, it is true, there was no trust for sale; but here the trust for sale is mere machinery for carrying out the particular trusts imposed on the plaintiffs by the terms of the will. When they have carried out those particular trusts they are entitled to retain the residue for their own benefit. It will probably be said that the last words of the will show an intention that the trustees are not to take beneficially. Precisely the same words occurred however in Pratt v. Sladden, 14 Ves. 198, and were there held not to disentitle the trustees.

J. G. Wood, for the two co-heirs of E. A. West.—There is clearly a resulting trust in favour of the heir and next-of-kin. Pratt v. Sladden was decided under the old law prior to statute 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 40. Its force is destroyed by the judgment in Williams v. Roberts, as reported in 4 Jur. N. S. 18. [KEKEWICH, J.—I agree.] As to Croome v. Croome and Williams v. Roberts, they enable us to classify cases of this kind under two heads: (1) Cases in which a gift is made to a donee, charged with the payment, or conditionally on the payment, of part of it to a third person; (2) gifts in which a trust is declared of the whole estate, though a part of the estate is left unexhausted by the subsequent declaration of particular trusts. Croome v. Croome is a good illustration of the first class; this case of the second. In Croome v. Croome no trust was declared of the whole property—there was an out-and-out absolute gift, conditioned, as to part, by a trust. All the Lords Justices relied on words which are absent here. Here, on the contrary, we have a general devise of the whole property on trust to convert. To say that that is mere machinery does not get rid of the difficulty. It is a necessary part of the will. An absolute owner, subject to a charge, would need no machinery. He could sell without it. As to "thereout" in Croome v. Croome, the words "out of the proceeds" here, are used in a different collocation.

W. T. Lawrance and H. C. Davenport, for two of the next-of-kin.—The law is summarized in the fifth edition of Jarman on Wills, vol. 1, p. 530: "Indeed, where the property is devised in trust to be sold, the point is so clear against the trustees, that a claim by them is seldom advanced." This principle was illustrated in the case of executors in Travers v. Travers, L. R. 14 Eq. 275, 21 W. R. Dig. 286.

E. Symonds, for three others of the next-of-kin.

Mark Romer and Stock, for other persons interested.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—Lord Cairns has pointed out in Williams v. Arkle, 24 W. R. 215, 7 H. L. Cas. 606, that in cases like this the statute 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 40, has no effect at all.

KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty in coming to a decision here is clearly a difficulty of construction. The difficulty arises in this way. The testatrix, in this case, has given to her trustees certain real and personal property; but the whole of this property has not been exhausted by the trusts with respect to it that are subsequently declared. The question then arises: What is to be done with the unexhausted residue? Now it is impossible for me to say that because the property is given to these persons as trustees, they are therefore necessarily precluded from taking any beneficial interest in it. To say that, would be contrary to all experience of the language of wills and to all the decided cases. Still, a gift in trust raises a presumption on the face of it that those to whom it is given are intended to take it as trustees only. It is not uncommon, on the other hand, for a gift to be given by a testator, charged with the payment, or conditionally on the payment, of a certain part of it, to some third person. Whether, however, the payment of a certain part of a gift is to take effect as a trust, or a charge, or a condition, is really immaterial, provided that the donor has made quite clear whether the donee is, or is not intended, to take himself some beneficial interest. And in order to determine the latter question it is clear that we must look for some principle of construction. Is there any such principle? Now Croome v. Croome has been treated as the latest application of the decision in King v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 277. In Croome v. Croome, however, the Lords Justices have laid down what they consider to be the rule in language of their own. I do not now propose to read their judgments at length; but I wish to be taken as having read them. The rule that they embody is simple and intelligible, and is conveniently summarized in the pithy statement of Stuart, V.C., in Williams v. Roberts, as reported in the Law Journal, "The language of the will cannot, I think, be construed in any other way than as making her (the testator's devisee) a trustee of that portion of the property only which is given to the legatees other than herself." There we have the pith of the whole matter. Is this will to be construed as making the devisees trustees of that portion only of the property given them which is to be expended in payment of legacies, debts, and testamentary expenses; or is it to be construed as making them trustees of the property as a whole? Let us look at the wording of the will. First we have a general devise and bequest of certain freehold and personal properties to certain persons upon trust. I say nothing as to those words being in themselves conclusive. I think, on the contrary, I might easily find those words, and yet feel myself bound to hold that the trustees were still intended to take some beneficial interest. But what is the nature of the trust thus created? It is a trust for sale. Mr. Warrington argues that such trust for sale is merely a matter of machinery. But surely that machinery would be quite unnecessary if the property had been intended to be given to the donees, in the first instance, as their own property. A beneficial owner stands in no need of machinery to enable him to sell. It seems to me that, in construing this will, we cannot afford to put aside this trust for sale in the manner suggested. It seems to me, on the contrary, that this trust for sale is a strong indication of intention—of intention that the whole of the property is to be given in the first instance to the trustees as trustees only. There is, moreover, a minor matter which points in the same direction. The will says that the trustees are to "be chargeable only with such moneys as they respectively shall actually receive, and shall not be answerable for any moneys they may not receive. And that the trustees may reimburse themselves out of the moneys that shall come to their hands under the trusts aforesaid all expenses to be incurred in or about the aforesaid trusts." That clause, from the trustees' point of view, would hardly, I think, be necessary unless the testatrix contemplated the possibility of the property given by her to the trustees not being large enough to pay off her legacies, debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses. I thought at first that the observation in Pratt v. Sladden 14 Ves. (at p. 200) might perhaps be useful here. "But little reliance," says Grant, M.R., "is to be placed upon clauses in a will, which are contended only to be unnecessary. So many unnecessary directions ordinarily find their way into wills, even those which are not inartificially drawn, that it would be too much to infer direct and clear intention from the use of them in any given case." But I do not think, after all, that that observation is much use here. It seems to me that the trust for sale and the trustees' indemnity clause must here be read together, and I think that they show that the testatrix was contemplating a trust of the whole of her property. I repeat that this is a case only of the construction of a particular will, and I think its true construction brings it, not into the class of cases such as Croome v. Croome, where part only of the property devised is devised upon trust, but into that class of cases where the trust is co-extensive with the whole of the property devised.

Practice—Partition action—Claim for sale by infant as sole plaintiff—Defendants interested in moiety desiring a sale—Sale directed if parties other than infant found entitled to moiety—Conversion—Partition Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 17), s. 6.

An infant's share in realty will not be converted by a sale of such interest in a partition action in which the infant was plaintiff, where the judgment directed a sale, if (as was found to be the fact) the defendants were entitled to a moiety, although the infant has in his pleadings requested a sale; the form of the judgment precluding the view that the sale was made at the request of the infant.

Summons.

The object in this summons was to determine whether the interest of an infant who had died before attaining majority in certain hereditaments sold in a partition action, in which the infant was the plaintiff, had been converted or remained realty. The facts of the case were as follows:—The infant was absolutely entitled to two-sixths of the hereditaments and to a further one-sixth subject to an estate by the curtesy, vested in one of the defendants. The remaining defendants were interested in the remaining three-sixths. The writ and statement of claim asked for a sale, or in the alternative, partition. In the statement of claim it was stated that it would be for the benefit of the parties interested to have a sale instead of partition. The defendants in their pleadings admitted that a sale would be beneficial for them. The judgment—after stating that the plaintiffs and defendants to the action, who together claimed to be absolutely entitled to the entirety of the said hereditaments, by their counsel requested a sale—directed the usual inquiry as to who were the parties interested in the hereditaments and premises, for what estates and interests and in what shares and proportions, and whether they were parties to the action; and in case it should be certified that all persons interested were parties to the action, and that the defendants were interested to the extent of one moiety or upwards in the said hereditaments, a sale thereof was ordered. But in case it should be certified that any of the persons interested were not parties, or that the defendants were not interested to the extent of a moiety or upwards in the hereditaments, there was liberty to apply in chambers for a sale. The defendants were found by the certificate to be entitled to the extent of one moiety, and the hereditaments were sold.

Rowden, Q.C., and W. M. Cann, for the plaintiff.—The Partition Act, 1876, s. 6, allows an infant to request a sale, and in this case a sale was requested by the infant's counsel. Therefore a conversion was effected: Rimington v. Hartley, 29 W. R. 42, 14 Ch. D. 630; Wallace v. Greenwood, 16 Ch. D. 362, 29 W. R. Dig. 148. It was quite sufficient in this case that counsel consented on behalf of the infant. In fact this is the only way in which an infant's consent is obtainable. A married woman can consent in another way, but an infant cannot.

Mulligan, Q.C., and Charlton Hawkins, for the defendant.—Foster v. Foster, 24 W. R. 185, 1 Ch. D. 588, a case under sections 23-25 of the Partition Act, 1868, is still an authority against conversion. The broad principle on which the court acts in such a case is shown in Re Barker, 29 W. R. 873, 17 Ch. D. 241, and that case at least shows that conversion cannot be effected by anyone in the position of a next friend. Wallace v. Greenwood was before the court in Re Barker. In the present case the order was carefully worded and there is nothing on the face of it to show that the infant consented: Davis v. Ingram, 45 W. R. 459, [1897] 1 Ch. 477.

They also referred to Mordaunt v. Benwell, 30 W. R. 227, 19 Ch. D. 302.

Rowden, Q.C., in reply.—In Re Barker there was no request for sale. In the present case it is difficult to see how the infant could have consented more fully than he did by his next friend.

Howard v. Jalland, [1891] W. N. 210 was also referred to.

BYRNE, J.—Two questions were argued before me, the broader one being, whether or not a sale ordered by the Court under the provisions of the Partition Acts of 1868 and 1876 upon a request for sale made on the part of an infant by his next friend effects such a conversion of his real estate as to be free from an equity for reconversion on the part of the heir of such infant in the event of his dying under the age of 21 years. It is clear that but for the 6th section in the Act of 1876 such an equity would exist: see Foster v. Foster; and I doubt whether Sir George Jessel, in the case of Wallace v. Greenwood, meant to lay down that such an equity for reconversion on the part of the heir would be lost simply by reason of the sale having been made at the request of the infant, such request for sale having been made under a special statute involving statutory incidents, including a provision for the reinvestment of the proceeds of sale in real estate, until such time as the infant, being of full age, could ask for payment as to a person absolutely entitled, as in this case. Howard v. Jalland has been referred to. As I have been furnished with office copies of the judgment and orders made in that case, I may state that it appears there that an infant by his next friend was one of several plaintiffs; that the judgment was prepared as follows: "And the plaintiffs and defendants, who claim to be interested in a moiety of the hereditaments in the statement of claim mentioned requesting a sale thereof and a distribution of the proceeds thereof instead of a division of the said hereditaments between or among them." And Kekewich, J., there said that he could not hold that the mere request for sale of counsel or solicitors for an infant operated as an election by an infant to take as personality. This case appears to me to be an authority for saying that when an infant by his next friend is one of several plaintiffs by counsel requesting a sale, and a sale is ordered upon such request, the proceeds of the infant's share ought to be ear-marked as real estate. In the present case, however, it does not appear to me to be necessary to decide whether this case is reconcilable with Wallace v. Greenwood. I have to deal with a special form of judgment, which in my opinion precludes the view that the court acted upon the request of the infant in directing the sale which was actually carried out. In the present case the action was brought by an infant as sole plaintiff by his next friends, and the writ and statement of claim asked for the sale of the real estate, to one moiety of which the infant plaintiff was absolutely entitled subject, to a tenancy, by the courtesy subsisting in one of the defendants. The defendants were between them entitled to the other moiety. [His lordship referred to the judgment and certificate, and continued:] The effect of the judgment was to leave to the defendants the right to demand a sale, if they were entitled to a moiety. It cannot therefore be said that the hereditaments were sold on the request of the infant. I therefore hold that there is no conversion of the infant's share; but that it remains realty.

Partition — Practice — Form of judgment—Permanent improvements—Allowance.

A tenant in common, claiming partition, is entitled whether charged with occupation rent or not, to have in the judgment for partition an inquiry as to expenditure properly made in permanent improvements to the property, during the co-ownership, and the inquiry should be reciprocal.

Action.

This action was brought by the plaintiff Anne Jane Kenrick against the defendants as trustees of a settlement dated the 22nd of September, 1847, made on the marriage of Miss Harriet Chamberlaine and the Rev. Wm. Hy. Pook, for partition of the landed estates which formerly belonged to a Mr. George Chamberlaine, and which, on his death on the 20th of April, 1868, passed to the above-named Anne Jane Kenrick and the above-named Harriet Chamberlaine as his co-heiresses at law, he dying intestate.

Harriet Chamberlaine's moiety of the property was, by a deed dated the 6th of May, 1878, settled, pursuant to a covenant as to after-acquired property contained in the said marriage settlement, upon trust for herself for life, with remainder to her husband for life, with remainder to their children.

In the year 1883 an informal division of the property in question was made between the plaintiff and Harriet Chamberlaine, and an agreement embodying the terms of this division was signed by them, and the rents and profits had ever since been divided and enjoyed accordingly, but it was admitted at the hearing that this agreement did not bind the defendants, and that the case was not affected by its terms.

Minutes of judgment had been prepared, but a question arose as to whether the plaintiff, who claimed to have expended large sums on permanent improvements, and to have thereby increased the value of the property to be partitioned, was entitled to have an inquiry inserted as to expenditure on improvements. She had resided on part of the property, and had not been charged with anything by way of occupation rent, but it was contended that she was nevertheless entitled to have in the judgment an inquiry to the following effect—namely, an inquiry whether any and which of the persons interested in the said real estates and hereditaments have or has with the sanction and consent of the other persons entitled or interested in the said real estates and hereditaments properly laid out and expended any and what sums of money in substantial repairs or lasting improvements upon the said real estates and hereditaments or any part thereof.

Eve, Q.C., and E. S. Ford, for the plaintiff.—The question is, to what extent is a tenant in common claiming partition entitled to have an inquiry as to permanent improvements?

They cited In re Jones, Farrington v. Forrester, [1893] 2 Ch. 461, 41 W. R. Dig. 143; In re Cook's Mortgage, Lawledge v. Tyndall, 44 W. R. 646; and Williams v. Williams, W. N. (1899), 66, 47 W. R. Dig. 143, as establishing the right to the inquiry asked.

Astbury, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendant.—There is no authority for allowing the plaintiff an inquiry: Swan v. Swan, 8 Price 519; Teasdale v. Sanderson, 33 Beav. 534. Permanent improvements do not give the right as against a co-tenant unless an occupation rent is charged: see the 6th and 7th inquiries in Cooper v. Fisher, 2 Seton (5th ed.), p. 1565. That was the law till Parker v. Trigg (1874), W. N. 27, which was a very special case, and was, moreover, a sale and not a partition case. In Watson v. Gass, 30 W. R. 286, 2 Seton (5th ed.), p. 1566, the order was not a hostile order. Leigh v. Dickeson, 33 W. R. 538, 15 Q. B. D. 60, was not a decision on the point, and the dicta at pp. 67 and 69 are wrong, though they are relied on by North, J., in In re Jones, where Teasdale v. Sanderson was distinguished, and cited by Stirling, J., in Hill v. Hickin, 46 W. R. 137, [1897] 2 Ch. 579. [COZENS-HARDY, J., referred to Leslie v. French, 31 W. R. 561, 23 Ch. D. 552.]

COZENS-HARDY, J.—On principle the question is one of difficulty. But regard being had to the authorities, I think that it would not be right for me to express any view of my own. I find the point dealt with by Bacon, V.C., in 1874 (Parker v. Trigg), by Fry, J., in 1881 (Watson v. Gass), by Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., in 1884 (Leigh v. Dickeson), by North, J., in 1893 (In re Jones), and again in 1896 (In re Cook's Mortgage), by Stirling, J., in 1897 (Hill v. Hickin), and by Kekewich, J., in 1899 (Williams v. Williams), and there is no break in this current of authority. I must follow the uniform decisions since 1874. I hold that a tenant in common is entitled to an inquiry, and it should follow the form approved by Kekewich, J., in Williams v. Williams, and be reciprocal.

Solicitors for the defendant, Eyre, Dowling, & Co.

NOTE.—Williams v. Williams was one of several actions for partition of different properties in which improvements had been severally effected by the defendants or their predecessors in title. Kekewich, J., in lieu of the form of inquiry given in 2 Seton (5th ed.), p. 1565, directed the following account and inquiry to be inserted in the judgments in the several actions—viz.: "An account of the moneys, if any, expended by the defendant or his predecessors in title in permanent improvements to the said hereditaments since" [the date of the party's title accruing], "and an inquiry as to the extent to which the present value of such hereditaments had been increased by such expenditure."

SHARMAN v. MASON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Reputed ownership—Goods used for purposes connected with trade or business—Mantle-stands—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44 (iii.).

Goods "in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business" which pass, by virtue of section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to the trustee in bankruptcy, may include goods used for purposes connected with the bankrupt's trade or business.

Stands or models used, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the true owner, in the business of a mantle dealer, who became bankrupt, were accordingly held to be goods in the bankrupt's possession in his trade or business, and, there being no proof of a custom to the effect that stands not belonging to the trader were used in the business, passed to the bankrupt's trustee.

Appeal from the Mayor's Court.

The action was brought to recover possession of thirty-two mantle-stands used in the business of a mantle dealer, or, alternatively, for damages for their detention.

The stands were the property of the plaintiff, who had lent them to his brother in order to enable him to set up business as a mantle maker. The brother afterwards sold his business to a mantle dealer, and became manager of the business so sold.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The mantle dealer having become bankrupt, the defendant, who was her trustee in bankruptcy, took possession of the stands.

The plaintiff in this evidence admitted that he knew that the mantle dealer was using the stands in her business.

The defendant pleaded that the bankrupt was the reputed owner of the stands within the meaning of section 44 (iii.) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that he as her trustee was therefore justified in taking them.

The recorder left the question to the jury whether the stands were "in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in her trade or business by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that she was the reputed owner thereof."

The jury answered in the affirmative, and the recorder gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and Cranstoun, for the plaintiff.—The question left to the jury involved, really, two questions. One, namely, whether the stands were in the order or disposition of the bankrupt, was a question of fact properly left to the jury. The other was whether they were in the bankrupt's possession in her trade and business under such circumstances that she was the reputed owner thereof, and this was a question of law. Goods belonging to a third party are not within section 44 (iii.) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, unless they were left with the bankrupt under such circumstances that, as reputed owner, he could have sold them, or otherwise obtained credit upon them, in the course of his trade or business: per Lord Watson, Colonial Bank v. Whinney, 34 W. R. 705, at p. 707, 11 App. Cas. 426, at p. 440. It is clear that in the present case the trader had no power lawfully to sell or obtain credit for the stands. They were merely lent to him to be kept in his possession: Whitfield v. Brand, 16 M. & W. 282, and Mace v. Cadell, Cowp. 232.

He cited also Ryall v. Rowles, 1 Ves. sen. 348; Joy v. Campbell, 1 Sch. & Lef. 328.

Danckwerts, for the defendant.—The question left to the jury was a question of fact. The question of reputed ownership is a question of fact in each case: Ex parte Watkins, In re Couston, 21 W. R. 530, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 520. The point to consider is not whether the trader has the power to sell or pledge the goods, but whether persons seeing the goods on his premises would be induced thereby to give credit. Thus if there were a notorious custom for goods to be on the trader's premises which did not belong to him the section would not apply: Thackthwaite v. Cock, 3 Taunt. 487; Priestley v. Pratt, 15 W. R. 639, L. R. 2 Ex. 101; and Whitfield v. Brand. Here no such custom had been proved. It is not necessary for the section to apply that the trader should deal in the goods. It is enough if the goods are used in connection with his business.

Cranstoun replied.

RIDLEY, J.—The question for decision is whether these stands used for the exhibition of goods for sale, but not being part of the goods for sale, were goods in the order and disposition of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 14 (iii.) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The words of that section have more than once been the subject of judicial construction. In the case of In re Jenkinson, 15 Q. B. D. 441, 15 W. R. Dig. 15, where the bankrupt was a stockbroker, silversmith, and watchmaker, it was decided that certificates of shares deposited by him with bankers in his own name to secure his trade account did not pass to the trustee because they were not in his possession in his trade or business. The words of the Act were distinguished from those of the Act of 1869, and it was pointed out by the court that goods, if they are to pass to the trustee, must come into the bankrupt's possession in his trade or business, and not merely as a trader. The question arose again for determination in the case of Colonial Bank v. Whinney (in the Court of Appeal), 33 W. R. 852, 30 Ch. D. 261. There the bankrupts, who were stock and share brokers, and who were in the habit of purchasing shares and obtaining advances on them by equitable mortgages, had deposited shares so bought to secure an advance made to them by a bank, and the question was whether the trustee in bankruptcy could take the shares as being within the operation of this clause. In the end it was decided by the House of Lords that the shares were choses in action within the proviso at the close of the section; but as the majority of the Court of Appeal was of a different opinion on that point it was necessary for them to determine whether the shares were goods in the order or disposition of the bankrupts in their trade or business. Cotton, L.J., says: "Where we have goods such as stock-in-trade there is no difficulty. The goods or stock-in-trade of the firm would be in the order or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business. But in my opinion the words of the section would go further than that. I think the true construction is that the goods must be in the bankrupts' order or disposition for the purposes of or purposes connected with his trade or business." Lindley, L.J., agreed, and the decision was that as the custom of the firm was to buy shares out of the partnership money and use them for the partnership business, and as these shares were intended to be so used, they were in the order or disposition of the bankrupts within the meaning of the statute. It further appears from the judgment of Lindley, L.J., that the chief doubt in his mind arose from the fact that the shares were not visible. He says: "One question, which to my mind is a most important and difficult question, is this, whether anything is meant by the expression in the Act which is not applicable to a visible thing. I can understand how goods and chattels in the ordinary sense visible —things in a shop or factory—are in a man's trade or business; and it was contended by the appellants, and very ably contended, that nothing was in a man's trade or business within the meaning of the section which was not visible." Now, in the present case, the stands in question are visible, so that the argument which had so much weight with the Lord Justice cannot be raised. And the stands, though in a different way, are quite as much connected with the trade or business as were the shares in the Colonial Bank case.

During the argument several instances were put by counsel for the appellant of things used similarly to these stands which would not (as it was contended) be considered to be connected with the bankrupt's trade or business; such were a brougham to convey goods, or stands of little value in a wig-shop. But it appears to me that in each instance the things in question would be connected with the trade or business, and therefore within the order or disposition section if the bankrupt was in possession of them under such circumstances that as the reputed owner he could have sold them or otherwise obtained credit upon them in the course of his trade or business. That point did not arise at the hearing of the Colonial Bank case in the Court of Appeal, for it was conceded. But what I have just said are the words of Lord Watson when the case was under the consideration of the House of Lords. It was argued indeed that in order to satisfy those words the very particular thing must be such as the bankrupt could have obtained money upon if he were to pledge it, and that the stands were not such as the bankrupt could have obtained money upon if he were to pledge them. I, however, think it more probable that his lordship was dealing with the goods and chattels in the shop as a whole, and that all goods which might be held to have sufficient importance to enter into the value of the trade or business in the mind of an intending lender would fall within the rule. That question would be one of fact, and would be for a jury; and I think a direction to that effect would be more accurate than one that the jury should merely consider the value of each particular thing. Here the question was left to the jury by the recorder in the general form it is true, and they answered it in the favour of the trustee. Nor can this court alter the decision.

It was further urged for the appellant that the possession of these stands would not raise a presumption of reputed ownership by the bankrupt, and the case of Ex parte Watkins was quoted. I think that where it is known generally that the trader may be in possession of the goods in some other capacity, such as warehouseman or factor, they are not within the statute. Such a case was that of the wine merchant in Ex parte Watkins, and the bookseller in Whitfield v. Brand. Guns left at a gunmakers for repair, or plate, will afford other examples. But in each case it is a question of fact that is properly to be determined by a jury. Nor do I see that in such a case as the present it can be said that a finding in favour of the trustee was a wrong finding. Certainly no custom can be alleged here at all similar to those found in the wine merchant's and bookseller's cases. Thackthwaite v. Cock, quoted in the argument, was a case relating to hops left in the merchant's warehouse after sale, where it was found that the custom was not proved as a fact.

The appellant further placed reliance on the observations made by Lord Fitzgerald in the Colonial Bank case, and in the earlier cases of Ryall v. Rowles and Joy v. Campbell, as showing that there must be something contrary to good faith in the transaction, before the court will allow goods belonging to one person to be taken in satisfaction of the debt of another. No doubt the possession, order, or disposition must be in a person who is not the owner, and who ought not to have them; and no doubt the object of the Acts of Parliament passed on this subject has been to prevent deceit by a trader who is in the visible possession of property to which he is not entitled. These are the words of Lord Redesdale in Joy v. Campbell, many times approved by subsequent decisions. But they do not mean that it is necessary, in order that the statute may apply, that there should be any actual bad faith. If so, where was the bad faith in the Colonial Bank case? The same observation applies to many other cases. It is true that Lord Redesdale uses the word unconscientiously—"whom the owner permits unconscientiously to have such order and disposition"; but he adds, "as the Act supposes." The expressions mean no more than this, that the mere possession by a person not the owner, with the consent of the true owner, so as to obtain credit, was considered by the Legislature unfair.

I would add that the case Lingard v. Messiter, 1 B. & C. 308, does not appear to me to affect the principle under discussion and merely turns upon the evidence produced in that particular case to show that the bankrupt in question had ceased to be the reputed owner of the goods.

For these reasons I think that there was evidence on which the jury might properly find as they did, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—The question is, whether stands, or models for the display of costumes, when allowed by the true owner of them to remain in possession of a bankrupt person for the purpose of displaying upon them for sale clothes sold by the bankrupt in the ordinary course of his business, are goods "in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business" within the meaning of section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It was argued by Mr. Jelf on behalf of the appellant that these goods are not subject to that section of the Act, because they were not such things as were for sale in the business of the bankrupt. Now, if I could entirely accept some of the expressions used in judgments given in the older cases, I should agree that this is law to-day. But having regard to the language of judges of late years, I cannot think that such phrases as "The goods must be such as the party suffers the trader to sell as his own" can now be accepted, although they are quoted with apparent approval by Parke, B., in Whitfield v. Brand. As to what may be the real meaning of the words in question, there is, I think, no direct authority. Indeed it is said by Lord Fitzgerald in the latest case (Colonial Bank v. Whinney) that "their construction has yet to be determined." It is to be remarked, however, that the words are not now, and have not been since 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 72, what they were when many of the earlier cases were decided. It is pointed out by Parke, B., in Whitfield v. Brand that they now stand as "possession, order, or disposition," instead of "possession, order, and disposition." I think, therefore, that it is enough if these goods were in the possession of the bankrupt in his trade or business. although they were not in his disposition therein in the sense that they were such things as he sold in his trade. The words "order or disposition" seem to me necessary to enlarge the word "possession" so as to include something beyond visible occupation by a reputed owner. If it be said that this construction appears inconsistent with Lord Watson's words in Colonial Bank v. Whinney: "The principle which appears to me to be deducible from the authorities is this, that the goods belonging to a third party are not within section 44 (iii.) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, unless they were left with the bankrupt in such circumstances that, as reputed owner, he could have sold them, or otherwise obtained credit upon them in the course of his trade or business," then I would answer that I understand Lord Watson to have meant by obtaining credit upon the goods, not merely getting a loan by pledging them, but obtaining credit on the purchase of other goods, because of the bankrupt appearing to own things valuable for business purposes, though not for sale in his business. This construction recommends itself to me as being entirely consonant with the passage quoted by Lord Ashbourne from Ryall v. Rowles as applicable to the existing bankruptcy law, that the intent of it is "to prevent traders from gaining a delusive credit by a false appearance of substance to mislead those who should deal with them": see Colonial Bank v. Whinney, in the House of Lords, p. 447.

Moreover, I think there is extreme force in the passage from the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in Colonial Bank v. Whinney, cited by my learned brother. It is plain that the words used by the Lord Justice would cover goods much less directly connected with the bankrupt's trade than are those here in question. Indeed, it is probable that, although not for sale, these stands might rightly be considered as part of the stock-in-trade of the bankrupt as being goods necessary to the carrying on of the trade or business. Further on, in the same case Lindley, L.J., construes these words as meaning "not merely visibly employed in his trade or business, but acquired for the purposes of the business and used for those purposes."

The decision of the Court of Appeal in which these expressions were used was reversed by the House of Lords; but the reasoning of the Lords Justices upon those points remains unaffected by that decision. Still, the passages I have quoted from their judgments are said by Mr. Jelf—though I do not agree with him—to be obiter dicta, and further, to be in conflict with an unreported decision of my own at nisi prius. Such decisions at nisi prius as had the good fortune to be reported by Lord Campbell are admittedly of high authority, but I cannot bring myself to attribute to that particular decision of a court of first instance which has been pressed upon me, an authority overbearing the opinion of the Lords Justices, obiter dicta though they be.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Banker—Cheque—"Customer"—Defective title—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 82.

A rate collector by falsely pretending that a rate had been made obtained from the plaintiffs a cheque, drawn in the collector's favour as payee, crossed generally and marked "not negotiable." The collector took the cheque to the defendants' bank at which he had for some years been in the habit of cashing cheques, but at which he kept no account; a part of the amount of the cheque was at the collector's request credited to the account of a local authority which banked with the defendants, and the balance was handed to the collector and appropriated by him to his own use. The defendants in due course presented the cheque and received payment thereof.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 82, provides that where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment of a crossed cheque for a customer who has a defective title to the cheque the banker shall incur no liability to the true owner of the cheque.

Held, that it is a question of fact whether a person is a "customer" of a bank within the meaning of section 82; that the collector was a customer of the defendants, and that they received payment of the cheque for him within the meaning of the section.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs sought to recover the sum of £142 10s., as money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, or alternatively as damages for the conversion of a cheque.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

June 22.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: This was an action brought for £142 10s., money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, or, in the alternative, for damages to a like amount for the conversion of a cheque. The facts were as follows: One, Huggins, had been for many years a rate collector in the employment of the Wantage Rural District Council and for other similar bodies. In this capacity he had been in the habit of receiving from the plaintiffs and others cheques for the amounts payable by them for rates, and the cheques he received he used frequently to cash through the defendants' branch bank at Wantage. He had been in the habit of cashing cheques in this way for fifteen or twenty years, and a considerable number of cheques (fifty or sixty) were cashed by him in the course of each year. Apparently Huggins, on receipt of the money for the cheques, distributed it among the local bodies to whom he had to account. He was well known to the manager and officials of the bank at Wantage. The bank were the bankers of the Wantage Rural District Council. Huggins, however, kept no account with the defendants, nor had he any pass book; each of his transactions with the defendants were completely disposed of as and when he brought the cheques. In November, 1898, Huggins falsely pretended to the plaintiffs that a rate had been made, and that the plaintiffs owed in respect of the same £142 10s. By this means he induced the plaintiffs to give him their cheque for that amount. The cheque was drawn on the London Joint Stock Bank in favour of Huggins or order; it was crossed generally and marked "Not negotiable." On the 16th of November, Huggins in accordance with his usual course of dealing with the defendants, took this cheque to their bank at Wantage to get it cashed. He handed it across the counter to the bank clerk, and the latter filled up a paying-in slip, which Huggins signed. This paying-in slip contained no reference to the cheque itself, but purported to show a payment into the bank of £142 10s. in money, a payment out to Huggins of £117 10s. and a payment to the credit of the district council's account at Huggins' request of £25. The business effect of this was, that the bank handed to Huggins the amount of the cheque, £142 10s., which he there and then disposed of to his own use. Having thus obtained the cheque, the defendants crossed it to themselves and sent it up to their head office in London for collection. It was duly presented and paid. The question is whether the defendants are liable to account to the plaintiffs for the money so paid. Now, if this cheque had neither been crossed nor marked "Not negotiable" there could be no doubt as to the right of the defendants to retain the proceeds. It would be true to say that Huggins' title to it was defective. See section 29, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Exchange Act; but inasmuch as the defendants took the cheque in good faith and for value, and without any notice of the defect, the plaintiffs would have no cause of action against them; what then is the effect of the crossing? The effect of crossing a cheque is stated in section 79, sub-section 2, of the Act. It is that if the banker on whom it is drawn pays it otherwise than to a banker, he renders himself liable to the true owner for any loss he may sustain owing to the cheque having been so paid. Then section 80 provides that if the banker on whom the cheque is drawn pays it in good faith and without negligence to another banker, he shall stand in the same position as if he had made the payment to the true owner of the cheque. These two sections deal with the liabilities and rights of the banker on whom the cheque is drawn. The next two sections define the position, first, of any person who may take a crossed cheque marked "Not negotiable," and secondly, of a banker who receives payment for a customer of a crossed cheque. Section 81 provides that a person who takes a crossed cheque marked "Not negotiable" shall have no better title than the person from whom he took it had. Section 82 provides that where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a crossed cheque, and the customer has no title or a defective title to it, the banker shall incur no liability to the true owner by reason only of having received such payment. Applying the law as contained in these sections to the facts of this case, it appears to me that Huggins, who, as I have said, had only a defective title to the cheque, could give no better title to the defendants because the cheque was crossed and marked "Not negotiable," but that though he could only give a defective title to the defendant, yet if the defendants, being bankers, can show that they did no more than receive payment of the cheque in the manner described in section 82, they are protected. Now, I find as a fact that the defendants received the payment in good faith and without negligence. I find also that they received it for Huggins. It was argued that they did not receive for Huggins, but for themselves. It was said that they bought the cheque, but if by this expression it meant that they took the cheque without recourse, I am clearly of opinion that the contention is wrong. What the bank did was this: They advanced £142 10s. to Huggins, and Huggins became their debtor to that amount; they then undertook with him to send forward the cheque for collection, and to apply the proceeds, when received, to the extinguishment of his indebtedness. This, in my opinion, amounted to receiving the money for Huggins. Suppose the bank had not paid any money to Huggins on the 16th of November, could it then be argued that in presenting the cheque they were not presenting it for him? Clearly not; and I cannot see why the fact that they paid him the money on the 16th of November in anticipation of the payment of the cheque next day in the clearing-house should make any difference. Only one question then remains—the real question in the case, Was Huggins a customer within the meaning of section 82? Now, whether a person is or is not a customer of a bank must be a question of fact to be determined with reference to the circumstances of each case. It is undesirable to attempt to define what constitutes a man a customer of a bank. It is much better to leave the question at large, so that a jury or the court may deal with each case as it arises. The Act of Parliament has not attempted any definition; banker is defined, but not customer; and I think the Legislature wisely omitted to define the expression. Then was Huggins in fact a customer? I think he was; he had been in the habit for many years of using the defendant bank in connection with transactions which undoubtedly constitutes part of a banker's business: the collection of cheques; and he was well-known to the bank. This is, I think, sufficient to constitute him a customer within the meaning of the section.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the defendants are entitled to the protection of the section, and are consequently not liable in this action. In these circumstances it becomes unnecessary for me to deal with the other questions raised in argument by Mr. Lawrence,

TALLERMAN v. THE DOWSING RADIANT HEAT CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Trade competition — Rival manufacturers of medical apparatus—Appropriation of medical testimonials—Fraudulent representations—Damage to manufacturer —Injunction refused.

A manufacturer of patented medical apparatus had received favourable notices and comments in the medical and other press, which a rival manufacturer of later and similar apparatus had copied, in modified forms, into several pamphlets by which he advertised his goods.

Held, that there was no evidence that the defendant's goods were passed off for the plaintiff's, and that the application for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the issue of such pamphlets containing the testimonials must be refused.

Motion.

The plaintiff Lewis Abraham Tallerman was the inventor of a mode of treating various diseases by means of superheated air, and was the patentee of an apparatus for carrying this mode of treatment into effect. Since 1893 his system had been in practical operation, and during that period had attracted the favourable attention of many members of the medical profession. In the Lancet of the 29th of August, 1896, there appeared an article on the subject by Dr. Knowsley Sibley, containing an account of the Tallerman mode of treatment, and particulars of its application to specific cases. Dr. Sibley had also made a speech upon the same subject before the British Balneological and Climatological Society. The defendant company was formed in December, 1898, for the purpose of applying a rival mode of treatment to the same class of cases, the apparatus for this having been patented in 1897 and 1898 by Herbert John Dowsing, an electrical engineer. The main difference between the two systems was that luminous heat was made use of by Dowsing, while the plaintiff applied dark or obscure heat. Dowsing's system had been favourably noticed by some medical men. For the purpose of advertising Dowsing's system, the defendant company had issued and circulated three pamphlets, in regard to each of which the plaintiff made some complaints. The first pamphlet was entitled "The Dowsing Radiant Heat System," and contained an extract from the Daily Mail of the 17th of January, 1899, which stated that Dr. Sibley, senior physician at the North-West London Hospital, had contributed an article to the Lancet on this system, whereas, in fact, the article related to Tallerman's system. The second pamphlet, which was entitled "The Radiant Heat Treatment (Dowsing's Patent): Extracts from the Medical Press," contained what purported to be an "extract from an article published in the Lancet by Mr. Knowsley Sibley, M.A., M.D., B.C. Camb., M.R.C.P. Lond. (Senior Physician to Out-Patients at the North-West London Hospital), on Local Hot-Air Treatment for Rheumatism, Gout, and Allied Affections." The extract omitted from the title the name of the plaintiff Tallerman which appeared in the title of the original article, and also any mention whatever of the plaintiff Tallerman or his system. The extracts had been so made that the reader would naturally believe that certain statements of fact which appeared in the article related to the defendant's system, whereas in fact they related to the plaintiff's. For example, on p. 4 of the pamphlet the following passage occurred: "A period of two years has enabled me to form a definite opinion that the value of the treatment is not merely a temporary one, but is of a more or less permanent nature." The third pamphlet was entitled, "The Dowsing Radiant Heat Co. (Limited)—Extracts from the Journal of Balneology and Climatology," and contained what purported to be a report of the speech made at a meeting of the society of that name. In that speech as delivered certain specific references were made to the systems both of the plaintiff and of the defendant company; but in this pamphlet both had been struck out. Under these circumstances the plaintiff Tallerman and the Patents and Manufacturers' Development Co. (Limited), a company which he had formed for the development of his invention, brought this action and moved for an injunction to restrain the defendants from printing, publishing, issuing, or circulating any pamphlet, notice, circular, or advertisement which contained any press notice, testimonial, or other document, or any other extract therefrom originally written in favour of the plaintiff's hot-air treatment, or in which any use was made of the reputation of the plaintiff Tallerman or his hot-air treatment, or which would lead to the belief that any press notice, testimonial, or other document, originally written in favour of the plaintiff's hot-air treatment, was written in favour of the defendants' treatment; and also from representing or doing anything leading to the belief that the defendants' treatment by hot-air is the same as, or substantially equivalent in results to, the plaintiff's hot-air treatment. The plaintiff's evidence showed that these pamphlets had been sent to persons who had been treated by the plaintiff's system, some of whom had been misled into the belief that Dr. Sibley's article and speech related to the defendant's system; and, further, that the circulation of these pamphlets among such persons was attributable to the exertions of a Mr. Pritchard, who was formerly secretary of the plaintiff company, but who had since entered the service of the defendant company and was carrying on their business from his former office. The defendant Dowsing attempted to explain the extracts in the pamphlets by saying that the article in the Lancet contained a number of well-stated propositions applicable to any of the existing systems for the applications of dry heat for therapeutic purposes, but this was not made out; and he further stated, as the fact was, that the report of Dr. Sibley's speech was obtained from Dr. Sibley himself, and that the proofs were corrected by him. He also offered to discontinue the employment of Pritchard from September next.

W. H. Upjohn, Q.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiff, submitted that this was unfair competition which the court would restrain, because the extracts as published were untrue and were fraudulently made for a purpose involving damages to the plaintiff and pecuniary advantage to the defendants to which they were not entitled, Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51 2 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.) 64. The plaintiff had not advertised his system, but had left himself in the hands of the medical profession, relying solely for his reputation on the notes of cases in the medical journals, and these notes had been fraudulently appropriated; in Franks v. Weaver, 10 Beav. 297, specific relief had been granted on a very similar point according to the report of that case in 8 L. T. (O. S.) 510.

defendants, contended that this was not a passing-off case and must fail as a matter of law; it is not actionable for one tradesmen to use testimonials given to another tradesmen, but they can only be used as evidence in a passing-off case. Franks v. Weaver is distinguishable on that ground. The court will not restrain statements merely because untrue: per Lord Herschell in White v. Mellin, 43 W. R. 353, [1895] A. C. 154. These erroneous impressions caused by user of advertisements are not enough unless there is passing-off of the defendants' goods as and for the plaintiff's: Birmingham Vinegar Co. v. Powell, 44 W. R. 688, affirmed in [1897] A. C. 710, 46 W. R. Dig. 164; Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112; Ajello v. Worsley, 46 W. R. 245, [1898] 1 Ch. 274.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, and having observed that, as to Dowsing's explanation of the extracts, his conduct might have been very proper if, instead of including statements of particular fact, he had confined himself to general statements, continued: In my opinion, whatever may be the legal merits of the case, the plaintiffs have reason to complain of what the defendants have done. The use made of the extracts from Dr. Sibley's article and speech was calculated to cause annoyance to the plaintiffs and the employment of Pritchard to rouse their suspicions. The case, however, is admitted not to be one in which the defendants are selling or trying to pass off their treatment or apparatus as and for the plaintiffs'. Neither can it be said that their pamphlets contain false statements as to the plaintiffs' business; the false statements relate to the defendants' business. What is said is that the defendants are making statements, false to their knowledge, which will cause damage to the plaintiffs, and the judgments in Pasley v. Freeman were referred to, particularly that of Buller, J., in which it was laid down that "fraud without damage or damage without fraud gives no cause of action, but where these two concur an action lies." The principle established by that case is thus stated by Parke, B., in Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519, at p. 531: "A mere naked falsehood is not enough to give a right of action, but it is so if it be a falsehood told with intention that it should be acted on by the party injured, and that act must produce damage to him." Here, however, the statements complained of were not intended to be acted on by the plaintiffs and have not been acted on by them. But it was said that the principle went beyond this, and reference was made to some observations of Mellish, L.J., in Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Wilson, 24 W. R. 1023, 2 Ch. D. 434, at p. 453, when he was considering the case of the wrongful user of a trade-mark. The Lord Justice there said: "Originally, I apprehend, the right to bring an action in respect of the improper use of a trade-mark arose out of the common law right to bring an action for a false representation, which, of course, must be a false representation made fraudulently. It differed from an ordinary action for false representation in this respect, that an action for false representation is generally brought by the person to whom the false representation is made; but in the case of the improper use of a trade-mark, the common law courts noticed that the false representation which is made by putting another man's trade-mark, or the trade name of another manufacturer, on the goods which the wrongdoer sells, is calculated to do an injury, not only to the person to whom the false or fraudulent representation is made, but to the manufacturer whose trade-mark is imitated, and therefore the common law courts held that such a manufacturer had a right of action for the improper use of his trade-mark."

The case which was greatly relied on on behalf of the plaintiffs was the case, before Lord Langdale, of Franks v. Weaver, which is reported in 10 Beav. 297 and more fully in 8 L. T. (O. S.) 510. There the plaintiff complained that the defendant, who made a medical preparation similar to that of the plaintiff, had made it up in such a way as to bring on the wrappers the plaintiff's name, and also had enclosed within the wrappers copies of testimonials given by eminent medical men in favour of the plaintiff; and, no doubt, a use, and an improper use, was there made of the testimonials which had been given in favour of the plaintiff. But it seems to me that the user there was of a totally different kind from that which occurs in the present case. I am reading from the report in the Law Times. Lord Langdale says: "It seems to me to be perfectly clear that nobody can look at all these circumstances without observing that the name and the testimonials of the plaintiff are so craftily applied—for that is the word which is properly applicable here—so craftily applied that they are well calculated to produce in the minds of ordinary readers, who are generally the majority of those who would read it, they were calculated to produce in the minds of persons who are ordinary readers the impression that the mixture or solution prepared and sold by the defendant is the same as the mixture or solution to which these testimonials apply—that is to say, the mixture or solution of the plaintiff." And a little further on he says: "The fraud certainly consists in the crafty adoption of these words in such a manner as to say the thing he makes is prepared by the plaintiff; he issues it in such a way that it is difficult for any person who is not a critical reader to find out that he does not mean to do that." And then he finally says: "I believe that this falls within the principle of the former cases of this kind, that he is doing that ordinarily and constantly which is calculated to make persons believe that when he is selling his own article he is in fact selling the article of the plaintiff." Now, the basis of that judgment was that the defendant was selling his own goods as those of the plaintiff. It is admitted that this case does not fall within that principle. But what was much pressed upon me was that after granting an injunction in the ordinary form, according to the report in the Law Times, the Master of the Rolls went on to grant an injunction to restrain from publishing or circulating any cover or wrapper and so forth, in which any use was made of the character and reputation of the plaintiff. I have compared the report in the Law Times with the order as found in the registrar's book, and I find there a few more words added. It ran there, not merely "in which any use is made of the character and reputation of the plaintiff," but these words follow, "as applicable to any preparation or compound of the defendant or his firm," and I do not know that the addition of these words makes any material difference, but it seems to me that the justification for that modification of the ordinary form of injunction must be found in this, that the Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion that such a use of the character and reputation of the plaintiff was a means of passing off the goods of the defendant as those of the plaintiff. I cannot say that I can arrive at this conclusion in the present case, and therefore it seems to me that that case of Franks v. Weaver is no authority which guides me in the present case. On the other hand, I find what seems to me an authority which points the other way. I refer to the case before Hatherley, V.C., of Batty v. Hill. That certainly was a very gross case, because the plaintiff there, who was a maker of pickles, had had awarded to him a prize medal at the International Exhibition of 1862. He and another were the only persons who obtained prize medals in respect of their manufacture, and the defendant Hill was advertising his goods as having obtained prize medals. The case was argued by Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Bagshawe. Hatherley, V.C., says this: "I ought to be careful as to acting in this case. On the question of balance of convenience, I should be decidedly in favour of the plaintiff; the inconvenience of the defendant would be merely the necessity of telling the truth. It is, however, no part of the duty of this court to enforce the observance of the dictates of morality, and though the old maxim, rem facias rem si possis recte, si non quoumque mode rem, seems to apply in full force to modern times, I can only interfere when some private right is thereby infringed." Then he goes on to remark on some portions of the evidence, and says: "But, as I have come to the conclusion that there is no substance whatever in the charge of a previous attempt to pass off the defendants' goods as the plaintiff's, I must deal with the present case without the only element which would enable me to make the order which is now applied for." He goes on to discuss the case at great length and to go further into it. So that the Vice-Chancellor in a case in which a flagrant untruth was stated, and one which would seem calculated to cause damage to the plaintiff complaining there, refused to interfere, at all events by way of interlocutory injunction. The Legislature afterwards came to the relief of the plaintiff in that case, and passed Acts prohibiting any such conduct in future; but as the law then stood it seems an authority. Now, it seems to me that untrue statements, such as occur in the present case, are very different from those which were found in Batty v. Hill. There is no evidence of any actual damage having been suffered by the plaintiff, and, I confess, regard being had to the nature of the statements as they are found in the pamphlets, I entertain great doubt as to whether any actual damage will ever accrue. Under these circumstances I think I ought not to interfere by way of an interlocutory injunction, and I therefore make an order on the motion, but I specially reserve the costs to be dealt with at the trial.

THIERY v. CHALMERS, GUTHRIE, & CO. (a.)

Lunatic—Lunatic not so found—Foreign lunatic—Status of lunacy declared by competent foreign court—Guardian appointed by competent foreign court—"Tuteur"—Vesting of property in guardian—Power of guardian to give receipts and discharges—Payment and transfer to guardian.

Where application is made to the court to direct an English firm holding moneys and securities of a foreign lunatic for payment and transfer thereof to the applicant, if there has been a judicial declaration of the status of lunacy by a competent court of the country to which the lunatic belongs, and if the applicant on the lunatic's behalf has, according to the laws of the lunatic's country, the latter's property vested in him in the sense that he has the right to retain and deal with it without becoming the actual owner, the application may properly be, and generally should be, granted.

Semble, a French "tuteur" is such an applicant.

Further consideration of an action claiming an account of moneys deposited with or received by the defendants, Messrs. Chalmers, Guthrie, & Co., of 9, Idol-lane, in the City of London, for or on behalf of the plaintiff as his bankers and agents, and for payment of what should be found due.

The action was originally brought by the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery, a person of unsound mind not so found, who sued by Ernest William Woods Davey, his next friend; but on the 24th of March, 1899, the writ was amended pursuant to an order of the master dated the 13th of March, 1899, by adding, as co-plaintiff, the name of Joseph Jean Edouard Le Juge de Segrais, who sued as the "tuteur" or guardian duly appointed of George Thomy Thiery.

On the 29th of March, 1899, the plaintiffs obtained an order for an account of all money deposited with or received by the defendants for or on behalf of George Thomy Thiery as his bankers and agents as claimed by the indorsement on the writ, and the further consideration was adjourned.

An the 10th of July, 1899, the master by his certificate found that a balance was due on the account from the defendants to the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery of £2,362 15s. 8d., and that the defendants further held as plaintiff's bankers and agents the following securities: 500 £5 per cent. debentures of the Poor Law Commission, Mauritius, and a certificate for 10 Bank of Mauritius shares of £10 each.

George Thomy Thiery was domiciled in France, and from the affidavit with exhibits of a French avocat it appeared was on the 4th of April, 1898, declared "interdit" or lunatic by the judgment of the duly constituted French civil tribunal, and a council of his family were ordered to appoint a "tuteur." Such judgment was, according to French law, a judicial finding affecting the status of George Thomy Thiery.

On the 6th of May, 1898, the family council duly appointed Le Juge de Segrais as "tuteur." By virtue of this appointment the whole estate of George Thomy Thiery was, according to French law, vested in Le Juge de Segrais, who thereupon became entitled to take possession of every part of it whatsoever and wheresoever, to maintain actions on behalf of his estate, and in every respect to represent his estate in the most complete manner, and to give good and valid discharges in respect of all moneys, stocks, funds, and securities paid or transferred to him forming part of such estate. As "tuteur" he was consequently in a totally different position from an "administrateur provisoire," in whom the lunatic's estate would not be vested.

The defendants were willing to pay over the moneys and securities, and also other moneys for interest, &c., accrued since the date of the master's certificate if the court was of opinion that Le Juge de Segrais was competent to give them a good and valid discharge. Minutes had been prepared which the court was now asked to sanction, and were to the following effect:

"That the defendants may be ordered to pay to the plaintiff Le Juge de Segrais as 'tuteur' to the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery, or as he may direct, the sum of £2,362 15s. 8d. certified to be due from them to George Thomy Thiery by the certificate filed in this action on the 14th of July, 1899, and any further moneys which they may have received or may receive either by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the said George Thomy Thiery.

"That the defendants may also be ordered to transfer to Le Juge de Segrais as such 'tuteur,' or as he shall direct, the securities mentioned in the said certificate as being held by them on account of the said George Thomy Thiery."

Rolt, for the plaintiff.—Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank, 43 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 642, does not apply. That was the case of an "administrateur provisoire," who is in a totally different position to a "tuteur," inasmuch as the lunatic's estate would not be vested in him. We ask for payment, and delivery of the securities. Cases where the money is in court, or under the Trustee Act, or where the application is made under the Lunacy Act, are entirely different. There the court has and exercises a discretion: In re Knight, 46 W. R. 289, [1898] 1 Ch. 257 (Lunacy Act); In re Garnier, 20 W. R. 288, L. R. 13 Eq. 532 (Trustee Relief Act); In re Chatard's Settlement, 47 W. R. 515, [1899] 1 Ch. 712 (Trustee Relief Act); In re Barlow, 35 W. R. 737, 36 Ch. D. 287 (Trustee Relief Act); Grimwood v. Bartels, 25 W. R. 843. Here it is merely a case of debtor and creditor, and the "tuteur" is entitled to the order: Newton v. Manning, 1 Mac. & G. 362; Scott v. Bentley, 3 W. R. 280, 1 K. & J. 281, and In re Morrison there cited; Hessing v. Sutherland, 4 W. R. 820. The defendants could not have paid money into court under the Trustee Acts (In re Sutton's Trusts, 27 W. R. 529, 12 Ch. D. 175), nor under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (6), as there is no notice that is disputed.

Christopher James, for the defendants.—We do not dispute the fact that we hold the money and securities for the lunatic, and we are quite willing to pay it over to the "tuteur" if he can give us a proper discharge, so that we may be protected. The only question is, Can we do so? There are cases where the court will not part, as of course, with a lunatic's money—e.g., in cases of money paid in under the Trustee Relief Act; but that is not the case here. Here it is really only a question of debtor and creditor. The case of In re De Linden, 45 W. R. 342, [1897] 1 Ch. 453, is distinguishable from Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank, and is practically on all fours with the present case. It is really a question of fact. Can the applicant, being the appointed officer of the French court, give us a good discharge? SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, October 1st, 1898 (Lunatics Out of the Jurisdiction).

KEKEWICH, J.—This action was brought to recover from the defendants money and securities held by them as bankers and agents of the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery, who sues as a person of unsound mind not so found by Ernest William Woods Davey, his next friend, but before judgment the writ was amended by adding as co-plaintiff Joseph Jean Edouard Le Juge de Segrais, whose title I must presently examine. On the 29th of March, 1899, an order was made directing an account of all moneys deposited with or received by the defendants for or on account of the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery as his bankers and agents, and the further consideration of the action was adjourned.

On the 10th of July, 1899, the master made a certificate finding that a balance of £2,362 15s. 8d. was due from the defendants on the account mentioned, and that they also held as bankers and agents of the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery certain securities specified in the certificate. On the hearing on further consideration it was asked that the certified balance might be paid, and that the securities mentioned in the certificate might be transferred to the plaintiff Joseph Jean Edouard Le Juge de Segrais as "tuteur" of the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery. The defendants are prepared to pay the balance and transfer the securities, but they of course require a legal discharge, and the question is whether the plaintiff Joseph Jean Edouard Le Juge de Segrais is competent to give them such discharge. That is the question calling for decision, and I reserved judgment on it in order to look more carefully into some authorities. Passing over for the moment Scott v. Bentley, those authorities are In re Barlow's Will; In re Brown, 44 W. R. 17, [1895] 2 Ch. 666; In re De Linden; and Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank. After carefully considering them I think that there may be extracted a general rule that where there has been a judicial declaration of the status of lunacy and the applicant on the lunatic's behalf has the latter's property vested in him in the sense mentioned by the Master of the Rolls in In re Brown—namely, that he has the right to retain and deal with, without becoming the actual owner of the lunatic's property, the application may properly be and generally ought to be granted. In the most recent case of Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank I understand North, J., refused the order asked for because the case did not fall within that rule, while on the other hand the order was made by Stirling, J., in In re De Linden because the rule was applicable. In the present case I have sufficient evidence, that of Edward Gallet, a French advocate, to which are exhibited divers French proceedings proving that the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery is a domiciled Frenchman, has been declared lunatic by a competent tribunal, and the plaintiff Joseph Jean Edouard Le Juge de Segrais is entitled according to French law to take possession of the lunatic's property whatsoever and wheresoever, maintain actions on behalf of his estate and give valid and good discharges in respect of all moneys, stocks, funds, and securities paid to or transferred to him forming part of the estate. That seems to me to bring the case clearly within the rule above stated. Under these circumstances no difficulty arises from the fact that the plaintiff George Thomy Thiery is described, and properly described, as a person of unsound mind not so found, and therefore sues by his next friend, and I ought to make the order asked in favour of the co-plaintiff who is entitled according to the evidence to represent him for this purpose.

In truth, although the action was I think properly framed as it was framed, the last-named plaintiff might have sued in his own name and alleged that the defendants were directly responsible to him. This does not touch an entirely different class of cases which were considered by me in In re Chatard's Settlement. And I do not consider my present decision in the least inconsistent with my decision in that case. On the other hand I am not as at present advised disposed to give much weight to the distinction urged in argument between cases where the claim is by a creditor against a debtor, and those where the court is in possession of a trust fund. I see no reason why the rule should not be applied as much to one class of cases as to the other. The plaintiff relied on the case of Scott v. Bentley; as regards that it is to be observed that the Master of the Rolls in In re Brown distinguished it from that then before the court, and North, J., in Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank said that it was based on a wrong decision in Morrison's case. It may justify, and certainly it is not adverse to, my conclusion here, which, however, is based on the later authority above mentioned. The order may therefore go as asked by the proposed minutes, and I have no objection to its covering, as those minutes suggest, any further moneys which the defendants may have received or may re[illegible] by way of dividend or otherwise on ac[illegible] said George Thomy Thiery, but the n[illegible] provide for the defendants' costs, to which they appear to be entitled. Those costs should be deducted from the certified balance and taxed only in case of difference, the plaintiff Le Juge de Segrais being competent to agree as to the costs on behalf of the estate which he represents.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HUGHES. (a.)

Charity—Unknown origin—Dispute as to objects—Letter of Charity Commissioners—Final determination—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 70 (2).

In consequence of disputes as to the proper objects of a charity and of an application made to them by the defendant, who was a trustee, the Charity Commissioners caused a local inquiry to be held, and subsequently wrote to the defendant stating their views on the matter. No appeal was brought against their decision.

Held, that the letter constituted a determination of the commissioners under section 70, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, and was conclusive upon the question.

This action related to seventeen acres of land, in the parish of Upton Snodsbury, in Worcestershire, called the "Church lands." The defendant Hughes was the people's churchwarden, the other defendants were the vicar and his churchwardens. The land in question was, by an award of January, 1775, under an Inclosure Act, allotted "unto the vicar and churchwardens of the parish of Upton Snodsbury and their successors for the time being for ever . . . as proprietors of certain charity lands within" certain common fields the subject of the inclosure. No trusts of the lands were mentioned in the award, and the origin of the charity was unknown. The rents had usually been applied for the repair and maintenance of the parish church, and expenses of divine service, but the defendant Hughes alleged that they had been on various occasions applied to other purposes, and that the original trust was for the poor of the parish. Hughes had been chairman of the parish council since 1895, and was appointed people's churchwarden at Easter, 1896. Disputes arose between the parish council and Hughes on the one hand and the vicar on the other as to the proper administration of the charity and application of its rents, and in July, 1895, Hughes, as chairman of the council, wrote to the commissioners submitting certain persons for their approval as trustees of the charity, and asking for a scheme. Further correspondence followed between him and the commissioners as to the administration of the charity, and in consequence the commissioners caused a local inquiry as to the administration of the charity to be held, and subsequently, in March, 1897, they sent to Hughes the following letter:

"Charity Commission, March 8th, 1897.

"County, Worcester; Place, Upton Snodsbury; Church lands.

"Sir,—The commissioners have had under consideration the report of the assistant commissioner who visited Upton Snodsbury on the 18th of February last, and inquired into the administration of the charity known as the 'Church lands.'

"The commissioners are of opinion that by the inclosure award of the 13th of January, 1775, the vicar and churchwardens of Upton Snodsbury were constituted trustees for all purposes of the lands awarded to them by that instrument, and that they are not in the position of bare trustees as you are understood to contend.

"With regard to the purposes to which the income of the Church lands is applicable, the commissioners are further of opinion that the usage by which it is applied to the repairs and maintenance of the parish church and to the defraying of the expenses incidental to the performance of divine service is ancient and unbroken, and in the absence of any original express trusts that such usage ought to prevail.

"With regard to the letting of the lands in question, the commissioners are unable to interfere with the decision of the trustees in the matter, but they have suggested to the vicar that in the circumstances it is desirable that the lands should be re-valued by a competent valuer whom the commissioners are prepared to nominate and let in accordance with his advice.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"Mr. John Hughes, "G. HOLFORD.

"Upton Snodsbury, Worcester."

Notwithstanding this letter the defendant Hughes paid a sum of two guineas to the Worcester Infirmary and £2 to the Foresters' Club, and appeared to have considered he had still a right to make such payments. After some further correspondence between him and the commissioners, the commissioners decided to certify a case for the Attorney-General, who brought this action, asking for an injunction restraining Hughes from collecting the rents and acting in the administration of the charity without the consent of and so as to exclude the other trustees, an account of moneys received by him for the charity, and payment of what should be found due thereunder, and for a scheme to be settled by the court.

P. V. Smith, for the defendant Hughes, raised a preliminary objection that the parish council ought to have been made a party.

Dibdin, for the Attorney-General — This is an ecclesiatical charity, and the parish council have no interest in the matter. This was decided by the letter of the Charity Commissioners of the 8th of March, 1897, which was a determination under section 70 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1894. This decision has not been appealed against within the time prescribed, and is consequently conclusive upon the question.

He referred to In re Donnington, 8 W. R. 301.

P. V. Smith.—This case is distinguishable from In re Perry's Almshouses and In re Ross's Charity, 47 W. R. 197, [1899] 1 Ch. 21, where the objects of the charities were not the same as those of either church rates or poor rates. The charity here is admittedly for one or other of those objects. Therefore in 1819 the land vested in the churchwardens and overseers under 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 17: Attorney-General v. Lewin, 8 Sim. 366. It is parish property; and if it belongs to the poor, vested in the parish council under section 6 (1) (c) (iii.) of the Local Government Act, 1894. The question must therefore be decided under section 70, sub-section 1, and not under sub-section 2. At any rate the letter of the commissioners of the 8th of March, 1897, was not a complete and final decision.

COZENS-HARDY, J. (after hearing the evidence).—The facts bring the case within section 70, sub-section 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894. A question had arisen under that sub-section, there had been a request by a trustee (for such Mr. Hughes was), and the letter of the 8th of March, 1897, constituted a determination of the commissioners. No appeal was brought against that determination within the prescribed time. It was a decision by a competent authority and is conclusive. It decided that the objects of the charity are ecclesiastical, not secular. The defendant ought to have abided by that decision. He nevertheless made payments (small, no doubt) of a secular character. The action was rendered necessary by his conduct, and I must order him to repay the sums of two guineas and two pounds and the Attorney-General's costs of the action up to to-day.

CAMPBELL v. GILLESPIE. (a.)

Practice—Creditors' deed—Action for account—Discretion of court—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 55, r. 10.

The court will, in the exercise of its discretion under ord. 55, r. 10, not order an account of the dealings and transactions of the trustee under a creditors' deed of arrangement, where it can determine the questions between the parties without such order, and where such order would have mischievous results, notwithstanding that the trustee may have been guilty of some misconduct in his duties.

By a creditors' deed of January, 1887, between Thomas Campbell of the first part, and three of his principal creditors of the second part, and the defendant Thos. Gillespie, a chartered accountant, of the third part, the debtor conveyed all his real and personal estate to the defendant.

The deed contained various provisions enabling the defendant to carry on the debtor's business, which was that of a brewer and wine and spirit merchant, comprising public-houses, and he was authorized to buy liquors and goods from the said creditors, and to borrow money from the bankers.

The material trusts were to pay costs, remuneration to trustee, an allowance to the debtor, the debts due to the creditors other than those parties to the deed, then the money due to the bankers, and to the creditors parties to the deed, and lastly, to pay and transfer the surplus to the debtor. There was a clause making a certificate of the trustee that the trusts and powers of the deed had been executed conclusive evidence of the fact.

The debtor took upon himself the management of the business, substantially consisting of three public-houses and little or nothing else, and this continued until the end of 1896. In August, 1893, the debtor assigned all his interest under the deed to his wife, the plaintiff, for her separate use, and in November, 1896, the defendant transferred to the plaintiff the three public-houses and a life policy and all other the real and personal estate then vested in him upon the trusts of the deed of 1887. This deed did not contain any release by the plaintiff to the defendant, but it contained a recital that all debts and other moneys the payment whereof was secured or provided for by the deed of 1887 had been paid and discharged, and the defendant certified that all the trusts and powers of the deed of 1887 had been executed.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The present action was commenced in October, 1898. The statement of claim made a series of charges against the defendant which his lordship found the plaintiff had to a large extent failed to prove. The plaintiff claimed (1) an account of all dealings and transactions of the defendant as trustee under the deed of 1889; (2) an account of the receipts and payments of the defendant as such trustee on the footing of wilful default; and other subsidiary relief.

Eve, Q.C., Edward Ford, and Boxall, for the plaintiff.

Warmington, Q.C., Robson, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the defendant.

Nov. 29.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—On the plaintiff's opening I held that the facts alleged did not amount to wilful default, and I must therefore dismiss the action so far as it seeks to charge the defendant with wilful default. It remains, however, to consider to what relief, if any, the plaintiff is entitled. Under the old law I think it is plain that the plaintiff would have been entitled as a matter of right to a common account against the defendant. There has been no release, no settled account, nothing upon which the defendant could rely by way of defence. But, happily, under ord. 55, r. 10, I have now a discretion, and I am not bound to give to the defendant a decree for a common account, if the questions between the parties can be properly determined without such a decree. This discretion must be exercised upon due consideration of all the facts of the case. Now, it has been proved to my satisfaction that the defendant did keep proper books of account, in which were entered receipts and payments in the manner adopted by skilled accountants. These accounts were from time to time submitted to and approved by the agents of the three principal creditors, who have in the course of the trial been somewhat inaccurately called a committee of inspection, and at the cost of the defendant by Mr. Foster, a competent accountant, in November or December, 1896. He certified to their correctness. Some, but not all, of the twenty-nine accounts thus audited were handed to the plaintiff's solicitor. The plaintiff required information as to how much money the defendant claimed in order to close the trust and pay off all liabilities, and this information was given by the defendant. Among the liabilities mentioned was one item, "Private bills, £52 17s. 6d.," upon which I shall have to comment. The amount claimed was provided by the plaintiff, and the deed of November, 1896, was executed. The plaintiff and her solicitor were apparently satisfied with the information and accounts thus furnished. I do not find that any application for more detailed accounts was ever made to the defendant by or on behalf of the plaintiff until shortly before the writ in this action was issued. The defendant in or about July, 1898, sent the account-book of this trust to a marine store dealer for destruction, together with other books which had been stowed away in an attic. The destruction was not effected with any idea of avoiding investigation by the plaintiff, though it was most unwise, and having regard to the item £52 17s. 6d. improper. This destruction renders it almost impossible for the defendant to render full accounts under an ordinary decree. Under these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that it is not right that I should make a full administration decree, notwithstanding the fact that I am unable to acquit the defendant of some misconduct. I believe the trust accounts were honestly, properly, and accurately kept, and that Mr. Foster's certified accounts correctly represent what the books themselves have shown. I see no reason to doubt that the tea, sugar, &c., in the paper in which it is wrapped, so that the paper goes to make up the required weight. What the respondent's manager did was to place in the weighing machine a piece of paper which represented the bag in which each parcel of tea was afterwards wrapped. The custom referred to was upheld in Harris v. Allwood, 56 J. P. 709. [DARLING, J.—In that case the proceedings were under section 26, for wilful fraud in using a weighing machine, and the tea was weighed with the paper in the presence of the customer; it was found that that was not a fraud. Here the tea was not weighed in the customer's presence.] The paper placed in the machine is not analogous to a piece of lead or other substances similarly placed, because the paper was connected with and, in effect, formed a part of the article weighed: Carr v. Stringer, 18 W. R. 859, L. R. 3 Q. B. 433. The justices found that the machine in itself was just. If the respondent committed any offence it was in the user of it, and he ought consequently to have been proceeded against under section 26, and not section 25.

RIDLEY, J.—The case must go back with an intimation to the justices to convict. The proceedings were not taken under section 26 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and no charge of fraud against the respondent is involved. The question is whether the respondent or his servants have been guilty of an offence under section 25. [After stating the facts, his lordship proceeded:] What we have here got is this that these scales, as used in the habitual practice of the firm, were used with a piece of paper upon them which added to the weight, and which was practically in the same condition as would be a piece of lead or a piece of any other substance which has weight of any kind at all, and that it was habitually there for the purpose of making up the weight. So used, in my judgment, the scales are unjust scales. You must take them as they are used, not as they are not used. It is of little consequence for the purpose of this inquiry whether the particular makeweight was fixed in the scales so as to require force to remove it or not. Nor was it a good argument to say that the scales without the paper were just. The fact was that as they stood and were used the scales did not stand level. I therefore think that the scales as used were false or unjust within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. Elliott argued that because the makeweight was a piece of paper smaller than the bag in which the packet of tea was going to be sold, and because there was a custom that in making up packets of tea the paper was weighed with the tea, therefore the respondent had a right to do what he did. I do not think that there is any such custom, but if there were that would not make this into an honest balance. It is not necessary to decide what would be the legal result if the bag was weighed in the scoop and not placed, as here, under it.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears that what happened was this: This tea merchant was in the habit of selling what professed to be quarters of a pound of tea in packets. He sold them in paper, and there was not a quarter of a pound of tea in them, but there was a quarter of a pound of tea and paper together. As the case says, in order to facilitate and quicken the process of weighing he put under the scoop which formed the receptacle of the scale in which the tea was placed when being weighed a piece of paper. Now, what the statute enacts shall not be done is this: you are not to use or have in your possession scales which are false or unjust. Now, what was the result of putting that piece of paper under the scoop of the scale? The result was that if you put anything into the scale to weigh it you would not get the true weight of it. The result was that if the scales were left quiescent with no weight on the one side nor any article to be weighed on the other side the scales would not remain at the balance. The arm with the paper under the scoop would remain permanently depressed. Therefore it seems to me that as long as the paper remained there these scales were not in the true sense a balance. They remained scales; but what sort of scales? False scales. The justices themselves, although they do say per se the scales were true, also say this: "In the absence of the said piece of paper, the said weighing machine would have shown the actual weight of the article in the scoop." That amounts to saying that with the presence of the paper the scales would not show the actual weight of the article in the scoop. If they will not, they are not true and just scales.

Mr. Elliott sought to get out of this by saying that it was perfectly true that if you tried to weigh things like gold dust or diamonds in the scales you would be grossly defrauded, but that seeing that scales were only used for weighing tea, and that in the tea trade there is a widely-spread habit of selling tea and paper as tea, the scales remained just scales. In my opinion it does not matter what the article weighed in the scales is. If they are false for one article they are false for all, and therefore these scales as they were used were false and unjust within the meaning of section 25 of the Act.

Landlord and tenant—Market garden holding—Improvements—Compensation—Special bargain—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 57.

A tenant who, by agreement with his landlord, is to receive compensation for improvements, and who might, but does not, make a claim for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, is not debarred by section 57 of the Act from recovering compensation under his agreement.

Award in an arbitration in the form of a special case stated by the arbitrator under the Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 19, and an order of the court.

The facts were as follows:

Some time prior to 1871 William Pearson became tenant from year to year of ten acres of land (situate near to, and subsequently forming part of, a certain farm or holding known as Broom Hall Farm), which land was both before and in that year used and cultivated and thereafter continued to be used and cultivated by Pearson as a market garden.

The ten acres were in 1871 purchased by one George Lane Fox, to whose agent (one G. A. B. Leatham) Pearson from time to time paid the rent accruing due in respect thereof.

During 1883 Pearson had several interviews with Leatham (who acted as agent for George Lane Fox in the management of his estates) at which negotiations took place relating to a proposed tenancy by Pearson of Broom Hall Farm, and on the 30th of October, 1883 —i.e., shortly before the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883. came into force, an agreement was entered into in the following terms:

"Wakefield, October 30th, 1883.

"I hereby agree to take for one year—namely, from the first day of January, 1884, to the first day of January, 1885, the farm in Wrenthorpe, now occupied by George Thompson, the property of George Lane Fox, Esq., and containing 118a. 2r. 0p., more or less, at the yearly rent of two hundred and thirty-six pounds, payable quarterly and subject to the same clauses and conditions as Mr. Fox's other tenants are subject to.

"And we hereby further agree to contract ourselves out of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act of 1875. £236. "WILLIAM PEARSON."

"I hereby agree to let the above on the terms specified.

"WILLIAM PEARSON."

(A specimen form of the agricultural leases granted by George Lane Fox to his tenants was annexed to the award.)

In answer to an inquiry by Pearson, Leatham wrote a letter, dated the 30th of December, 1884, saying "your agreement for the farm you hold under Mr. Lane Fox at Wrenthorpe includes the old take."

At subsequent interviews between Pearson and Leatham the latter consented to the execution of extensive repairs to the farm buildings on the holding, which were thereupon carried out and paid for by Leatham as agent for Lane Fox.

Pearson continued to cultivate the ten acres of land as a market garden, but the residue of the holding was cultivated by him as ordinary agricultural land. Finding that his farming operations proved unsuccessful, Pearson wrote and posted to Leatham in the month of May, 1887, a letter (addressed to him at the estate office, Bramham) the original of which was not produced at the hearing. The agent occupying the position formerly held by Leatham attended on a subpœna duces tecum and deposed that he had not seen the original letter and that it could not be found. In this letter (as to the contents of which parol evidence was given by Pearson) the writer stated that farming was "going from bad to worse," that he could do much better if he were to cultivate the remaining portion of the land in his occupation as a market garden, the farm being close to the city of Wakefield, whence manure could readily be obtained.

The letter then contained an inquiry as to whether he would be allowed a market garden valuation on quitting the farm if he were to continue tenant of the farm and cultivate it as a market garden.

To this letter the following reply, dated the 4th of May, 1887, was sent to Pearson by Leatham: "I will allow you a market garden valuation should you leave the farm you now occupy under G. Lane Fox, Esq."

Pearson accordingly expended large sums of money (the aggregate amount of which was not proved in evidence) in the planting of portions of the said farm and in its cultivation as a market garden, and in particular he erected forcing sheds and other fixtures, and planted many acres with rhubarb, fruit bushes, strawberries, mint, and various vegetable crops.

In July, 1896, the farm was offered for sale by public auction and I'Anson and Calvert became the purchasers, and on the 14th of December, 1896 (prior to the completion of the purchase), Pearson received from the agent of Lane Fox notice to quit. No notice of intention to claim compensation was given within the time prescribed by section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883.

Disputes arose between Pearson and I'Anson and Calvert as to the amount (if any) of compensation to which Pearson was entitled in respect of tenant right and improvements on quitting the premises. These disputes were by agreement referred to arbitration.

Since the arbitration I'Anson had died, and by consent his executors were substituted for him in the proceedings.

The award of the arbitrator was by an order of the master remitted to the arbitrator to state his award in the form of a special case raising the following, among other, questions of law:

(1) That the letter of the 4th of May, 1887, relied on by Pearson was, if an agreement, one beyond the authority of the agent of the landlord to make; that there was no consideration for the agreement alleged to have been made by the letter, and that in any event the letter could not extend to improvements commenced or executed after the date of it.

(2) That the compensation claimed was in respect of improvements, for the whole of which the tenant was entitled to make a claim in accordance with the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, and the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, and that such Acts excluded the right of the tenant to claim compensation outside such Acts or otherwise than under such Acts, and that by noncompliance with the said Acts the tenant had lost his right to claim.

If the court should be of opinion that Pearson was entitled to compensation for the tenant right and all the improvements in respect of which he would have been entitled to claim under the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, and the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, or otherwise as though notice had been duly given under section 7 of the earlier Act, and the other requirements of that statute had been duly performed, the arbitrator awarded that I'Anson and Calvert should pay to Pearson the sum of £2,115 2s. 5d.

If the court should be of opinion that Pearson was not entitled to compensation in respect of the forcing sheds or other fixtures and buildings affixed or erected by him upon the holding for the purposes of his business as a market gardener, but that he was entitled by agreement or otherwise to a market garden valuation in respect of the plants and crops growing on the said farm at the determination of his said tenancy, the arbitrator awarded that I'Anson and Calvert should pay to Pearson the sum of £1,546.

And if the court should be of opinion that Pearson was not entitled to any sum for compensation in respect of tenant's rights or improvements, the award provided that the several parties to the reference should each bear and pay their or his own costs of and incidental thereto, and that Pearson should bear and pay the valuer's charges and the costs of the award.

The Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, which is to be read with the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, provides for compensation for improvements in market garden buildings.

The Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, s. 57: "A tenant shall not be entitled to claim compensation by custom or otherwise than in manner authorized by this Act in respect of any improvement for which he is entitled to compensation under or in pursuance of this Act, but where he is not entitled to compensation under or in pursuance of this Act he may recover compensation under any other Act of Parliament, or any agreement or custom, in the same manner as if this Act had not passed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Corrie Grant, for Pearson.—If Pearson was not entitled to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, he is entitled to the sum awarded in respect of the agreement of the 4th of May, 1887. There was good consideration for that agreement—namely, the prospective increase in the value of the holding. The agreement was one which it was within the authority of the agent to make. Secondly, Pearson was not entitled to claim compensation under the Act, because he had not complied with the requirements of the Act as to notice. Newby v. Eckersley, 47 W. R. 245, [1899] 1 Q. B. 465, supports this view of the construction of section 57. Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Holloway, 52 L. T. Rep. 434, is distinguishable, because in that case there was no agreement outside the Act.

Danckwerts and R. A. Shepherd, for the landlords, Calvert, and the executors of I'Anson.—First, the agreement of the 4th of May, 1887, was beyond the scope of the agent's implied authority (Turner v. Hutchinson, 2 F. & F. 185), and there is no evidence of any express authority. There was no consideration for the agreement if the agreement was valid. Secondly, section 57 of the Act of 1883 is a bar to the tenant's now relying on it. The tenant was entitled to claim compensation under the Act of 1883 and the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, and therefore the only right he had was to proceed under the Act. The fact that he did not give the necessary notices does not make him a person not entitled to compensation under the Act, so as to enable him to recover under the agreement. Newby v. Eckersley is not an authority in the tenant's favour, because there the tenant could not have got compensation under this Act.

July 1.—GRANTHAM, J., read the following judgment: In this case there are practically two questions we have to determine. First, whether the agent of Mr. Lane Fox had authority to enter into the agreement in question. Secondly, if he had authority, then does the Agricultural Holdings Act deprive the claimant for compensation of his rights under the agreement. I can well understand that the present landlords, having recently bought the property to which the right to a valuation attaches, bought it in ignorance of the liability of the landlord under the agreement, because it seems that the letter of the claimant to the landlord's agent had been lost, and very likely the agent had kept no copy of his letter in reply to it, which two letters formed the agreement; but we have to determine the case between the present landlords and tenant under the contractual relations created between the tenant and the original landlord, Mr. George Lane Fox, and by these rights and relations the parties are bound. Now it was contended that express authority should have been proved to show that the agent was enabled to make any other engagements for tenancy with the tenant than such as were to be found in the model leases of the Bramham estate, but as the case finds that the agent was the manager of the estate, and there is no limitation found to his powers as such manager, I think the onus was thrown on the defendants of showing some limitation of the agent's power in such transactions as these in dispute, questions, it must be remembered, purely relating to the management of an estate. As he signed these leases or agreements in his own name, without any procuration of or for his landlord, and writes, I notice, always in the first person in making the arrangements with the tenant; we must take it that he was possessed of the fullest authority an agent could have in all matters that came within the term "management of an estate," and I know of nothing so important or so thoroughly part of the good management of an estate as the judicious alteration of the style of farming or using of the land on an estate. Moreover, I think the model leases under which the agricultural tenancies were supposed to be held on this estate (leases said to be nearly one hundred years old) can scarcely have been read when it was argued that the agent could not go outside their covenants, for I find that two of the covenants are of such a character that the agent's power of altering them could scarcely be objected to on behalf of the landlords. The first is that each tenant on the estate must keep a game-cock and the other that he must keep a dog. The refusal to pay compensation to the tenant might as well be justified on the ground that the tenant had broken his agreement in not keeping either a game-cock or a dog. If the landlords could have proved as a fact the want of authority on the part of the agent they would have done so; but not having done it, I have no doubt that their contention is unfounded and that the claimant is entitled to succeed on that ground.

The next is a more difficult question—as to whether or not the Agricultural Holdings Act deprives the claimant of the rights he possessed under the agreement. Those rights turn out to be very valuable, but they do not give the claimant anything that he has not paid for; there is nothing allowed him for any profit on his outlay. The real question is whether the landlords are entitled to the benefit of the outlay of the claimant by way of improvement upon their property without paying for it. It was to provide for this repayment for improvements that the Agricultural Holdings and Market Gardeners Acts were passed, yet it was boldly contended that though without the Act the plaintiff would have received this compensation, yet that the Act has advisedly taken away rights, which in this case are worth £1,500 at least, without any compensation at all.

I am not surprised that no authority can be found for this contention; nor am I surprised that no direct authority can be found against it, for no one before has been bold enough to suggest such a proposition; but the case of Newby v. Eckersley may be read as supporting the view I am taking, though this point was not, I admit, directly before the Court of Appeal in giving their judgments. The facts of the present case seem to me to afford a very good illustration of the working of the Act. Let us assume there had been no agreement, but that the tenant had planted the farm as a market garden, and enormously improved the value, with the full knowledge and approval of the landlord, but without any agreement on his part to pay an increased valuation. He would then have been entitled to no compensation beyond the customary valuation for agricultural land, and that was justly felt such a grievance that an alteration in making valuations was desired, and the Act, therefore, states that, subject to questions of notice and approval by the landlord, the tenant shall have compensation; but as by some exceptional custom in some part of England he might have obtained some compensation for this improvement, the Act also states that if you take the benefit of the Act you must give up all other claims for compensation by custom for the same improvements; but if the tenant does not want to claim under the Act, and is not claiming under the Act, then he is entitled to what the law will give him under the custom, or under any special agreement stating what his valuation is to be. So here he was entitled by his agreement to have a valuation made in a particular way on his giving up his farm

The agreement was in writing, and made since the passing of the Act, and as he claims nothing under the Act, it binds the parties. It seems incredible that an Act which was especially intended to benefit the tenant should, by its provisions, which must be assumed to have been known to the Legislature, injure him most seriously by depriving him of rights he previously possessed. In fact, it has been argued on behalf of the landlords that English landlords and tenants are not entitled to the liberty of freedom of contract, but that all their dealings are now to be regulated by the iron-bound regulations of an Act of Parliament, which, though passed for the benefit of the tenant, is, if that argument be correct, the most iniquitous piece of legislation, of legalized robbery, that was ever introduced into the House of Commons. What do the landlords get by reason of the tenant's expenditure? Much more than pay. With an expenditure by the tenant of this money the rental value of the land has vastly increased. If the farm was worth £2 per acre before it is worth about £4 now; and if you capitalize that extra £2 at only twenty years' purchase you get a sum of about £4,800 in return for the £1,500 the landlords are asked to pay; whilst under any circumstances the landlords get another £500 or £600 worth of work for nothing, even if they pay the £1,500 now asked for, as the valuer has found by his award that, if the tenant is to be paid for the buildings, &c., he has erected, besides this disputed valuation he would be entitled to £2,000 odd instead of £1,500. I have not forgotten that some small portion of the farm is still under arable cultivation, and therefore it must not be assumed that the rental of all the farm will have increased as I have suggested; but I have given the figures just mentioned to show how the matter must be looked at to find whether or no the landlords are being treated unfairly in the matter.

For these reasons it seems to me clear that by the latter portion of section 57 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, Pearson is entitled to the valuation under the agreement entered into in 1887, and that that right is not nullified by the earlier words of the section, which, though very confused, can be interpreted logically in the way I have described; and if they are somewhat transposed and read in this way, "A tenant shall not be entitled to claim compensation in respect of any improvement for which he is entitled to compensation under or in pursuance of this Act, by custom or otherwise, than in manner authorized by this Act," there is less difficulty, I think, in interpreting them, although grammatically their present reading is more correct. For these reasons my judgment must be for the claimant Pearson.

KENNEDY, J.—In the result I agree with the judgment which has been delivered. Upon the first two points I entertain no doubt. The claimant here is the tenant. He was since 1871 tenant to Mr. Lane Fox, and the agency since 1871 was in the hands of Leatham, who is stated and found to have acted as agent in the management of the estate—in other words, he was the general manager of the estate. The tenancy of the 30th of October, 1883, was arranged and completed through Leatham, and in 1887 the tenant found that, in his words, "the farm was going from bad to worse," and he wrote the letter which has been lost, but of which parol evidence was given, stating that he wished to know whether he would be allowed a market garden valuation on quitting the farm if he were to continue tenant of the farm cultivated as a market garden. On the 4th of May, 1887, Leatham wrote, in terms, in answer to that application: "I will allow you a market garden valuation should you leave the farm you now occupy under George Lane Fox, Esq." Upon the faith of that letter the tenant expended large sums of money in carrying out the suggestion which had been accepted.

On behalf of the landlord it is contended, in the first place, that there was no sufficient proof of authority in the agent. I should be very sorry to hold, where the tenant has to deal with an agent in the same position as Leatham, who is described as the general manager of the estates, through whom the lease has been given, and a question as to the cultivation of either the whole or part of the farm arises, the tenancy still continuing, that the tenant was not entitled to place reliance on the assent in writing of the agent, but was bound, in order to be safe, to have authority produced to him that the person who is described, and also actually employed, as the manager of the estate has only power with the express consent of the landlord to make any change in the form of cultivation. Upon the faith of that letter the tenant incurred large expenditure. Mr. Danckwerts suggested that a heavy tax would be imposed on the landlord. For aught I know, the action of the tenant may have considerably increased the value of the property. However, I have nothing to do with that; the only question is whether there was an agreement for good consideration. I think there was such an agreement and that the agent had authority to make it. Both these points therefore fail.

The one point upon which I confess I have felt some hesitation is the construction of the statute. Section 57 is one which can be read over and over again without one becoming confident as to what it exactly means. It is a section which contains (and that is, I think, always an unfortunate method of construction) first of all a negative statement, and then a positive statement withdrawing part of the negative statement. [The learned judge read section 57.] That section is relied on by counsel for the landlords, but I have come to the same conclusion as my brother Grantham for these reasons: I think, as Mr. Lawrence contended, that the section is not intended to say that the compensation must be only under the Act if a man could, by taking certain steps, bring himself within it. That construction is, I think, more in unison with the obvious intention of the Act as a whole, which never intended—and section 3 goes to show this—that agreements for good consideration should be treated as valueless if the tenant wishes to avail himself of them. The marginal note to section 57 leaves one in the same difficulty as the text does, for it says: "Compensation under this Act shall be exclusive." That does not enlighten one, but rather increases the difficulty. In my opinion not only is there a possibility of construing the section according to Mr. Lawrence's contention, but, further, there is the construction which the Court of Appeal in Newby v. Eckersley have put upon the Act. I agree that that case is not a decision expressly dealing with this point, but I do not feel justified in differing from a construction of part of the words of this section, which is given in terms by A. L. Smith and Chitty, L.JJ., and which is, I think, implied in the judgment of Collins, L.J. According to those judgments the word "tenant" in section 57 must be read in the light of the prior sections and as meaning a tenant claiming compensation under the Act. If it is so read, it does not include the tenant in this case, for he is not claiming compensation under the Act, but under an agreement. He is claiming under an agreement in the same way as the tenant was in Newby v. Eckersley, and if so he is not excluded from the benefit of the agreement. Following the same reasoning, the word "tenant" in section 59 must, I suppose, be read as meaning a tenant claiming compensation under the Act.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the claim for the lesser sum, £1,546, ought to be allowed.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) June 16, 28, 1899.

The plaintiff, a moneylender whose reputation was such that the defendant would not have dealt with him, by fraudulently concealing his identity, induced the defendant to borrow money from him. On discovering the plaintiff's fraud, the defendant, within a reasonable time, repudiated the contract.

Held, that he was entitled so to do, the fraud being material to the inducement which brought about the contract.

Application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Bucknill, J., and a jury.

The plaintiff sued the defendant as maker of a promissory note for £150, dated the 19th of August, 1898.

The defence was that the defendant had been induced to make the promissory note by the fraudulent misrepresentation of the plaintiff that he was one George James Addison; that the defendant would not have given the note if he had known that Addison was in fact the plaintiff Isaac Gordon, a notorious moneylender; that the defendant had repudiated the contract within a reasonable time after discovering the fact that Addison was in reality Isaac Gordon.

The defendant paid £110 into court.

The facts of the case, which are fully set out in the judgment, were shortly as follows: The plaintiff was a moneylender who carried on business in London and elsewhere under various names, including that of Addison. In August, 1898, the defendant, being desirous of obtaining a loan, answered a moneylender's advertisement which was in the name of Addison. The defendant obtained a loan of £100 from Addison for which he gave a promissory note for £150, the £50 being for interest. The business was conducted through correspondence, and the parties never met. The note provided for the repayment of the amount by instalments, the whole to become due upon default in paying one instalment. The defendant made default in paying the first instalment. Several letters passed between the plaintiff, writing in the name of Addison, and the defendant. The defendant discovered on the 20th of December, 1898, that Addison was the same person as Isaac Gordon. On the 28th of December this action was commenced. On the 6th of January, 1899, the defendant's solicitors formally repudiated the contract.

The defendant counterclaimed for damages for libels alleged to have been written by the plaintiff in letters to the defendant. The facts as to the counterclaim are fully set out in the judgment.

The jury, in answer to questions put to them by the learned judge, found that the plaintiff intentionally concealed from the defendant that he was Isaac Gordon to induce the defendant to borrow money from him, as if from another, and that the defendant was so induced; that the plaintiff did so fraudulently; that the defendant contracted with Addison believing him to be a moneylender of that name; that the defendant repudiated the contract within a reasonable time after he knew that he could do so; that a libel had been published on the defendant. The jury assessed the damages for the libel at £400.

On these findings the judge entered judgment for the defendant on the claim and counterclaim.

Montague Shearman, for the plaintiff.—The fact that the plaintiff concealed his real name was not a concealment of such a material fact as to entitle the defendant to repudiate the contract. It is not illegal or against public policy for persons to trade in assumed names. On the contrary, it is an everyday occurrence. The identity of the party to a contract is only a material fact in cases of contract for personal services; it is certainly immaterial in the case of a loan, for the borrower must repay the advance, whoever may be the lender. [He referred to Smith v. Wheatcroft, 27 W. R. 42, 9 Ch. D. 223.] Secondly, the repudiation of the contract by the defendant came too late. He discovered the identity of the plaintiff with Addison on the 20th of December, and it was not until the 6th of January, after issue of the writ, that he repudiated. As to the libels, there was no evidence of publication, and the damages were excessive.

Hugh Fraser, for the defendant.—The concealment of the plaintiff's real name was a material fact, for the plaintiff's reputation was such that if the defendant had known he would never have contracted with him. Moreover, the jury have found in the defendant's favour on the question of materiality. The repudiation was not too late. The defendant was bound to repudiate within a reasonable time, and the jury have found that he did so. The defendant did nothing to affirm the contract after he discovered the facts. There may be repudiation after action brought: Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 20 W. R. 189, L. R. 7 Ex. 26.

June 28.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The question in this case is whether a person whose evil reputation in business is such that no person will deal with him, can, after fraudulently concealing his identity and thus inducing another to enter into a contract which he otherwise would not have done, prevent that other, when sued by the defrauding party upon the contract, from insisting upon the ordinary defence of the defrauded—viz., that he had been induced by the fraud of the plaintiff to enter into the contract sued on. The plaintiff Isaac Gordon is a moneylender, and he sues the defendant upon his promissory note for £150 dated the 19th of August, 1898, in favour of George James Addison to secure an advance of £100, the extra £50 being for interest. Whether George James Addison is a fictitious name or that of the plaintiff's manager

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I do not know, for although the plaintiff swore in the box that it was a fictitious name I find him writing to the defendant as late as the 28th of December, 1898, that the defendant was to address all communications to him and not again to "my manager Mr. Addison, of my London office, as the matter is entirely out of his hands, and I have given him instructions not to have anything more to do with the matter." On which side lies the truth as to this I do not know, but I will assume that the name is fictitious, as the plaintiff swore. In the view I take of this case it is immaterial whether it be so or not, for to liken this case, as it has been, to that of a person trading under a firm's name, or to that of an agent contracting in his own name for an undisclosed principal, is to liken it to that with which it has no similitude, and between which and it there is in reality nothing in common. The defence of the defendant is that he was induced to borrow the money and to sign the note sued on by the fraud of the plaintiff, and that upon discovering the fraud he repudiated the transaction.

The questions which were left to the jury by my brother Bucknill and the answers thereto were these: (1) Did the plaintiff intentionally conceal from the defendant that he was Isaac Gordon to induce him (the defendant) to borrow money of him as if from another, and, if so, was the defendant so induced?—Yes. (2) Did he—i.e., Isaac Gordon—do so fraudulently?—Yes. (3) Did the defendant contract with Addison believing him to be a moneylender of that name?—Yes. (4) Did the defendant repudiate the contract so soon as, or within a reasonable time after, he discovered that Addison was really Gordon?—The defendant repudiated the contract within a reasonable time after he knew he could do so. It was argued for the plaintiff that these findings were immaterial, because the fraud proved was not material to the contract sued on; for, said he, whether the defendant contracted with Isaac Gordon or with any other lender of money to take a loan of £100 and pay £50 for it, it was the same thing to the defendant, for, when the day of payment arrived, the defendant by law would have to pay the money contracted to be paid to whomsoever he had contracted to pay it, and it mattered not to him who that person was.

In my opinion the first point which arises is not whether the fraud was material to the contract entered into, but whether the fraud was material to the inducement which brought about the contract; and, if so, the jury having found the fact of fraud, I cannot doubt that the fraudulent concealing of the plaintiff's name was that which induced the defendant to enter into the contract upon which he is now sued, and was therefore material to the inducement. On what ground is it to be said that a defendant who has been induced by fraud into signing a contract, when sued upon it, cannot set up the well-known defence that he was induced by the fraud of the plaintiff to enter into it? If the fraud be material to the inducement, it appears to me plain that he can. And further I will say that to enter into a contract for a loan with a creditor such as Isaac Gordon (I will give his own description of himself in a moment) so that, when the day for payment arrives, the borrower can have no possible chance of a day's or even an hour's grace, but on the contrary has the certainty of being pestered with writs and threats of writs and bailiffs and bankruptcy notices (see plaintiff's letter of the 19th of December, 1898, under the name of Addison, about which hereafter), whereby life is rendered unbearable, and health is often injured, is by no means in my opinion the same thing as entering into a contract for a loan with a man who, when the day of payment arrives, does none of these things, but on the contrary deals in a fair and non-oppressive manner; and to contract with the oppressive class is very much to the detriment of the borrower. I am by no means prepared to say that the fraud in this case was not material to the contract itself. But, whether it be so or not, I will refer to a passage in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford) in the House of Lords in Smith v. Kay, 7 H. L. Cas. 750, at p. 759, when dealing with the contention of the immateriality of a representation, which passage is very much in point. He says: "But can it be permitted to a party who has practised deception with a view to a particular end, which has been attained by it, to speculate upon what might have been the result if there had been a full communication of the truth?" I apply this to the present case. There is also a passage in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls (Sir John Romilly) in Pulsford v. Richards, 1 W. R. 295, 22 L. J Ch. 559, at p. 562, pertinent to this question, but I need not cite it at length.

It was pressed upon us in argument that, if we upheld the verdict and judgment given against Isaac Gordon in this case, no moneylender hereafter would be able to trade excepting in his own name, and that this would be most detrimental and unjust to the community. But this is not so, and in deciding this case I decide nothing of the kind, for I would point out that amongst moneylenders, as in other ranks of life, there are many given to fair dealing and others given to the most rapacious tyranny known to mankind, and, if a moneylender of the first kind honestly trades in an assumed name, that is one case, and clearly not this case, but, if a moneylender of the second class secretes his own name and uses another name for the express purpose of fraudulently inducing a man to trade with him and to get that man into his clutches, that is altogether another and a different case, and the two are entirely distinct. The defendant in this case is a gentleman who in the month of August, 1898, was desirous of borrowing £100, and the following advertisement attracted his attention: "Money promptly and privately advanced in sums of £50 to £50,000 to nobility . . . ladies and gentlemen . . . on their own promissory note . . . without any unnecessary routine, securities, or preliminary fees, at about one-tenth of the interest charged elsewhere. The strictest privacy guaranteed, and those in need of financial accommodation without any of the objectionable features of the ordinary loan office are cordially invited to apply to me personally or by letter." (Signed) "George James Addison, 3, Holles-street, Cavendish-square."

A passage from Pothier's Traité des Obligations, section 19, cited by Fry, J., in Smith v. Wheatcroft, 9 Ch. D., p. 230, in which case, however, the learned judge expressly held that there had been no fraud, seems to me to be important, supposing there was no fraud applicable to the present case, and I will cite the passage. It is this: "Does error in regard to the person with whom I contract destroy the consent and annul the agreement? I think that this question ought to be decided by a distinction. Whenever the consideration of the person with whom I am willing to contract enters as an element into the contract which I am willing to make, error with regard to the person destroys my consent and consequently annuls the contract. On the contrary, when the consideration of the person with whom I thought I was contracting does not enter at all into the contract, and I should have been equally willing to make the contract with any person whatever as with him with whom I thought I was contracting, the contract ought to stand." Now the advertisement above-mentioned points out that George James Addison, with whom the defendant thought he was contracting, was not as ordinary loan offices were, and that he traded at one-tenth of the interest charged elsewhere, and this appears to me to afford evidence that with a man trading as Addison said he did the defendant was willing to contract, and that the consideration of the person did enter into the contract, and upon this ground apart from fraud the contract ought not to stand.

But in this case there is the additional element why the contract ought not to stand—viz., the undoubted fraud of Isaac Gordon, who is now suing upon the contract induced by his own fraud. I must here state who the plaintiff Isaac Gordon is, and, in order that there may be no inaccuracy, I will cite only from his own letters and his own admissions as to what manner of man he is. He describes himself in writing when pressing the defendant as "the extortionate and usurious moneylender with about a gross of aliases, and that he is the hottest and bitterest of creditors." He admits that he is not a British subject, but was born in Russia, and has been convicted of fraud, and has charged 3,000 per cent. interest, but would not say if he had charged 5,000 per cent., that he carried on business under six or eight different aliases at Birmingham, Bristol, Bath, Manchester, Liverpool, Oxford, London, and Leeds. I find in a letter which he wrote to the defendant that he expresses himself thus: "I will make it as hot and as bitter as I possibly can for you, upon which you may stake your life." Such is the man from his own description and admissions, and no wonder that such was the odium into which he had got in the public eye as a lender of money that he found it necessary to give instructions to his clerks when dealing with his customers, "which instructions were to be strictly observed and rigorously carried out," which amongst other things contained as follows: "(4) The greatest care must be taken that they (the customers) should not be able to smell a rat or to let them (the customers) in any way whatever get any wiser or lead them to think that the different names they are dealing with are one and the same person, or it is simply ruin." Can more cogent evidence exist of the plaintiff's own view as to the materiality of the suppression of his identity when inducing customers to enter into contracts? The defendant stated, and the jury believed him, that if he had known that Addison was Gordon he would not have answered his advertisement or signed the promissory note, and that he would have done anything rather than go to Gordon; that he had known of Gordon from what he had read and that he believed the advertisement of Addison was one by a person of that name. I have not the slightest doubt that the findings of the jury on the questions left to them upon this part of the case were absolutely accurate and should be upheld.

It was then argued for the plaintiff that, even if so, the defendant, when he found out that the person who was pressing him for payment of £150 was Isaac Gordon, did not repudiate the note in time, for he did not do so until the 6th of January, 1899, whereas he had found out that Isaac Gordon was the man upon the 20th of December, 1898. In my judgment, when a person is defrauded into making a contract under which he takes a benefit, he has upon discovering the fraud the right to elect whether he will continue to treat the contract as binding or will disaffirm it. To cite from the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co., L. R. 7 Ex., at p. 35, "In such cases the question is, has the person on whom the fraud was practised elected not to avoid the contract; or has he elected to avoid it; or has he made no election?" Upon the 18th of December, 1898, before the defendant had found out that it was Isaac Gordon who was pressing him upon his promissory note, given in favour of Addison, he made an offer to Addison to pay the £150 by instalments. This was answered by a letter of the 19th of December in the name of Addison, which contains the passage: "I hope to teach you and let you know that the usurer whom you are dealing with in the present instance is one of the hottest creditors you have ever had, and take it from me, Mr. Street, that before you will get out of your obligation to me you will find it a bitter task and a very hard job, and on account of your letter of this morning I will make it as hot and as bitter as I possibly can for you, upon which you may stake your life. The next you will hear from me will be a writ and bailiffs, then bankruptcy if necessary." This letter being apparently typical of Isaac Gordon, the defendant obtained information that it was his, and upon the next day the defendant wrote charging Addison with being "the notorious Gordon," and stating "you've had your offer, and as you won't take it you'll only have yourself to thank when you get nothing," and suggesting some arrangement in the matter. On the 28th of December, 1898, Isaac Gordon for the first time wrote to the defendant disclosing his identity and suggesting some amicable arrangement, and he issued a writ against the defendant; and on the next day, the 29th of December, the defendant wrote to Gordon stating that he had sent his writ on to Mr. Jekyll, his solicitor, and asking Gordon in the future to write to him. On the next day Gordon wrote a most abusive letter to the defendant, which forms one of the subject-matters of the counterclaim for libel in this action, which was answered by the defendant on the 1st of January, 1899, and on the 6th of January Mr. Jekyll wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor, Mr. Davis, stating clearly how the defendant had been defrauded into accepting the loan, and stating that he had no desire to avoid payment of the money borrowed at a reasonable rate of interest, and that he was therefore willing to repay the £100 advanced, together with £10 for interest; and he added, "If this offer is not accepted we shall defend the action."

I cannot find upon the facts of this case that the defendant elected not to avoid the contract; but, on the contrary, he clearly elected to avoid it on the 6th of January, 1899. The Exchequer Chamber in Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co. held that though lapse of time without rescinding will furnish evidence that the person defrauded has determined to affirm the contract, and when the lapse of time is great it probably would in practice be treated as conclusive evidence to show that he has so determined, yet, as Mellor, J., said in delivering the judgment of the court, "We cannot see any principle and we are not aware of any authority for saying that the mere fact that one who is a party to the fraud has issued a writ and commenced an action before the rescission is such a change of position (of the defrauding party) as would preclude the defrauded party from exercising his election to rescind, nor do we see the principle or discover the authority for saying that it is necessary that there should be a declaration of his intention to rescind prior to plea." Under his plea the defendant paid into court £100, together with £10 for interest. In my opinion, considering what was taking place, the lapse of time between the 20th of December, 1898, or possibly the 28th of December, when Gordon first disclosed his identity, and the 6th of January, 1899, is not such as to lead to the conclusion that the defendant had elected not to avoid the contract, but on the contrary he has elected to avoid it, and the jury, in my opinion, were well warranted in answering the fourth question as they did, and there is good evidence to support it.

I now come to the counterclaim for libel contained in the letters of the 19th of December, 1898, and the 31st of December, 1898. The first letter contains the expression, "I am pretty well used to gentlemen of your sort, and I know, and only too well, how to treat them." In the letter of the 31st of December the plaintiff writes to the defendant: "Your letter may do very well elsewhere, but not for the extortionate and usurious moneylender with a gross of aliases, who is pretty well used to gentlemen of your sort and their bouncing ways, and who knows, and only too well, how to treat them. You may depend upon it that you will get the bailiffs and be made bankrupt as soon as ever possible . . . as I hope to teach you and let you see that the many-aliased Isaac Gordon is the hottest and one of the most bitterest creditors you have ever had. You can abuse as much as you like, as I treat your epistles as though they came from an impecunious dog, and hope to have you through the bankruptcy court, as well as your wife, who is equally liable to me and has separate estate in her own right. So first wait and see what the many-aliased Isaac Gordon can and will do for you." It is not said that these letters do not constitute libels, and that they do not carry some at any rate of the innuendo alleged by the defendant, but it is said, first, that there is no evidence of publication, and, secondly, that the damages given—viz., £400, were excessive. There is clear evidence of publication as to the second and more important letter, for the plaintiff admits that it was copied by one of his clerks. As regards the first evidence I think there was also evidence of publication, but it is not really material to discuss this point for the second letter is the real libel. I know of no rule which is applicable when the court is asked to say that damages in libel assessed by a jury are excessive, which has any application to this case. It is said that the jury have taken into consideration, when awarding the damages, the infamous character of the plaintiff prior to the publication of the libels, but this certainly is not proved, and, on the contrary, the insolent and vindictive conduct of the writings of the plaintiff, going no further back than the 19th of December, 1898, are ample justification to the jury in awarding to the defendant on the counterclaim £400. The argument that the defendant had lost nothing by the libels, and that the clerk's reading the letters of Gordon could not damage the defendant, are of no avail, for those are not considerations upon which damages for libel are assessed, and the points taken are no ground for holding that the damages are excessive. In my judgment the verdict and judgment must stand, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J., agrees in this judgment.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I only wish to add that the case of Moorhouse v. Woolfe, 46 L. T. Rep. 374, 30 W. R. Dig. 51, shows that the issue of the advertisement by the plaintiff made the misrepresentation contained in it material to the inducement to the contract entitling the defendant to repudiate it.

WOOLFE v. DE BRAAM. (a.)

Practice—Mode of trial—Trial with jury—Leave to defend given without any condition or direction as to mode of trial—Right of defendant to trial with jury —R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14, rr. 6, 8; ord. 36, r. 6.

Where on a summons under order 14 an order has been made giving the defendant leave to defend without any condition or direction as to mode of trial, the judge at chambers cannot on a subsequent summons deprive the defendant of his right under ord. 36, r. 6, to have the action tried with a jury.

Appeal by the defendant from the refusal of Lawrance, J., to order that the action should be tried with a jury.

The action was brought to recover money lent with interest. The plaintiff having taken out a summons under order 14, the master gave the defendant unconditional leave to defend, and ordered that the action should be tried by the official referee. On appeal Lawrance, J., varied the master's order by directing that the action should be put into the Short Cause List. Subsequently a summons was taken out for directions, and at the hearing before the master the defendant asked that the action might be tried with a jury. The master referred the matter to Lawrance, J., who refused to make an order for trial with a jury.

The defendant appealed.

Foote, Q.C., and Scarlett, for the defendant.—The learned judge said that, as the action had been put into the Short Cause List, it could not be tried with a jury. But it is common practice for actions in the Short Cause List to be tried with a jury. By ord. 36, r. 6, any party has a right to a trial with a jury in any cause or matter other than those specified in rules 3, 4, and 5. In this case the learned judge had no jurisdiction to refuse an order for trial with a jury.

Hugo Young, Q.C., and Lowenthal, for the plaintiff. —The learned judge had jurisdiction to order that this action should be tried without a jury. By ord. 14, r. 6, leave to defend may be given unconditionally, or subject to such terms as to giving security or time or mode of trial or otherwise as the judge may think fit.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed. I am not satisfied that the learned judge, in the exercise of his discretion, came to the conclusion that this case was one which ought not to be tried with a jury. At any rate he did not make it a term of his order giving the defendant leave to defend that the trial should be without a jury. If the learned judge meant to hold that cases in the Short Cause List could not be tried with a jury, I think he was wrong. In my opinion the defendant has a right, under ord. 36, r. 6, to require a trial with a jury, and we ought to order that the case shall be tried with a jury.

COLLINS, L.J.—The order giving the defendant leave to defend did not contain a condition that the action should be tried without a jury. That being so, in my opinion the learned judge had no jurisdiction on a subsequent summons to deprive the defendant of the right given to him by ord. 36, r. 6, of having the action tried with a jury. I do not think that the learned judge meant that actions put into the Short Cause List could not be tried with a jury.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — It was open to Lawrance, J., on the summons under order 14 to make any condition he thought proper to his order giving leave to defend, but he made no conditions. It was open to him under rule 8 (a) of order 14 to give directions as to the mode of trial; he might have ordered the action to be tried without a jury. But he could only do so at that time and by that order. He gave no such directions. The defendant then had a right under ord. 36, r. 6, to a trial with a jury. It was not open to the learned judge on a subsequent summons to deprive him of that right.

ELLIS (Appellant) v. CAMBERWELL ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (Respondents). (a.)

Rating—Metropolis—Quinquennial valuation—Alteration in value — Provisional and supplemental valuation—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 43, 46, 47.

Section 43 of the Metropolis (Valuation) Act, 1869, enacts that the valuation list as approved by the assessment committee shall last for five years subject to any supplemental or provisional list as provided by sections 46 and 47.

Held, that to justify the insertion of hereditaments in the supplemental and provisional lists on the ground of an alteration in value, the alteration must be such that if the fact relied on as constituting the valuation had been present at the time of the original valuation, it could properly have been taken into consideration in arriving at the assessment; that the fact constituting the alteration in value should affect the hereditament in question in particular; that a general rise in values would not be a fact constituting such an alteration; and that the onus of proving that the cause of the alteration in value is one which does not affect all classes is on those who make the supplemental or provisional list.

Appeal from the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) upon a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions upon an appeal against the supplemental valuation list for the parish of Camberwell for the year 1897.

The facts were as follows: The appellant had been since October, 1896, the occupier of a public-house known as the "Adam and Eve," High-street, Peckham, in the parish of Camberwell. At the quinquennial valuation in 1895 the gross and rateable values of the public-house were fixed at £485 and £405 respectively, which values were duly entered in the quinquennial valuation list made in that year.

By a provisional list made in December, 1896, the assessment of the public-house was increased by the overseers to £600 gross and £500 rateable value, and objection was made by the appellant to the increased assessment on the ground that the said public-house had not in the course of the year in which the provisional list was made increased in value by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building, nor had there been any increase of value from any cause within the meaning of section 47 of the Valuation (Metropolis Act) Act, 1869. At the hearing of the objection the assessment committee endeavoured to get from the appellant information as to the premium given by him for the lease of the public-house. This information the appellant refused to give, and the assessment committee, after hearing the objection and viewing the public-house, reduced the assessment to £575 gross and £485 rateable value.

In the supplemental valuation list made in 1897 the appellant's public-house was again valued and assessed at £575 gross and £485 rateable value. The appellant objected to the valuation, and, on appearing before the assessment committee, contended (inter alia) (1) that the public-house had been improperly included in the provisional list and therefore ought not to be included in the supplemental list, and that it was therein too highly rated; (2) that no alteration in the value of the public-house had taken place during the twelve months preceding the making of the supplemental list within the meaning of section 46, sub-section 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; (3) that the overseers were not in law entitled to consider, or in any way to act on any sum of money paid or supposed to have been paid, for the public-house either since the date of the valuation list in force at the time of the making of the provisional list or at all.

The assessment committee, after hearing the objections, refused to give the appellant any relief, and he appealed to the London Quarter Sessions.

At the hearing of the appeal counsel for the appellant objected to any questions being asked or any evidence being given about the premium paid by the appellant. The court, however, overruled the objection, and the fact was elicited by the respondents on cross-examination that the appellant had paid £16,400 as the consideration for his lease. No evidence was given as to the precise amount of the premium paid in 1895 or any time previously, but it was admitted by one of the appellant's witnesses that assuming the valuation appearing in the quinquennial list made in 1895 to have been calculated according to the method usually adopted in the parish of Camberwell the valuation must have been based on a supposed payment of a premium of about £6,400. The assessment committee, however, at the time of the revision of the quinquennial valuation list did not in fact know the precise amount of the premium which had been paid by the then occupier. Evidence was given by a valuer on behalf of the respondents that there had been since the date of the quinquennial valuation list a general appreciation of licensed premises throughout the metropolis, and that, in his opinion, the annual value of the said public-house had between April and October, 1896, increased by about £100. It was, however, admitted that there had been no structural alteration to the public-house. No evidence was given of any circumstances specially affecting the annual value of the public-house.

The respondents contended that they were not bound to give any such evidence, but that it was enough for them to show that the value had in fact increased. It was further admitted that no public-houses had been placed in the provisional or supplemental lists except such as had in fact been sold since the date of the quinquennial valuation thereof, although public-houses in the neighbourhood had generally increased in value. For the assessment committee it was contended that it was not necessary that there should be a structural alteration of the rated premises in order to warrant their insertion in a supplemental list; that the facts mentioned as to the premium given for the lease of the public-house were evidence of an alteration in matters stated in the quinquennial valuation list during the twelve months preceding the making of the supplemental list under section 46 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; and that the payment of such premium showed that there had been such a material and unforeseen alteration of the value of the public-house as to warrant its insertion in the supplemental list.

For the appellant it was contended that the facts above mentioned were not in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of section 46, sub-section 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and that all evidence as to the amount of premium paid by the appellant for the public-house in October, 1896, was irrelevant and inadmissible, and that the amount of such premium in the absence of any evidence, save as hereinbefore stated as to the premiums previously paid, would not afford any indication of any alteration in the value of the public-house.

The court of quarter sessions gave judgment in the following terms: "We find that although there had been no structural alteration in the appellant's premises between 1896 and April, 1897, there had been alteration in value in these premises by way of increase in that period. The appellant has failed to establish in our opinion that the alteration in gross and rateable values made by the assessment committee in the supplemental list is in excess of the actual increased value within the statutory period, and we confirm the alteration of the list made by the assessment committee with costs." The values in the supplemental lists were, therefore, ordered to remain as assessed by the assessment committee.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the alteration in value which took place during the twelve months preceding the making of the supplemental valuation list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46, sub-section 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; (2) whether the amount of premium paid by the appellant in October, 1896, for the said premises ought to have been received in evidence; (3) whether the amount of such premium was in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of that sub-section. If the court should answer all the foregoing questions in the affirmative the order of sessions was to be affirmed, and if the court should answer all or any of the questions in the negative the order of sessions was to be quashed and the gross and rateable values of the public-house were to be reduced to £485 and £405 respectively, or the premises were to be struck out of the valuation list, or the court was to make such other or further order as to the court should seem fit. The Divisional Court answered the questions in the affirmative, and affirmed the order of quarter sessions.

The Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 43: The valuation list as approved by the assessment committee . . . shall come into force at the beginning of the year (commencing on the 6th of April) succeeding that in which it is made, and shall last for five years, subject to any alterations that may be made by any supplemental or provisional list as hereinafter mentioned.

Section 46: Every valuation list shall be revised in manner directed by this Act, and such revision in every period of five years . . . shall be conducted as follows: (1) In each of the first four years of such period a supplemental list shall, if necessary, be made out in the same form as the valuation list, and shall show all the alterations which have taken place during the preceding twelve months in any of the matters stated in the valuation list, but shall contain only the hereditaments affected by such alterations. If no alteration has taken place which makes a supplemental list necessary, the overseers shall send a certificate to that effect to the assessment committee in place of such list, which certificate may be in the form contained in the second schedule to this Act.

Section 47 provides that "if in the course of any year the value of any hereditament is increased by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building or is from any cause increased or reduced in value," the provisions contained in that section as to making a provisional list shall take effect.

Nov. 18.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the judgment of the Court as follows: Section 43 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, which, as the preamble states, was passed to secure uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in the metropolis, provides that the valuation list shall last for five years "subject to any alterations that may be made by any supplemental or provisional list as hereinafter mentioned." Now, alteration is provided for in section 46 and section 47. The former provides for supplemental valuation, the latter for provisional valuation. Supplemental valuation takes place at the end of each year. The old list is then to be supplemented by making a new list of all the alterations which have taken place within the last twelve months. If there are no such alterations which make a supplemental list necessary in any of the matters in the valuation list (which, of course, includes gross and rateable value) the overseers are to send to the assessment committee a certificate to that effect. Provisional valuation deals with the alteration by increase or decrease in value of a particular hereditament "from any cause" during the twelve months. The provisional valuation takes effect immediately and remains in force till the making of the supplemental or other valuation list at the end of the year. The alterations in the supplemental list seem to be the confirmed provisional valuations. It seems to follow that whether one is dealing with the supplemental list or with the provisional list the question whether there has been such an alteration in the value of the premises as to justify an alteration in the valuation seems to be the same in either case. Now what are the conditions of such an alteration? It seems to us they are these: (1) The alteration in value must be such that, if the fact relied on as constituting the alteration had been present at the time of the original valuation, it could properly have been taken into consideration in arriving at the assessment; (2) that the fact constituting the alteration in value should affect the hereditament in question in particular. We do not think that a general rise in values would be a fact constituting such an alteration. This, it seems to us, would be inconsistent with the expressed intention of the Act that the valuation list should remain in force for five years. Moreover, we do not think that the mere proof of a rise in value of a class of hereditaments including the one sought to be dealt with by the provisional or supplemental valuation would of itself justify a new valuation under sections 46 and 47, because such a rise in no way negatives a general rise in the values of hereditaments of all classes. After all, the rise in the value of licensed houses generally depends on a general cause, such as prosperous times, which give the mass of the people more money to spend in the luxuries of life, whether drink, or bread, or meat, or clothing, or sight-seeing, or houses, or anything else. The licensed victualler will obtain a better price if he sells his public-house; the butcher or the baker will obtain a better price if he sells his business. Theatres and music-halls will be easy to sell. Houses and leases will command good prices to let and to sell. All this flows from one cause, the prosperity of the people. We do not think sections 46 and 47 apply in such a case to any class of hereditaments increased in value as a class by a cause affecting all classes, such as general prosperity. The fact, however, that the increase in value affects a class as a whole will not exclude the increase from the operation of these sections, provided it is shown that the increase of value arises from some cause affecting merely the class, and not from the cause of general prosperity affecting all classes of the community —e.g., if the taste for cycling makes factories which are conveniently situated for this manufacture command higher prices to sell or to let, this is a cause affecting a class—viz., premises suitable for cycle manufacturing which go up in value by reason of a new fashionable taste; but the cause is independent of the general prosperity of the community, and such an increase in value would justify an alteration under sections 46 and 47 during the currency of the quinquennial period of the assessment. The same would be true if war sent up the value of premises licensed for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of gunpowder, the cause of increase of value being independent of general prosperity. But in each case it is for those who alter the assessment to prove the nature and cause of the alteration in value. It is easy to do this where the increase of value arises from some local cause affecting a class or some hereditaments in a class—for instance, when the building of a bridge sends up the value of the houses of a street thus made more accessible, or the removal of a cul-de-sac makes the houses in a street of shops more valuable from an increased traffic through the street, or the houses in a residential street less valuable from the increase of noise. Betterment or depreciation of such a character affecting all or some of the houses in a street is clearly within sections 46 and 47, and the cause of the increase in value is easy of proof. The proof is more difficult where the cause of the increase in value is not a local physical cause, but in our judgment the onus of proving that the cause of the alteration in the value of the hereditament in the preceding twelve months is a cause which does not affect all classes is clearly on those who seek to have a provisional or supplemental list made.

These being the conditions for the application of sections 46 and 47, let us see how far the facts stated in the special case show that there has been within the twelve months an alteration in the value of this public-house. Two sorts of alterations are alleged. First, a witness says in his opinion the value of the particular public-house increased by £100 a year in the twelve months in question, and he attributes this to the rise in value of licensed houses throughout the metropolis. For the reasons which we have given we do not think that the onus on those who seek to say that there has been an alteration in value within the meaning of these sections is satisfied by proof of a rise in value which is consistent with a general rise resulting from general prosperity. Secondly, it is said that the fact that this public-house has just been sold for £16,400 is evidence of an alteration in value within the twelve months. We think not. It may be that £16,400 was the very sum the vendor paid on going into possession in or prior to 1895. It is said not so, because in such a case the valuation in 1895 would have been higher than it in fact was. That, however, depends upon how much of that £16,400 the assessment committee apportioned to personal goodwill or other matters not affecting the letting value of the public-house: see Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White, [1898] 2 Q. B. 630, 47 W. R. Dig. 148.

The questions at the end of the special case we answer as follows: The answer to question 1 is No; there is nothing in the facts stated in the case nor in the evidence stated to have been adduced sufficient to justify the conclusion that the alteration which took place during the twelve months preceding the making of the supplemental list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46. It is quite consistent with such facts and evidence that the alteration in value resulted from general prosperity. The answer to question 2 is Yes, and to question 3 No; for although evidence of the amount of the premium is admissible, the amount of the premium was not in law any evidence of an alteration within section 46, unless some evidence was given of the premium previously paid beyond that which appears by the case to have been given.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Bruce, JJ.) on a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Division of the Middle Temple in the County of Middlesex, 47 W. R. 383.

The treasurer of the Middle Temple appealed to the commissioners against an assessment for inhabited house duty of £1,150 (duty £43 2s. 6d.) made on the hall and offices of the Middle Temple, and also against an assessment for inhabited house duty of £490 (duty £18 7s. 6d.) made on the library of the Middle Temple for the year ending the 5th of April, 1898.

The Middle Temple hall and offices consist of a dining-hall and kitchen for the use of the members of the inn, with the usual offices, rooms for the use of the treasurer and benchers, and two rooms fitted up and used as lecture-rooms for law students.

The premises are used and occupied during the daytime only, and are closed and locked at night. No one sleeps or resides on the premises, and they are not used or furnished as a dwelling-house or provided with any sleeping accommodation, nor do they communicate in any way with any apartments or premises which are used as a dwelling-house. A fireman takes charge of the premises when they are closed at night.

The library is a separate building, some distance from the hall and offices, and is used during the daytime by the members of the inn. A librarian and porters attend during the day, but at night the premises are always closed and the doors kept locked, and no one remains in the premises or in any room or building with which it has any communication.

The commissioners were of opinion that neither the hall and offices nor the library were assessable to inhabited house duty.

The surveyor of taxes appealed to the Queen's Bench Division, and the Divisional Court held that the hall and offices were liable to inhabited house duty as coming within the words "hall or office" in rule 5 of Schedule B. of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, but that the library was not a "hall" within the meaning of that rule, and was not liable to inhabited house duty.

The Society of the Middle Temple appealed.

The arguments are set out in the report of the proceedings before the Divisional Court, 47 W. R. 383.

Balfour Browne, Q.C., and J. E. Bankes, for the Society of the Middle Temple.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.

THE COURT (Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., and A. L. SMITH and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal.

LADY BATEMAN v. FABER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Settlement — Construction — Meaning of "income" — Tithes — Rent-charges under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 114) — Voluntary abatements to tenants — Unlet property — Personal occupation of unlet property.

In calculating the amount of "income," as the word is used in a popular sense, derivable from landed estates for any particular year, it is right to deduct from the gross receipts sums payable by way of tithe and of rent-charges under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, and also such voluntary abatements of rent to tenants as are fairly necessitated by the circumstances of the case. The owner of the "income" is not to be credited with rent for any part of the property which happens to be unlet during the particular year, nor is he to be credited with rent even for personal occupation of the same.

Adjourned summons.

This summons raised a question as to the construction which a court of justice will put upon the word "income" in the absence of indications in the context to fix it with a particular meaning. The hearing of the action out of which the summons arose has already been reported.

By an indenture dated the 26th of June, 1867, and made between Lord Bateman of the one part and Sir E. C. Kerrison and R. Ellice of the other part, after certain recitals from which it appeared that Sir E. C. Kerrison and R. Ellice had agreed to lend Lord Bateman the sum of £11,430 on the condition (inter alia) that the provision thereinafter appearing should be made for Lady Bateman, Lord Bateman in consideration of the said loan conveyed to Sir E. C. Kerrison and R. Ellice his life interest in certain freehold estates upon trust as a security for the due performance by him of certain covenants relating to the loan, and subject thereto upon further trust to pay the rents and profits of the said estates to Lady Bateman for the term of her life. The deed, however, contained a proviso that if at any time Lady Bateman should "succeed to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum for her separate use, then, and in such case, the trust" thereinbefore mentioned on her behalf should "absolutely cease and determine." After such determination of such trust the property was to be held in trust for Lord Bateman. The latter subsequently mortgaged his interest in the estates to one Andrew Montagu, who died on the 8th of October, 1895, leaving the defendant G. D. Faber as his sole executor and residuary legatee.

Sir E. C. Kerrison died in 1886, and on his death Lady Bateman became entitled to a life interest in certain properties in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Middlesex. A question having arisen as to whether Lady Bateman after her succession to these estates had not become entitled to an income of £8,000 or more per annum, the present action was commenced by her against G. D. Faber and others, claiming (inter alia) a declaration that she had not at any time since the execution of the indenture of 1867 succeeded to an "income" in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum. On the trial of the action before Kekewich, J., on the 24th of June, 1897, it was ordered that an inquiry should be held in chambers as to whether the plaintiff had at any time since the 31st of December, 1885, succeeded to an "income" of £8,000 a year, and the further consideration of the action was reserved. An inquiry having been held in chambers, the master ultimately found that in no year subsequent to the said 31st of December, 1885, had Lady Bateman's income from the Kerrison estates exceeded the sum of £8,000. He found, however, that her income from the said estates in the year 1886-7, had amounted to £7,750·12s. The defendants thereupon issued a summons to vary the masters' certificate on certain points which sufficiently appear from the arguments of their counsel.

Renshaw, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Brabant, for the defendants. — The master has calculated this lady's "income" on a wrong conception of the meaning of the term. "Income" does not mean the actual net amount of money that comes into anyone's hands for actual spending purposes, but everything that comes into the recipient's hands after the deduction of paramount payments. Other payments—e.g., rates and taxes—must not be deducted: Reg. v. Commissioners of Southampton, 18, W. R. 1171, L. R. 4 H. L. 449, per Lord Bramwell, at p. 472: "'Income' is that which comes in, not that which comes in less on outgoing"; per Lord Chelmsford at p. 483: "It appears to me that the word 'income' here means the total amount of the rates and duties receivable by the commissioners, without regard to any outgoings to which it might be subject"; Lawless v. Sullivan, 29 W. R. 917, 6 App. Cas. 373. Now as to the facts. A single year—i.e., the 11th of October, 1886, to the 11th of October, 1887, has been agreed on by the parties for taking the account. The master finds that the lady's "income" for that year amounted to £7,750 12s. (1) He has allowed a deduction of £1,284 18s. 2d. for tithes. This ought not to be allowed. Tithes are neither a charge on the inheritance (Bailey v. Badham, 33 W. R. 770, 30 Ch. D. 84) nor a personal liability on the owner: Griffinhoof v. Danbriz, 3 W. R. 60; 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 61, s. 67. Tithes, therefore, are payable out of "income" after it has been ascertained. (2) We object to the deduction of £342 4s. 8d. and two other sums for rent-charges. These rent-charges arise under the Land Improvement Act, 1864. Part of each must be attributed to capital, and part to interest. Only the part attributable to interest ought to be deducted from "income." (3) We object also to the deduction of voluntary allowances or abatements to tenants. Where there is a fixed rent, a voluntary allowance, however wise or prudent, ought not to be deducted. (4) The master again has only taken account of actual receipts, irrespective of rents that ought to have been received. Thus in the case of Oakley Park the property was let from the 11th of October, 1886, to the 1st of March, 1887 (when the tenancy expired), for £600 a year. The amount allowed by the master is £250. But (a) Lady Bateman ought to be credited with the value of the property for the whole year; and (b) £600 is in itself an inadequate rent. The value on the succession duty account is £1,000 a year. (5) Nothing has been credited to Lady Bateman for the personal occupation of Broome Hall. A fair occupation rent ought to be credited. Whether the house could or could not be otherwise let ought not to be taken into consideration. (6) As to copyhold fines. The figure actually allowed is the receipt for this particular year. A fair value would be for eleven years.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beaumont, for the plaintiff.—The master has allowed us no outgoings except tithes—no land tax, repairs, &c. Nothing has been allowed for agency and estate office. The defendants are driven to substitute "rental" or "annual value" for what the deed says—i.e., "income." (1) It is true that tithes are not a charge on the heritage, but on the produce of the estate. Suppose, however, that Lady Bateman were in occupation, and not merely the landlady. She would then have had to pay the tithe before she could be said to have enjoyed the income. It is the same when the property is let to tenants. Tithes, therefore, are as properly allowable as a rent-charge. (2) The whole of the rent-charges under the Land Improvement Act, 1864, must be allowed, for the parts that represent capital are as much a charge on the produce of the estate as the parts that represent interest. (3) It is not suggested that the voluntary abatements were not made in the bonâ fide management of the estate. Many in pursuance of agreements with tenants; some were in fact by old custom, some by way of correcting a mistake. All have been necessary for the good of the estate. We ought to call them, not voluntary allowances, but necessary deductions. (4) As to Oakley Park, the plaintiff made no profit, but a loss. But the point involves also a question of principle. Can a tenant for life be said to be in receipt of income when the property is unlet? No; the property is a burden. To credit the plaintiff with rent under such circumstances we must change "income" into "annual value." "Income" means what is actually received, not what in better times might be received. (5) Broome Hall. The evidence shows that the plaintiff tried to let it, and lived there only to save the expense of a caretaker. She ought not to be charged anything. (6) As to copyhold fines, we must take the actual amount received during this particular year. It has been agreed to exclude averages all round, and they must be excluded here.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—As to the parts of the property which were unlet; suppose the whole estate were "in hand." Would the plaintiff then have no income? As touching Broome Hall, she received a benefit from residence.

KEKEWICH, J.—I have to reduce to a concrete sense a phrase which has unhappily crept into this settlement. [His lordship read the proviso.] Now it has been suggested in argument that "income" means "estate." It would not be difficult to distinguish between the two, but I do not propose to attempt it. I have to deal with the phrase "succeed to an income in her own right of £8,000 or more per annum," and I must decline to construe it by importing other words. Now I have to regard the whole of the circumstances under which this proviso is found in the deed. It is intended to make provision for this lady. She was intended to have the income of certain property subject to a certain proviso. Subject to that proviso the trustees were to pay all the annual and other outgoings, and hand her over the surplus. Then, knowing that, we are almost bound to come to the proviso with the preconceived notion that the second income, which is to cause her to lose the first, is to be of the same class as the first. Now what is the popular meaning of income? I must not take income to mean the actual amount of money that remains in hand after a landlord has done his duty to the estate. To do one's duty to an estate, especially a rural estate, would involve a number of items of expenditure which would certainly be called voluntary. But, per contra, I must ascertain as nearly as possible not merely what passes through this lady's banking account, but what passes through it for her benefit; allowing for fair, not generous, expenditure. The fairest test would be to take an average for several years. We should not take the proceeds of a single year's practice in attempting to estimate the annual income of an eminent physician or an eminent Queen's Counsel. We should take an average. Here, however, a single year has been fixed on by agreement of the parties—a year, no doubt, which is best for the purposes of the defendants—but the parties all alike must stand or fall by it. I am precluded from taking an average. Now I must go into a few details. (1) As to tithes. It is said quite truly that these are not a charge on the land—that they are not recoverable from the landowner personally—and it is said, therefore, that they ought not to be deducted from the gross income. Without denying the theory, I feel that to all intents and purposes they have to be paid by reason of the ownership of the land. No landowner can be said to enjoy an income of £8,000 per annum when what he really has is £8,000 less a certain amount of tithe. (2) As to rent-charges under the Improvement of Land Act, 1864, it cannot be doubted that the part attributed to capital, not less than the part attributable to interest, is to be deducted in calculating "income." (3) As to voluntary abatements; there is no suggestion of any want of straightforwardness on the part of Lady Bateman. If a noble duke chooses to make a rebate of 30 per cent., when his neighbours who are owners of the same kind of land, make a rebate of only 15 per cent., that is an act of pure bounty. Such an abatement could not be allowed; but there is no suggestion of such here. Here, according to the evidence, all were made by previous agreement, or in order to retain tenants, or possibly to do what was being done by people all round. (4) As to Oakley Park; why is Lady Bateman to be credited with rent for it? She got no rent for half the year, and the master had to look at that year alone. (5) As to Broome Hall; Lady Bateman has occupied it herself, but that does not make it income. Non constat that she could have let it, even though she had had to pay rent for another house. (6) As to copyhold fines. The parties have agreed to take the accounts on the basis of a single year, and they must abide by their agreement here. All this being so, I see no reason to disturb the master's finding. The defendants have, accordingly, failed to establish that Lady Bateman has "succeeded to an income of £8,000 or more per annum."

Each co-owner of a secret process or invention may, in the absence of contract, use the knowledge which he possesses without the consent of the other co-owners.

G. E. Heyl-Dia, the plaintiff in this action, was the inventor of a secret process for the purpose of recovering from waste indiarubber commercial indiarubber, which process he had communicated to the defendants in the action, H. Edmunds, J. E. Baxter, and G. B. Samuelson, under certain agreements into which they had entered. Disputes having arisen between the parties as to their respective rights in the secret process, the plaintiff brought this action, by his statement of claim alleging that he was the sole proprietor of the secret process, and claiming (1) a declaration that he was entitled solely to the benefit of the secret process or invention; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants from in any way disclosing the particulars of the secret process; (3) alternatively that the plaintiff and defendants, or some of them, were partners with regard to the secret process; (4) dissolution of the partnership; and (5) usual accounts and inquiries. The defendants Edmunds and Baxter denied that the plaintiff was sole proprietor of the secret process and alleged that they and the plaintiff were joint owners of the secret process in one-third shares and that they, equally with the plaintiff, were entitled to use the secret process. The defendant Samuelson said that he had now no interest in the secret process and disclaimed any intention of using or revealing it.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the plaintiff.—If the plaintiff is not absolutely entitled to the secret process he is partner with the defendants Edmunds and Baxter therein. It must be a partnership and not a co-ownership, because, if it be held to be the latter, the defendants might reveal the secret and so destroy the value of the asset.

Warrington, Q.C., and R. F. Norton for the defendants Edmunds and Baxter.—The plaintiff and these defendants are co-owners of the secret process, and as such each can use it for his own benefit and cannot be restrained by the other co-owners. An invention is not a chattel: Lindley on Partnership (6th ed.), p. 36; Mathers v. Green, 14 W. R. 17, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 29; Steers v. Rogers, [1893] A. C. 232, 41 W. R. Dig. 159; James v. James, 20 W. R. 434, L. R. 13 Eq. 421.

Frank Russell, for the defendant Samuelson.

KEKEWICH, J., after considering the evidence, held that the plaintiff and the defendants Edmunds and Baxter were co-owners of the secret process, to one-third of which the plaintiff was entitled, but that they were not partners therein, and continued: I cannot give the plaintiff any relief on the ground of its being a partnership, and beyond that really no question is raised by the pleadings. But it is desirable, I think, that I should say what, in my view, their rights are. It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiff that this is a secret process, and as regards a secret process of this kind that if one of the three owners may use it without the consent of the others it will destroy the thing which was in their co-ownership, and that that cannot be, and that therefore any one of them is entitled to restrain his co-owners from using it to his detriment. That is rather a strong doctrine, but still it requires some consideration, for this being a secret process the result of the application of the general law of co-ownership might no doubt lead us into some difficulties. Mr. Warrington has called my attention to one or two cases which I think are of great assistance to me. I need not refer at length to Mathers v. Green, because in Steers v. Rogers Lord Herschell, in moving the judgment of the House of Lords, approved of the decision in Mathers v. Green. Although a secret process is not strictly analogous to patented process, because, of course, the patent is a disclosure of the invention, and you get rid of the secrecy at once, yet there is this analogy, and a very close analogy. There is no question of any right to use the invention, that each owner must have unless restrained by contract or statute law. Now, if that is true as regards a patented invention, it must be true as regards a secret invention. Lord Herschell's words in Steers v. Rogers: "Is there, then, any implied contract where two or more persons jointly obtain letters patent, that no one of them shall use the invention without the consent of the others, or, if he does, that he shall use it for their joint benefit? I can discover no principle for such a doctrine." It seems to me to be applicable mutatis mutandis to the case of a secret process, and to be directly in point. The answer suggested is that the right to use this secret process must be treated as a chattel. I observe in the case of Steers v. Rogers the law of co-ownership and partnership and chattels was alluded to, and that the learned counsel quoted Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.), p. 62, where he says that "as a general rule where one owner of a chattel derives gain from its use, he is, independently of any contract, bound to account to the other owners." There is nothing in the judgment of Lord Herschell to show that that is not perfectly true, but there is a great deal to show that patent rights are not chattels, and therefore I say the right to use this secret process is not a chattel. Whether this is strictly so or not I must leave to be determined on another occasion when the point arises. In the 6th edition of Lindley on Partnership, p. 36, the learned author does refer to a patent for an invention as a chattel, but he had not before him then the judgment in the House of Lords, though he had the decision of the Court of Appeal in Steers v. Rogers, because the decision of the House of Lords had not then been given. Possibly in the next edition of Lindley on Partnership some modification of the language may be introduced. It suffices for the present purpose to say that Lord Herschell's language appears to be applicable to this case, and whether you may properly speak of a secret process as being a chattel or not; at any rate, there is nothing to prevent each co-owner of this secret process from using the knowledge which he possesses. I, therefore, am bound to hold that the plaintiff is entitled to no relief as against any of the defendants. There will be judgment for the defendants with costs. If the plaintiff desires to appeal, I think the defendants ought not, pending the appeal, to disclose the secret process.

MOSTYN v. ATHERTON. (a.)

Water—Riparian owner—Right to flow of water—Water flowing in defined channel—Artificial construction at source of spring—Local authority—Public well—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

The fact that the issuing point of a spring has at some remote period been built round and over in order to improve its issuing from the earth will not justify any interference with the water at its source, whereby its natural flow will be diminished.

Dudden v. Clutton Union, 1 H. & N. 627, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 242, followed.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, the owners of certain lands and mills near Holywell, in the county of Flint, and the lessees and occupiers of one of the said mills, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from diverting or abstracting water from a spring known as St. Winifred's Well, and from the Holywell stream, and from in any way interfering with the accustomed flow of water through the lands of the plaintiffs.

The facts of the case were as follow: There is at Holywell, in the county of Flint, the source of an ancient stream which flowed into the estuary of the Dee. The source of the stream takes its origin in certain holes in the rock, whence the water wells up in large quantities. It is stated by Camden (see Camden Britannia, edited by Gough, 1790, pp. 588-593) that the water issued in his time at such a rate that a mill was driven by it near the source.

In the earlier part of the sixteenth century a building was erected there by Margaret Tudor, mother of King Henry VII., to protect the ancient shrine of St. Winifred, a Welsh saint, with whose name and legend the district is associated. In the middle of this building there is a polygonal stone structure built up a few feet round the spring and above the level of the surrounding floor, which enables the water to be temporarily caught before it issues forth. The water travels thence into a well called the Lady's Well, and thence through a place which is now used as a swimming bath it flows down to the sea. The water in the well is believed to possess medicinal properties.

Prior to the Reformation this well was the most famous shrine in North Wales, and in the present time it is still the scene of pilgrimages.

For more than a hundred years prior to the action Sir Piers Mostyn and his tenants had enjoyed the free and uninterrupted flow of water from the well down the stream.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1878 the Urban District Council of Holywell purported by indenture to grant to the defendant in consideration of a rent of £500 per annum, so far as they had power to do so and without prejudice to the commonable rights, if any, of the inhabitants of Holywell, the sole and exclusive right to abstract and use water from St. Winifred's well for the purpose of storing, making up in casks, jars, and bottles and other receptacles, and treating, preparing, and selling the same, with the right to use certain existing pipes tapping the well. Under the indenture the plaintiff's rights were to be exercised between the hours of midnight on Saturday and midnight on Sunday in each week, and in the discretion of the council between the hours of 6 p.m. on every evening and 6 a.m. every morning. The defendant submitted that the source of the water before it came to the surface in the first well was unknown, and that the water did not flow in a defined channel, and that he was entitled to abstract the water before it rose to the surface and became a stream. He also submitted evidence as to acts of ownership exercised over the well and the adjacent land by the local authorities, the predecessors in title of the urban district council.

The effect of the evidence appears in the judgment.

Neville, Q.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiffs.—Whatever may be the position of the Urban District Council of Holywell, they cannot give to the defendant any right to diminish the flow of the water by the lands of the riparian proprietors: Ormerod v. Todmorden Joint-Stock Mill Co., 31 W. R. 759, 11 Q. B. D. 155. The case of Chasemore v. Richards, 7 W. R. 685, 7 H. L. Cas. 349, only applies in a case when the water has not been flowing in a defined channel before it reaches the surface: Dudden v. Clutton Union, 1 H. & N. 627, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 242; Bunting v. Hicks, 70 L. T. Rep. 455; Black v. Ballymena Township Commissioners, 17 L. R. Ir. 459, 35 W. R. Dig. 216. The well is a public well. In any case the well is a public one, and the district council do not own the subsoil. Any acts of ownership which they or their predecessors may have exercised must be attributed to their powers under the Public Health Acts of 1848 and 1875: Smith v. Archibald, 5 App. Cas. 489, 28 W. R. Dig. 136; Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird, [1896] App. Cas. 434, 45 W. R. Dig. 92.

Rutherford, for the defendant.—The district council are entitled to the subsoil of the well. But even if they are not, the plaintiffs have as riparian owners no right to interfere with the licensee of the council taking water from a well. There is no evidence that the water flows in a defined channel underground before it reaches the source, and therefore Chasemore v. Richards applies. The water was caught in an artificial well, and afterwards, until it reaches the Lady's Well, does not flow in a defined channel. Therefore Dudden v. Clutton Union does not apply here. The authority that the board has taken up here is an authority to regulate everything. This right it, and its predecessors in title, have enjoyed for thirty years, and, however obtained, it is not a right that can be derived under the Public Health Acts.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—Riparian owners have a right to an injunction against an owner in fee simple to restrain the obstruction of water at the source: Dudden v. Clutton Union, a case followed by the Court of Appeal in Bunting v. Hicks. There is no distinction of the rights of a riparian owner as against the owner of the stream or the owner of the land. The stream existed in ancient days and the owner of the land about the source cannot alter rights by making an artificial construction at the source. The well is a public one and the board has done nothing to deprive the public of its rights.

Pennant's History of Whiteford and Holywell, p. 219, was also referred to.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts.—There can be no doubt whatever that there has been the flow of a natural stream down from St. Winifred's well down to the sea for centuries, and there is no doubt but that apart from the particular questions raised in this action, the mill-owners on the stream, in fact all the riparian owners, have had the benefit of this natural flow, subject to the legal right of those above them to abstract for proper purposes and hold the water from the stream, as it flows past their land. The defendant justified claims under a licence from the district council, through which I need not travel. And he says that as the district council had a right to do this, so he has also now the right. A spring issues from the rock and the right purported to be conferred on the defendant is to take the water from the spring. Were it not for the stonework at the top of the visible source of the spring there could be no question whatever but that this case comes within the authority of Dudden v. Clutton Union. In that case there was water coming from a spring to a stream, where there was a mill. The spring was cut off at its source and the water received into a tank as it rose from the earth by the license of the owner of the soil on which the spring rose. There it was held that an action lay by the mill-owner against the person so obstructing the water, and the learned judges in the case point out that there was a natural spring, the water of which had acquired a natural channel from its source to the river, and they held that persons were not entitled to put in tank, although it might be on their own land, and so to take water at the very spring and prevent it from going down, although it had not then entered what might be called the channel from the top of the spring; and that case is a good authority, and has recently been recognized in Bunting v. Hicks. But it is said in the present case that the district council have power to do what they have done, because they are in the position of persons who have acquired a title by virtue of the Statute of Limitations, this well not having been a well vested in them under statute, and they having exercised acts of ownership up to the establishment of a local board, which was some time in 1862. Up to a certain period before the district council's predecessors in title were in existence, the well appears to have been under the management some time of a voluntary committee of the ratepayers in the parish, by which I mean the parochial division of Holywell. They had managed it, and had got some subscriptions, and employed a caretaker to look after it. At that time the well was accessible from the road by steps leading down into this ecclesiastical building where the well was. The local board acquired, by means of agreements for leases, from neighbouring owners land around. They never did acquire the site by virtue of any lease or agreement for a lease, or of any tenancy. They never did acquire the actual site of the chapel itself, or of the land underneath where the spring issues; but they have exercised certain rights or they have done certain acts in respect of this well from which their counsel, Mr. Rutherford, who has argued the case with great ability, asks me to infer that they were claiming title as trespassers, as I understood him. If this well were a public well, the local board acquired such rights as they have in it under the Public Health Act of 1875 as being a public well. They had not previously, nor had they by virtue of what their predecessors had done, nor of what they themselves had done, acquired any sort of statutory title as trespassers or as simply excluding other persons. In my opinion the whole of the evidence, so far as it goes, points to this having been a public well, and in my judgment, so far as the existing evidence before me goes, I think the true conclusion to come to is that this was a public well within the meaning of the Public Health Act of 1875. I think that such acts as were done by the local board in reference to the control and management of the well may be fairly referred to their view that they were entitled under the provisions of the Public Health Act of 1848 to take charge of and to look after public wells for the gratuitous supply of public baths, and also because all public wells and works used for the gratuitous supply of water to the inhabitants have to be continued, maintained and plentifully supplied with water. If they have in some degree exceeded those powers, I do not think that such excess in the exercise of their powers has been shown as to lead me to the conclusion that they were acting in pursuance of a title originating in illegality rather than of a title originating in legality, and I think that since 1875 the acts they have done have been intended by them to be done in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health Act of 1875. So that so far as the evidence before me is concerned everything points to this having been a public well, and being vested as a public well, and a public well only, in the local board or district council.

It is conceded—or at least I think it is conceded—if not, the provisions of the Public Health Act of 1875 would not in my opinion justify the local board or persons claiming under licence from them in doing what is proposed and authorized under this licence. I think, therefore, that there is no right on the part of the defendant under his licence to abstract and use water from the spring in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this licence. It has been proved before me that this licence will, if it is acted upon, especially if it is acted upon in any considerable degree, cause a sensible diminution in the flow of the water; and I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs have established their right to the injunction in question. I ought to have said this in reference to the question whether the case of Dudden v. Clutton Union applies. It has been put to me that in this case there was this artificial erection, making in fact the well as distinguished from the spring, and that therefore that was not a natural watercourse direct from the spring past the lands of the riparian proprietors to the sea, because it first passes through this natural construction or well. I do not think that this argument is well founded, or is sufficient to distinguish this case from Dudden v. Clutton Union. This is a spring which issues, as I have said, direct as a spring from the rock. I think the true view to take is that the spring existed, and existed as a spring coming direct from the land and running on a natural course, and the fact that at some remote date someone has built round and over the issuing point, the source of the spring, in order to improve its method of issuing from the earth, will not be sufficient to distinguish this from the case above cited, which holds that you must not at the source of the spring destroy the natural flow from the spring all down the natural course of the stream. The utmost that could be said would be this—that at some remote date an artificial course had been made for a small distance from the issuing point of the spring. In my opinion this is not sufficient to justify the act complained of, or to destroy the rights which have been acquired by agrarian owners. I grant the injunction with costs.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Release or renunciation on sale—Compensation by railway company to mine owners—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), Schedule I.—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 78.

Mine owners, having received from a railway company compensation under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of coal which they were required to leave unworked, executed an instrument whereby, in addition to acknowledging the receipt of the compensation money, they agreed to leave the coal unworked, covenanted to do all things necessary to vest the coal in the railway company, and declared that the sum paid to them included satisfaction and compensation for all claims which, but for those presents, they might have had against the railway company in respect of the coal.

Held, that the instrument was a release of an interest in property within the meaning of Schedule I. of the Stamp Act, 1891, and chargeable with a 10*s. stamp, but that it was not a release or renunciation upon a sale, and therefore not chargeable with* ad valorem duty.

Case stated by the Inland Revenue Commissioners. On the 6th of December, 1898, the Middleton Colliery Co. executed the following instrument: "We . . . hereby acknowledge to have received from the Great Northern Railway Co. the sum of £1,099 being the compensation payable to us under the award dated the 7th of June, 1898, for the whole of the Middleton Little Seam of coal under the Hunslet branch of the railway company, which said coal was required to be left unworked by a notice dated the 16th day of July, 1897. . . . And in consideration of the said payment of £1,099 we hereby undertake and agree to leave entirely unworked the whole of the said coal . . . and further undertake at the cost of the railway company to do and execute or procure to be done and executed all deeds, matters, and things necessary for vesting the same in the railway company whenever thereunto by them required. And we further acknowledge and declare that the said sum includes satisfaction and compensation for all claims which but for these presents we might have maintained either under the provisions of any statute or at law or in equity against the railway company in respect of the said coal." The document was signed with the common seal of the company in the presence of two of the directors and signed by the secretary.

This instrument was submitted to the commissioners under the provisions of section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument constituted a renunciation of a right or interest in property, assessed on it as a conveyance on sale, an ad valorem duty of five shillings for every £50 upon the sum of £1,099 being the consideration therein mentioned.

The railway company appealed.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provides that mines and minerals shall be deemed to be excepted from the conveyance of lands purchased by a railway company under the provisions of the Act. Section 78 provides as follows: "If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under any railway, or any works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance, or where no distance shall be prescribed forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention to do so thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same; and if the company, and such owner, lessee, or occupier, do not agree as to the amount of such compensation, the same shall be settled as in other cases of disputed compensation."

C. A. Russell, Q.C. (Colville with him) for the appellents.—It is admitted that the instrument is a "release or renunciation of" property, or of a right or interest in property within the meaning of the schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that it is chargeable with a stamp duty of ten shillings. But it is not a release or renunciation "upon a sale," and is consequently not chargeable with an ad valorem duty. The money paid by the railway company was not the purchase-money of the coal, nor of any right or interest in it; they did not acquire the right themselves to get the coal. The money was mere compensation to the mine owners for the disability under which they became to work the coal: see Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 30 W. R. 663, 19 Ch. D. 559.

Sir R. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the Crown.—The instrument is not only a "release or renunciation," but it is also a release or renunciation "upon a sale." The transaction to which it relates is practically a purchase by the railway company of the coals, the mine owners releasing their right in the coals to them. That this is the nature of the transaction is shown by Smith v. The Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 130, 3 App. Cas. 165, which lays down that section 6 and section 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act are to be read together, so that provisions in section 6 for the payment by the railway company of compensation for "lands" taken and used by them are to be extended to the "mines" dealt with in section 78. In so far as Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., which though a later case was only a decision of the Court of Appeal, conflicts with this view, it is bad law. Lord Esher, M.R., in In re Lord Gerard and London and North-Western Railway Co., 43 W. R. 374, [1895] 1 Q. B. 459, expresses the same view as the House of Lords; he says at p. 465: "The purpose for which that notice is to be given is that the company may have an opportunity of compulsorily buying the coal, as it seems to me, or, at any rate, the right of preventing him from working it—it is not necessary to determine which." The test whether a release or renunciation is upon a sale or not is the giving or not of consideration: see Foster v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 259, [1894] 1 Q. B. 516, and Great Western Railway v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 42 W. R. 211, [1894] 1 Q. B. 507; Coats v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 46 W. R. 1, [1897]. Assuming, however, that the transaction does not amount to a sale of the coal or of a right or interest in the coal, it is, at any rate, the sale of an easement of support. [PHILLIMORE, J.—Is not renunciation a Scotch term?] Yes. In Bell's Dictionary of the Law of Scotland it is said in Scotch law to include three things: renunciation by an heir, renunciation of redeemable right, and renunciation of a lease. These transactions are, however, already dealt with elsewhere in the Stamp Act. Release is defined in Comyn's Digest as being "when a man quits or renounces that which he before had." And, in Les Termes de la Ley, as the "giving or discharging of the right or action which any hath or claimeth against another or his land."

DARLING, J. (after reciting the facts).—It is contended on behalf of the Crown that this instrument amounts to a "release of renunciation of any property or of any right or interest in any property upon a sale." I may say that I do not think that this instrument, whatever it is, is a "renunciation." I am inclined to think that the word renunciation is used in the Stamp Act because the Act applies to Scotland as well as to England, and that the term is used with regard to incidents of Scotch law; but I do not care to say more than that I do not think that this instrument can properly be described as a renunciation.

Is it a release upon a sale? I do not think it is. I do not think that what was done here amounted to a sale. It is true that the colliery company to whom the coal belonged gave up their right to work it, but I do not think that the property in the coal passed to the railway company. For authority for that proposition it is sufficient to refer to the words of Jessel, M.R., in Errington v. The Metropolitan District Railway. He says (19 Ch. D., at p. 569), referring to section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, as follows: "Then the 78th section provides for cases where they do not purchase, and then the mine owner may work them on giving thirty days' notice, unless the company make compensation. That is not a purchase, and it does not apply to mines which the company may purchase only, but applies to all mines within a certain distance of the railway, whether they are within the limit of the land described or not. It is of much wider application than to the purchase of mines." Moreover, Brett, L.J., giving judgment in the same case, used these words on p. 575: "That 78th section applies at all times. It not only applies to the working of minerals under the land where the railway company are already owners of the surface of that land, but to the working of minerals in a man's own land near the railway. Under the 78th section, after the compensation has been paid by the railway company, the minerals do not belong to the railway company. They continue to belong to the landowner. The railway company cannot touch the minerals. If all they have done is to pay the compensation under section 78 they cannot touch them. It is true that the landowner to whom those very minerals belong cannot touch them, and it is because be cannot touch them that compensation is given to him, but the property in them remains in him."

Now, it has been pressed upon us by the Solicitor-General that we should not accept that as a decision—that these words are mere obiter dicta—and he relies on Smith v. Great Western Railway Co. That was a case decided before Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., and it was cited in that very case; so that it was present to the minds of the members of the court who gave the decision which I have just read. I must say that, giving the best consideration I can to the case of Smith v. Great Western Railway Co., I do not think that it conflicts with the words used by Jessel, M.R., and Brett, L.J., in Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway. The words most strongly in favour of the Solicitor-General's position are to be found in the judgment of Lord Cairns. Lord Cairns reads the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Act and the 78th section together, and he says (3 App. Cas., at p. 181): "My lords, it is quite true that, reading the two sections in this way, there are not, in what I have read, any words of negation prohibiting the persons having the ulterior interest from ever working the mine. But it seems to me that those words are entirely unnecessary. We have a provision that the lessee shall be dealt with and compensated, and that he shall not work. We have then a provision that all other persons shall be compensated according to their interests, and the inevitable conclusion from that is, that those other persons who are so compensated, or who may be so compensated, shall not work any more than the lessee might work. It would be a matter of astonishment if any court of equity could hesitate, if that be the construction of the Act, in prohibiting those other persons who either are to be, or may be, thus compensated from working just as they would prohibit the lessee himself." Now, the Solicitor-General's construction of what Lord Cairns said is that the property passed from the colliery company to the railway company. I do not think he meant to say anything of the kind. I cannot think that he would have used the illustration contained in the words, "It would be a matter of astonishment, &c.," if the property had passed. He would have said in plain words that the property passed. Who could suppose that anyone would appeal to a court of equity to prevent a man from working coal on his own land? Therefore, I think that the decision in Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co. is binding on us.

Then the Solicitor-General said that if this transaction is not a sale of property, it is at any rate a sale of a right—a right of support, and that the instrument is therefore a release upon the sale of such right. I do not think that is a good argument either. It is not proper or apt language to use to speak of a sale of a right of support. To give an exhaustive definition of a sale is not necessary, but I am content to rely upon a passage in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Foster v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1894] 1 Q. B., p. 528, where he says: "I do not know what is necessary to constitute a sale except a transfer of property from one person to another for money or, for the purposes of the Stamp Act, for stocks or marketable securities." Well, all that a sale may be I do not profess to know; but I do not think that there is such a thing, properly spoken of, as the sale of a right to have land supported by the coal underneath it so as to bring this case within the words "release or renunciation or any right or interest in any property upon a sale."

It has been said, further, that this instrument is a release of a right or interest in property; and it has been argued against that, that the word "release" is used as an absolute term of art. That the word "renunciation" is so used I have already said. I think it is a Scotch term of art. It is said that "release" is used as an English term of art, and that it is the kind of release intended when you speak of lease and release—that it is, in fact, the kind of release of a right spoken of in the Termes de la Ley, where it says: "Also in a release of a right it is needful that he to whom the release is made have a freehold or a possession in the lands in deed or in law, or a reversion, at the time of the release made, for if he have nothing in the land at the time of the release made, the release shall not be to him available." Of course, if the word release is used in that sense, this is not a release, because the railway company, when the instrument was made, had no interest in the land, in the coal, or in anything. But I do not think that words in the Stamp Act are always used in their strict artistic sense. I think they have a wider, perhaps looser, meaning. I agree with the Solicitor-General when he says that some of these words are used in order to sweep into the net of the Exchequer something which would very possibly escape if words were used in their strict, but limited, legal meaning, and I think that the word release is used in that sense.

Now, I think that what was done in this document amounted to a release of a right or interest in property, but I do not think that it amounted to a release of a right or interest in property upon a sale. Therefore I think the matter comes within the words release of a right or interest in property "in any other case," and that being so, the document should bear a ten-shilling stamp. It is not necessary to decide the point whether the document was chargeable as a deed.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The commissioners have assessed duty upon this instrument as upon a renunciation on sale. I start, therefore, with the word "renunciation," and I ask myself, is there any such instrument known to the English law—any such conveyancing instrument—as a renunciation on sale? and I answer No. The word renunciation as applied to transactions is known in England. As applied to instruments it is, as far as I can gather, only applied to two instruments. One is a renunciation upon a letter of allotment, and that is specifically dealt with in the schedule of the Stamp Act, and the other is a renunciation of probate by an executor, as to which, we are told, it has been decided that it does not come under this portion of the schedule. Renunciation is, however, a term well known in Scotch law, and it applies in Scotch law to at least three classes of cases—namely, a renunciation by an heir, which is not unlike the renunciation by an executor in England, but it is not the same; a renunciation by a lessee of his lease, which is equivalent to a surrender; and a renunciation by a mortgagee or incumbrancer of certain heritable rights which he had acquired by way of mortgage or hypothecation or pledge. In this latter sense Bell's Law Dictionary and Paterson's Compendium of English and Scotch Law treat it as a translation of the English word "reconveyance," and, possibly, in some cases, of the English word "release." In the Stamp Act these transactions as occurring in English law are treated under the title "Mortgage" and again under the title "Reconveyance." In my opinion the word "renunciation" in Scotch law is an equivalent in Scotch law and language for the word "reconveyance," and in some cases for the word "release" in English law and language.

Now, I think it is very important that we should not allow words which are used as Scotch terms of art to be applied to English transactions with a view to putting a tax upon such transactions where no appropriate English words are used from which an intention to tax such transaction can be inferred.

I bear in mind here what Wills, J., said in Coats v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1897] 1 Q. B., at p. 784, on the word "excambion": "The term excambion seems to be a term known to Scottish law, and it appears there to be applied to heritable property and to heritable property only. Of course, etymologically it means nothing more than exchange; but it may very well be that in the law of Scotland it has got a definite meaning. I cannot, however, for a moment imagine that it was introduced into the Stamp Act for any other purpose than to hit Scottish instruments which went by such a name, because long before the Act of 55 Geo. 3, excambion, whatever it might have been at the time when Shepherd's Touchstone was written, had ceased to be a term of English law, or known to English law, except as a matter of antiquarian history." I decline, therefore, to consider this instrument as a renunciation on a sale.

Next, assuming it is a release, is it a release upon a sale? With regard to that I desire to adopt the language and reasoning of my learned brother. I think that the effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway is clearly to show that this transaction was not a sale. I think the decision of the House of Lords in Smith v. Great Western Railway Co. points the same way, and was so construed by the judges of the Court of Appeal; and I may add that, unaided by that decision, if I had had to decide the point for the first time I should have come to the same conclusion. The coal here was not sold. The railway company cannot work it. If they did they would be trespassers, and if they wish to work it they must go and give more money to the mine owners before they can do so.

Then it is said that the transaction is the sale of a right of support. I doubt whether any such easement can be sold. At any rate, it is not sold here. That is not the nature of the transaction. It may amount in substance to this: The railway company secures the right of support, but it is not the sale of a right of support. It is a statutory process, by which the railway company, which fears that its railway may be interfered with, secures in invitum against the mine owner the right to have left untouched not only the coal which is necessary for support, but also the coal which may be necessary for support. Therefore, this instrument, which is certainly not a renunciation, is also not a release upon a sale.

Then, is it a release of a right or interest in property not otherwise charged? I think it is a release. The words in the instrument—"We further acknowledge and declare that the said sum includes satisfaction and compensation for all claims which but for these presents might have been maintained"—are words of release. The word "release" is not necessary in a release. The word may be "renounce," "remit claim," "make quiet," or in earlier times it might have been the corresponding Latin words.

The only doubt I have had is whether it is a release of a right or interest in property, but on the whole I think it is. It is a release of some proprietary interest in the coal—the right to work the coal, which is, I suppose, the proprietor's right. I think, therefore, upon the whole, this instrument may be properly construed as the release of a right—or, rather, of an interest—in property, not upon a sale, nor upon a mortgage.

Ex parte THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER v. CRAWLEY, PARSONS, & CO. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Execution—Completion by seizure and sale —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 45—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 11.

A creditor put in execution against a debtor, and withdrew from possession on receiving £40 in part payment of his debt and an undertaking to pay the remainder by instalments. A receiving order was made against the debtor before the remainder of the debt had been paid.

Held, that the creditor, not having completed the execution by seizure and sale, was not entitled to retain the £40 as against the trustee in the bankruptcy.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the county court at Birmingham.

In December, 1898, Messrs. Crawley, Parsons, & Co., the respondents, recovered judgment against Ford, the debtor, for £80 and costs, on which they issued execution, and the sheriff took possession of the debtor's goods and chattels under a writ of fi. fa. on the 31st of December. Negotiations were then entered into between the parties, and it was agreed between them that the debtor should pay £40, part of the debt, at once, and the balance by certain instalments, and that the creditors should withdraw the sheriff on payment of the sum of £40, but that they should re-enter into possession on the debtor failing to pay any one of the agreed instalments. Accordingly, on the 5th of January, 1899, the debtor paid the sum of £40, and the sheriff withdrew, having received a written authority from the debtor to re-enter on non-payment of any of the instalments.

On the 14th of January the debtor filed his own petition, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and the official receiver was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

The official receiver moved in the county court for an order directing the respondents to pay over to him the sum of £40 paid to them by the debtor on the 5th of January. The county court judge refused the application and this appeal was brought against his decision.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.—By section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a creditor is not entitled to the benefit of execution unless he has completed it by seizure and sale before the date of the receiving order. Here there has been no sale, nor has there been a completion of the execution within section 11, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, "by the receipt or recovery of the full amount of the levy." The creditors are therefore not entitled to retain this sum of £40 which they have obtained from the debtor by means of the execution.

E. Cave, for the respondents.—The sum of £40 was money paid to avoid a sale, and the creditors had no notice of any act of bankruptcy when they received it. It is not necessary that the full amount of the levy should be paid to entitle the creditors to retain the money.

He referred to Figg v. Moore, [1894] 2 Q. B. 690.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply, referred to In re Follows, Ex parte Follows, [1895] 2 Q. B. 521, 44 W. R. Dig. 12.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that this appeal must be allowed. I do not think that either of the sub-sections of section 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, apply to this case, but that section 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, alone is applicable here. That section enacts that a creditor shall not be entitled to the benefit of an execution unless he has completed the execution before the date of the receiving order, and it goes on to say that execution against goods is completed by seizure and sale. In this case there has been no sale, and, to my mind, no completion in any sense whatever. The £40 paid were not allocated to any particular goods, and there would have been nothing to prevent the sheriff re-entering upon the whole of the goods. It seems hard that the creditor should have to give up money which he has actually received, but we can do no more than construe the section.

Vincent and sent letters and articles to the said newspaper from St. Vincent which were always printed in a special column headed "St. Vincent." The Federalist newspapers were sent by post to subscribers at St. Vincent. The Public Library of St. Vincent was a subscriber and ordinarily received its copy of said newspaper by post. The librarian was Benjamin Stephen Wilson. The Federalist of the 31st of March, 1897, contained a leading article entitled "The Administration of Justice," as follows:

"The Administration of Justice.

"At the present time, more than any other, it seems to be absolutely necessary that the administration of justice in the several West Indian colonies should inspire the confidence of every class of the population with the stagnation in trade, the absence of ready money, the want and misery which prevails, the suffering inhabitants of these islands may grow reckless and desperate if on the bench they failed to find that impartial protection which a British judiciary implies. Happily for us in Grenada, the honesty, independence and impartiality of the bench is beyond the faintest shadow of suspicion. If the people in Grenada did not possess confidence in the superior courts there had been a serious state of affairs especially after the sweeping sales of the properties of the peasants for overdue taxes. This confidence and faith in the Supreme Court of the island is well founded, for no judge here has ever, within living memory, forgotten for a moment the sacred nature of the office which he fills, nor the importance of the decisions which he may pronounce.

"All the other islands do not appear to be as fortunate as Grenada. St. Vincent especially has suffered more, perhaps, than any other from maladministration of justice. In Mr. Trafford the public had no confidence, and his locum tenens, Mr. St. Aubyn, is reducing the judicial character to the level of a clown. Law and order will only be observed when the tribunals of justice is (sic) pure and impartial.

"It does not seem from the letter of 'Fairplay,' which appears in another column, that the Acting Chief Justice of St. Vincent is capable of maintaining the noble traditions of the British bench. He has apparently been too wrapped up and intermingled with personal disputes and squabbles of a questionable character to allow him to deal honestly and impartially with questions which come before him to be judicially settled. To nod and wink to counsel engaged in cases is not at all dignified in a judge; it becomes doubly criminal when he who performs these grievances and gymnastics is solemnly adjudicating questions of the utmost importance, involving the liberty, almost the life, of British subjects.

"Mr. Chamberlain having severely rebuked and censured Mr. St. Aubyn for gross partiality as a magistrate we fail to see how he could have been appointed as Acting Chief Justice of St. Vincent. If as police magistrate, with limited jurisdiction, Mr. St. Aubyn displayed in the administration of justice his violent partizanship, would he not as a Chief Justice, with absolute jurisdiction, give reins to his passions, and prostitute one of the most sacred secular positions merely to gratify his venom and his spleen? He has, it appears, done so, and thereby created a feeling of disquiet and unrest. If the people can have no faith in the findings of the Chief Justice, they may, doubtless, be tempted to redress their own wrongs, either of a private or public nature, with this result, that he who may be the chief cause of illegality will escape scathless, whilst those he has provoked to an outbreak will become the victims of martial chastisement.

"St. Vincent has suffered much from the maladministration of justice.

"Discontent, which might have culminated in riot, has only been prevented by the influence and exertion of the St. Vincent editor of this journal; we hope he may be able to assist in allaying the dissatisfaction which prevails consequent on the misconduct of the Acting Chief Justice. This ought not to be a difficult matter, especially as a strong desire is expressed that his Honour W. S. Commissiong, Q.C., Acting Chief Justice of Grenada, should be appointed successor to Mr. Trafford. A week or two ago, all classes of the community, without regard to public and political differences, presented an address to the Acting Chief Justice of Grenada, indicative of the respect and esteem in which he is held, especially from his impartial, honest, and upright demeanour as a judge, with such a man presiding over the Supreme Court of St. Vincent we are perfectly satisfied that complaints respecting the administration of justice would no longer be heard. Mr. Commissiong's experience as a practising barrister extends over a term of twenty-five years. Sir Walter Sendall, acknowledging Mr. Commissiong's ability at one time offered him the appointment of Chief Justice of St. Vincent, then vacant, ill-health prevented him accepting it at the time, but we have no doubt that his honour will not refuse to go to St. Vincent if the position of Chief Justice of that island were offered him. It would be well if a petition to this end were formulated for signatures in St. Vincent and then forwarded to the Colonial Office. There is no doubt but that the administration of justice in St. Vincent is rotten and corrupt, and that except some one be appointed to the bench who will inspire confidence and respect, the already oppressed peasantry may be goaded into madness. Mr. Commissiong, having as a judge won the confidence, the respect, and the esteem, of even his most violent political opponents, and having served the Government for a long number of years is entitled as well by his service as his ability to be successor to Mr. Justice Trafford, and we hope our fellow citizens in St. Vincent in their own interest, in the cause of the pure and impartial administration of justice in this island, will successfully press his claim upon the Colonial Offices."

It also contained a letter dated from St. Vincent of the date of the 15th of March, 1897, as follows:

"No. 4.

"A Judicial Scandal.

"To the Editor of The Federalist.

"Sir,—Kindly grant me space in your unfettered and fearless journal to expose the scandalous state of things that has existed here since Mr. Geoffrey Peter St. Aubyn's appointment as Acting Chief Justice in November last.

"The public career of this gentleman is interesting. A briefless barrister, unendowed with much brain, who religiously attended with his empty bag at the several courts of London in the forlorn hope of picking up a case he, after long weary years of waiting, exchanged the law for the stage (being a good amateur actor) and tried to earn an honest penny by turning his undoubted histrionic talent into account. In the meantime he had become an assiduous hanger-on at the Colonial Office and applied for every vacancy, real or imaginary, that he heard of, and it was whilst he was 'starring' in the provinces that, in an evil moment for St. Vincent, he was appointed police magistrate of the Kingstown District in May, 1891, at a salary of £450 a year. His demeanour in the Magistrate's Court has been anything but dignified, and he has indulged in offensive expressions to the litigants before him which were discreditable to one in his position.

"A man of the Torquimada (sic) type, narrow, bigoted, vain, vindictive, and unscrupulous, he takes advantage of his position to vent his spleen upon those whom he hates, though, unlike Torquimada, (sic) fortunately, he is unable to send them to the stake.

"He distinguished himself by openly advocating that all games of chance be played at the club, when, as police magistrate, it was his duty to punish those playing games of chance. But in the case of Mr. Sheffield, late headmaster of the Grammar School, the biter got bit rather severely and his spite and vindictiveness nearly landed him into serious trouble. Mr. Sheffield when his school was prosperous and he was in easy circumstances was drawn into the Kingstown Club, that haunt of dissipation and gambling; the poor man was ruined, and had to leave the club as a defaulter, whereupon a dead set was made by a clique headed by Mr. St. Aubyn, upon the unfortunate man, and every effort was made to smash him.

"Two women had a case before Mr. St. Aubyn as police magistrate upon one of them, who had tried to blackmail Mr. Sheffield, mentioned his name, Mr. St. Aubyn pressed the woman to make scandalous accusations against Mr. Sheffield. Mr. Branch, another of the clique, wrote an anonymous letter in the Sentry on the matter, and after some time the administrator, egged on by the clique, ordered the Grammar School Board to institute an inquiry. At the meeting the principal witness against Mr. Sheffield was Mr. St. Aubyn, who, in a most venomous manner repeated the accusations which he had extracted from the woman in his court. Upon these facts being laid before the Secretary of State, Mr. Chamberlain took a very unfavourable view of Mr. St. Aubyn's conduct, severely censured him, told him that his conduct had been most un-English, and plainly hinted that his promotion would be stopped.

"Mr. St. Aubyn returned in November last lying under the cloud, but Mr. Thompson, who himself had taken a strong stand against Mr. Sheffield, appointed him to act as Chief Justice during the continued absence of Mr. Trafford. Mr. St. Aubyn soon showed that he was utterly unfitted for such a post. He hobnobs with two or three of the barristers, winks significantly at them in court, and in the trial of cases he has cast to the winds the ordinary principles of justice and fair-play which require a judge to keep even the scales of justice between parties.

"At the sessions in November in the case against James Jack for larceny, the prisoner was undefended and he called as a witness a woman named Emily Sirus. The Acting Attorney-General in a few questions completely disposed of the witness by showing that she was a bad character and had been to prison many times. But Mr. St. Aubyn, to the disgust of everyone present, for a full quarter of an hour closely cross-examined the witness, sneered at her, asked her such questions: 'Why do you remember such a day, is it because you had gone to jail that day,' &c., and brought all the weight of his position against the undefended prisoner in the dock.

"At the recent sessions, Mr. St. Aubyn's action on the bench was most extraordinary, more befitting a prosecuting counsel bent upon securing a conviction than a judge. In the case against James Dacon for carnal knowledge of a girl under thirteen years, the prisoner having given evidence on his own behalf, was subjected to a long and able cross-examination by the Acting Attorney-General, but Mr. St. Aubyn, satisfied, tried his persuasive powers and closely questioned the unfortunate man, putting him surprise questions clearly with a view to forcing a confession out of him, but Dacon having remained firm in his innocence, Mr. St. Aubyn threw his head back looking quite annoyed and in his summing up he said that Dacon was either very cunning or an idiot as nothing could be made out of him in cross-examination. He charged the jury strongly against the prisoner though after the evidence of Dr. Pereira for the prosecution and the evidence for the defence it was clear that the prisoner must get off. The jury in the teeth of the summing up acquitted the prisoner. Mr. St. Aubyn could not conceal his vexation at this result.

"The next day, when the case against Jack James for feloniously wounding was on, Mr. St. Aubyn exhibited feelings quite unprecedented in a British court of justice. His manner was most theatrical. He energetically fanned himself, fumed, and fretted —hardly took a note of the evidence for the defence, told the Attorney-General it was a waste of time to cross-examine the prisoner's witnesses, interrupted Mr. McLeod, prisoner's counsel, without rhyme or reason, and in his summing up told the jury that the defence was an insult to their intelligence, that they must bring in a verdict of guilty and recommend the prisoner to mercy. He added: 'Gentlemen, make up your minds in the box.' But the jury, the sole and exclusive judges of the evidence, resented this dictation, and retired, and after mature deliberation returned a verdict of not guilty. Mr. St. Aubyn's face was a picture. No judge has ever received such a humiliating snub. Jurymen who were present said that they had never seen such conduct on the part of a judge.

"Simply because Mr. McLeod was solicitor for Mr. Sheffield, Mr. St. Aubyn has shown the greatest antipathy to that gentleman. He goes out of his way to be most offensive and discourteous to Mr. McLeod, and regrettable passages at arms have taken place between the two.

"It is the general opinion that Mr. St. Aubyn has proved himself incapable of filling the important position of judge, requiring calmness and dignity and evenness of conduct towards all, and the hope is expressed that if, as is anticipated, Mr. Trafford does not return, Mr. Commissiong will be appointed judge of this colony. "Yours faithfully,

"St. Vincent, 15th March, 1897."

On Friday evening, the 2nd of April, 1897, the appellant received by mail from Grenada some copies of the Federalist of the 31st of March, and on the same evening the appellant went, as was his habit, to the library. On arriving there he met a friend, Mr. T. R. Nairn, who in conversation mentioned that the Federalist newspaper had not arrived. The librarian, Mr. Wilson, stated that he had not received it as the post was late, but that he could have it in the morning. The appellant then stated that he had received his copies and offered one to the librarian, Mr. Wilson, and handed it to him to be returned the following morning. On the 17th of April the appellant appeared as counsel in a case called on before the respondent, who thereupon directed the registrar to postpone cases in which the appellant was engaged as counsel until the 24th of April. On that day the respondent made an order calling on the appellant to attend in court on the 3rd of May, 1897, to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of court in publishing the said copy of Federalist by the handing of it to the librarian on the evening of the 2nd of April, 1897. On the 1st of May the appellant made and filed an affidavit as cause against the said order nisi and on the 3rd of May the appellant appeared in court. In his said affidavit the appellant swore that on the said 2nd of April the steamer arrived much later than usual from Grenada and that he received a few copies of the Federalist near to 8 o'clock p.m., that he proceeded to the library to get some papers before it closed, the hour of closing being 8 o'clock p.m. The appellant stated in his said affidavit the circumstances under which he lent the copy of the Federalist to Mr. Wilson, and was corroborated in that respect by Mr. Nairn. He further swore that he did not go to the library to deliver the said copy, that he had not read the newspaper and had not the slightest idea that it contained the article headed "The Administration of Justice" or the letter signed "Fairplay." On the 3rd of May, 1897, the appellant appeared by counsel before the respondent. His counsel stated that neither the letter nor the article in the Federalist of the 31st of March was written by the appellant. The respondent after hearing the arguments of appellant's counsel made the order appealed from, which is as follows:

"Whereas by an order dated the 24th day of April, 1897, stating that on the letter headed 'A Judicial Scandal' dated the 15th day of March, 1897, and signed 'Fairplay,' and the article headed 'The Administration of Justice,' dated the 31st day of March, 1897 (both appearing in a certain copy of an issue of a certain newspaper called the Federalist, dated the 31st day of March, 1897, annexed and exhibited respectively to the affidavits of Benjamin Stephens Wilson and Herbert Horatio Holder respectively), being read and the said affidavits proving the said copy of the said issue of the said newspaper to have been published and otherwise dealt with as therein mentioned by Charles John McLeod, Esq., barrister-at-law and solicitor of the said court, being respectively read, and upon the court taking the matter thereof into consideration and deeming the conduct of the said Charles John McLeod therein mentioned and the said publishing of the said copy of the said issue of the said newspaper by the said Charles John McLeod a contempt of this court. It was ordered that Charles John McLeod, of Lot 103 in Kingstown, Esq., barrister-at-law, and solicitor of the said court, having personal notice thereof should attend this court on Monday, the 3rd day of May, 1897, at the hour of 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and should then show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of this honourable court in publishing the said copy of the said issue of the said newspaper called the Federalist (wherein were the said letter and article) on the 2nd day of April, 1897, and for his said conduct, and the said Charles John McLeod attending this court this day pursuant to the said order and the affidavits and exhibit filed in this matter this day being read and upon hearing Mr. Arthur Wellesley Lewis and Mr. James Eldon McCombie Salmon of counsel for the said Charles John McLeod and the honourable the Acting Attorney-General and Mr. Conrad Johnson Simmons of counsel and this court being of opinion that the said Charles John McLeod has (being agent in Saint Vincent for the said newspaper) by negligently publishing the said copy of the said issue of the said newspaper called the Federalist (wherein were the said letter and article containing matter scandalising the said court) on the 2nd day of April, 1897, been guilty of a contempt of this court doth order that the said Charles John McLeod do stand committed to the Kingstown prison for fourteen days for his said contempt.

"Dated the 3rd day of May, 1897.

"By the court,

"GEOFFREY P. ST. AUBYN,

"(Seal.) Acting Chief Justice."

The respondent for the purpose of giving the appellant time for apologising stayed the issuing of the committal order until the following day, the 4th of May, on which day the appellant attended and made the following statement:

"May it please the court,

"Since the adjournment of the court last night I seriously considered my position. I am aware of the grave responsibility which rests upon me. I am aware that the loss of my freedom may entail want upon those dependent on me. But I have come to the conclusion that I cannot conscientiously do what I was asked to do—viz., make an affidavit pleading guilty to and expressing contrition for a crime of which I know I am innocent.

"I am prepared to express regret that I should have inadvertently and innocently, without the knowledge that it contained matter which this court has held to be libellous and a contempt of court, lent the man Wilson a paper for his personal use for one night. But beyond that my conscience does not allow me to go.

"Should your honour unfortunately think that such an expression of regret is insufficient, I have no alternative but to submit, under protest, and under reserve of all rights as to appeal or otherwise, to the judgment that your honour has been pleased to pass upon me. "C. J. McLEOD.

"St Vincent,

"In court this 4th day of May, 1897."

The respondent would not accept that apology, which he considered insufficient, as not containing an expression of regret by the appellant of the nature of the publication itself. The appellant was arrested and committed to prison for a period of fourteen days.

Now what are the considerations applicable to the case? Committals for contempt of court are ordinarily in cases where some contempt ex facie of the court has been committed, or for comments on cases pending in the courts. However, there can be no doubt that there is a third head of contempt of court by the publication of scandalous matter of the court itself. Lord Hardwicke so lays down without doubt in the case of the Champion and St. James' Evening Post in 2nd Atk., 469. He says "one kind of contempt is scandalizing the court itself." The power summarily to commit for contempt of court is considered necessary for the proper administration of justice. It is not to be used for the vindication of the judge as a person. He must resort to action for libel or criminal information. Committal for contempt of court is a weapon to be used sparingly and always with reference to the interests of the administration of justice. Hence, when a trial has taken place and the case is over, the judge or the jury are given over to criticism.

It is a summary process and should be used only from a sense of duty and under the pressure of public necessity, for there can be no landmarks pointing out the boundaries in all cases. Committals for contempt of court by scandalizing the court itself have become obsolete in this country. Courts are satisfied to leave to public opinion attacks or comments derogatory or scandalous to them. But it must be considered that in small colonies consisting principally of coloured populations the enforcement in proper cases of committal for contempt of court for attacks on the court may be absolutely necessary to preserve in such a community the dignity of, and respect for the court. On that view was this a case in which the respondent was under the circumstances justified in making the committal order of the 3rd of May, 1897? The appellant was not alleged to be the writer or author of the article or letter in the Federalist of the 31st of March. He was not the printer or publisher of the newspaper. He was a mere agent and correspondent of it at St. Vincent. On the evidence it must be assumed that he innocently and without any knowledge of the contents handed under the circumstances he stated the copy of the newspaper to Mr. Wilson. It would be extraordinary if every person who innocently handed over a newspaper or lent one to a friend with no knowledge of its containing anything objectionable could be thereby constructively but necessarily guilty of a contempt of a court because the said newspaper happened to contain scandalous matter reflecting on the court. The respondent arrived at the conclusion that the appellant was guilty of negligence in not making himself acquainted with the contents of the newspaper before the handing of it to Mr. Wilson. This assumes there was some duty on the appellant to have so made himself acquainted. That is a proposition which cannot be upheld. A printer and publisher intends to publish, and, so intending, cannot plead as a justification that he did not know the contents. The appellant in this case never intended to publish. Their lordships are of opinion the appellant was not, under the circumstances of this case, guilty of a contempt of court. Their lordships are also of opinion the apology offered by the appellant before his committal contains sufficient to have called on the respondent to stay his hand. It is an unconditional expression of regret for the act for which he was arraigned. Their lordships will therefore humbly advise her Majesty that the order of the 3rd of May, 1897, be rescinded and this appeal allowed. The respondent will pay to the appellant his costs of this appeal, but from the date on which the appellant was permitted to proceed with his appeal in formâ pauperis his costs will only be allowed on that footing.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (Lindley, M.R., Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.) — Nov. 13, 20.

LITTLEDALE v. LIVERPOOL COLLEGE. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Dispossession of land—Inference from equivocal acts—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 3.

In order to acquire a title to land, which has a known owner, by the Statute of Limitations, that owner must have lost his right to the land by being dispossessed of it or by having discontinued his possession of it (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 3).

Such owner cannot be dispossessed unless the plaintiff, who claims under the statute, obtained possession, which involves an animus possidendi—i.e., occupation with the intention of excluding the owner as well as other people.

When possession or dispossession has to be inferred from equivocal acts, the intention with which they are done is all-important.

Many years ago the plaintiffs placed gates at the ends of a strip of land belonging to the defendants, over which the plaintiffs had a right of way only, and they did various equivocal acts on the strip of land in question, which was bounded on either side by defendants' land.

Held, in the circumstances of the case and upon the evidence (Jeune, P., dubitante), that the plaintiffs had failed to prove the acquisition of a title to the strip of land in dispute, and that the defendants had not been dispossessed for the statutory period.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Bigham, J., dismissing the action. The action was one of trespass and was brought for the purpose of establishing the title of the plaintiffs to a small strip of land near Toxteth-park, Liverpool. The land in dispute was a narrow strip open at both ends situate between two fields belonging to a Dr. Solomon, the defendants' predecessor in title, and having hedges the whole length of the strip. The strip led from a public road called Penny-lane to a piece of land belonging to a person named Sinclair and adjoining the two fields above referred to, but separated by them from Penny-lane. In 1843 Sinclair's piece of land, which was then pasture, was conveyed to the plaintiffs or their predecessor in title, and it is hereinafter referred to as the plaintiffs' field. The strip of land was grass and was the means of access to the plaintiffs' field from Penny-lane. Formerly there did not appear to be any other access to the plaintiffs' field except along this strip; but before 1843 other roads leading to the field from other places were laid out and the strip in question became comparatively unimportant as a road to the field. The plaintiffs' conveyance of 1843, which was the only title deed produced by either side, had a plan on it, and on this plan both the field conveyed and the strip of land in dispute were coloured green, so that anyone looking at the plan alone, might infer that both were conveyed by that deed and belonged to the plaintiffs. But when the deed itself was referred to and the parcels and boundaries there described were looked at, it was plain that the land conveyed by the deed did not include the strip in dispute. That strip was nowhere mentioned in the deed. The defendants never disputed that the grantees in the deed of 1843 acquired a right of way along this strip to the land and that the plaintiffs were entitled to such right of way. But the strip itself had never been conveyed to the plaintiffs. It was admitted at the trial, and again before the Court of Appeal, that so far as the title was shown by documents the strip in dispute belonged to the defendants, and not to the plaintiffs. It was admitted that the defendants' deeds throughout showed this. This admission was in accordance with the truth in their lordships' opinion.

In 1861 Dr. Solomon conveyed part of one of his fields already referred to to the London and North-Western Railway Co; and the plans on this conveyance showed the strip as an "occupation road." The strip was of no apparent use to Dr. Solomon, and he did not appear to have used it or paid any attention to it for many years, nor had his trustees since his death. Nevertheless, unless the plaintiffs had acquired a title to it by the Statute of Limitations, the strip of land belonged to the defendants who claimed under Dr. Solomon, and did not belong to the plaintiffs. This also was conceded by the plaintiffs' counsel in argument. The plaintiffs, however, claimed to make a title to the land in dispute under the Statute of Limitations. They relied upon the several acts of user referred to by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment, and particularly upon the fact that they had erected two gates, one at each end of the strip of land, and had subsequently kept the gates locked.

McCall, Q.C., and Cochrane, for the defendants, referred to Leigh v. Jack, 28 W. R. 452, 5 Ex. D. 264.

LINDLEY, M.R. (after stating the facts as above), said: In order to acquire by the Statute of Limitations a title to land which has a known owner that owner must have lost his right to the land by being dispossessed of it or by having discontinued his possession of it: see 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 3. I will consider discontinuance by the defendants first. About thirteen or fourteen years ago, when one Lewis was Solomon's tenant, Solomon told him to pull down part of the fence between the strip and his own field, asserting, as the truth was, that the strip was his. Lewis made openings in the fence accordingly. This was long after the gates were put up. The incident disproves discontinuance of possession by Solomon at the time in question. It is true that the defendants have done nothing on the strip since this time, but they had no occasion to do so. I cannot infer from the evidence any discontinuance of possession by the defendants or their predecessors either before or after this act of ownership. If the defendants have lost their right to the strip it must be, not by reason of any withdrawal or discontinuance of possession on their part, but by reason of their being dispossessed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors. I turn, then, to what the plaintiffs have done. Many years ago the plaintiffs or their predecessors put up two gates, one at each end of the strip of land in question, and they put locks on these gates, and they were kept locked until recently, when disputes arose. The plaintiffs or their tenants have kept the keys. If the plaintiffs had been strangers, having no right to or over the strip in question, the natural inference would be that they put up these gates in order to exclude everyone, and that everyone was in fact excluded. But the erection of the gates and the fact that they were locked is in this case open to a very different explanation. Let us take the gates separately. The plaintiffs had a right to put up a gate in their own field, and if they put it up there and not actually in the strip of land, they in no way dispossessed the defendants of any land of theirs nor interfered with any right of theirs, for the defendants had no right to go from the strip of land on to the plaintiffs' field. The evidence does not show where exactly this gate was. If it was in the strip of land its erection was a trespass and so far an invasion of the defendants' rights, but far short of an eviction from the strip. The gate at the Penny-lane end of the strip may well have been put up to protect the strip and the plaintiffs' right of way over it from invasion by the public, and not to dispossess the defendants. There is evidence to show that rubbish was thrown on the strip at the Penny-lane end; but there is no evidence to show that the gate was put up with the intention of dispossessing Solomon, the defendants' predecessor in title. The gate was in fact a protection to his property as well as to the plaintiffs' rights. Nor is it, I think, true to say that whatever the plaintiffs' intentions may have been the defendants or Solomon were in fact dispossessed of the land by the erection of these two gates. They could not be dispossessed unless the plaintiffs obtained possession themselves; and possession by the plaintiffs involves an animus possidendi—i.e., occupation with the intention of excluding the owner as well as other people. The evidence that the plaintiffs never had any such intention is extremely strong. The correspondence shows that until quite recently they only claimed a right of way. Even when they commenced this action they claimed a right of way and no more. It was only at a later stage that they claimed the ownership of the strip. When possession or dispossession has to be inferred from equivocal acts the intention with which they are done is all-important: see Leigh v. Jack, 5 Ex. D., at p. 265. I am myself convinced that the gates were put up, not to exclude the defendants, but to protect the plaintiffs' right of way and to prevent the public from going along the strip of land now claimed by the plaintiffs. The other acts of ownership relied upon by the plaintiffs are far less important. The fact that horses or cattle lawfully on the strip, grazed more or less in it does not, in my opinion, assist the plaintiffs. It is too insignificant. So is the leave given to put a telegraph pole on the edge of the strip some three or four years ago. So is clipping the fences on the strip sides. The fact that one of the plaintiffs' tenants—viz., Peacop—let the pasturage of the strip to Carruthers some fifteen years ago, and afterwards to Boote, who was a tenant of the defendants, is more important. This, however, was an arrangement between two tenants. The reason for it as regards Carruthers is not explained. As regards Boote, he tells us he paid Peacop 5s. a year for three or four years for convenience and grazing. He wanted to go along the strip to some buildings on his land and his cattle got through the fence where Lewis had cut it down, and Peacop complained of this. There is no evidence to show that the plaintiffs knew anything about either of these arrangements. There is no evidence to show that the plaintiffs or their predecessors ever themselves let the strip of land or dealt with it as their own otherwise than by shutting it in by the two gates already mentioned and by giving leave to put up a telegraph pole. I have looked at all the decisions I can find which throw any light on this subject. Leigh v. Jack is the nearest and most instructive. Rains v. Buxton (the underground cellar case), presented no difficulty except on the point of concealed fraud. The owner of the cellar was there plainly dispossessed by the plaintiff, who took and kept possession of the cellar intending to acquire it for himself. In Seddon v. Smith and Norton v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 28 W. R. 173, 13 Ch. D. 268, the acts of ownership were unequivocal—there was ploughing up and cultivation of a strip of land. Combining all the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs, I think Bigham, J., was quite right in holding that the plaintiffs had failed to prove the acquisition of a title to the strip of land in dispute. The evidence is not enough to prove that the defendants or their predecessors have been dispossessed for the statutory period of the strip which unquestionably was theirs. The appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

JEUNE, P.—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and I am not prepared to differ from it. But I am bound to say that I have arrived at that conclusion with great hesitation. That hesitation of course does not arise from anything connected with the paper title to the property, because it is clear, as the Master of the Rolls has said, that the paper title is in the defendants and not in the plaintiffs. My difficulty has been that, although I am inclined to agree with what has been said as to the animus possidendi, the facts as to the possession of the plaintiffs appear to me extremely strong. Putting the matter broadly, it is hardly too much to say that every act of user has been on the part of the plaintiffs, and that there has been no real user, for the last twelve years or a much longer period, on the part of the defendants. No doubt some of those acts are of no great importance. The putting up of the telegraph pole and the clipping of the hedges are matters of no great importance. But the erection of the gates and the grazing are matters which assume a graver aspect. It is true also to say that there has been really no user on the part of the defendants or of their predecessors in title. It is true that there was no temptation to them to use the lane, except so far as they used it for grazing, and that matter cannot be quite lost sight of when we find that their tenants actually thought it worth while to pay something, though not much, for the grazing. These are the undoubted facts, and if they stood alone, I confess that, where we find on the one side acts of user and on the other side none or practically none, I should be much inclined to say that there had been a dispossession—that is, that legally the plaintiffs have been in possession. And if the defendants during the last twelve years had sought to bring an action of trespass against anyone who had trespassed on the land, I think they would have found it difficult to prove that, although they had a legal paper title, they were in possession sufficiently to maintain such an action. These facts have impressed me very strongly, and it is with considerable difficulty that I agree with the judgment of the learned judge in the court below. But on the whole I am not prepared to take the responsibility of differing from him because all through there has been an undoubted right of way in the plaintiffs as against the defendants, and it is very difficult to distinguish the acts done by the plaintiffs from acts which they would do and would have a right to do in exercise of their right of way. That observation is particularly applicable with regard to the gates. If there had been no right of way I should have thought that when a man puts gates at each end of a strip of land and locks them he has done as strong an act as he could do to assert his right to the ownership of the land. Such an act has always been held to be one of the strongest things that can be done to assert ownership, but when you find that a man who has done this had a right of way over the land, that one end of the piece of land runs out into a public road and the other into his own land, and that along each side of the piece of land are hedges which either were practically not used at all or were used for a short time only, and the user then disappeared, the erection of the gates and the locking and keeping them locked would appear referable rather to the exercise of the undoubted right of way than to acts of user such as to constitute dispossession.

In the same way the grazing, though to a less extent, admits, in my view, of explanation. It is very necessary to keep down the grass in order to make the right of way practically exerciseable by the person entitled to it. Of course he would not like the grass to grow to such a length that there remained no path over it.

Under the circumstances I am not prepared to differ from the judgment of the learned judge in the court below.

ROMER, L.J.—As has been pointed out by the learned President, the case is one of difficulty, but I agree in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and in the reasons given by him, to which I cannot usefully add.

WEIR & CO. v. GIRVIN & CO. (a.)

Ship—Charter-party—Advance freight—Destruction of part of cargo before sailing—Liability to pay advance freight on cargo destroyed.

By a charter-party it was provided that the charterers should load a full and complete cargo at a certain rate of freight per ton on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees, the freight to be due and paid "two-thirds in cash three days after sailing, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the cargo." A portion of the cargo which had been loaded on board was destroyed by fire—a peril mutually excepted in the charter-party—before the sailing of the ship. Three days after sailing the shipowners claimed two-thirds advance freight on the whole cargo, including the part destroyed.

Held, that the shipowners were not entitled to the advance freight on the part of the cargo which had been destroyed.

Judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (47 W. R. 365, [1899] 1 Q. B. 193), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., reported in 47 W. R. 365, [1899] 1 Q. B. 193.

The action was to recover advance freight. A charter-party, dated the 31st of March, 1898, was made between the plaintiffs, who were the owners of ship Olivebank, and the defendants, as agents for Girvin & Eyre, of San Francisco, the charterers; but although the defendants contracted as agents only, they agreed to undertake responsibility in the present action.

The following were the material clauses of the charter-party: "The said vessel shall proceed to a loading berth in the River Tyne or Tyne Dock, and there load a full and complete cargo of coke and lawful merchandize (excluding coals, subject to stipulations in margin, scrap iron, acids, gunpowder, and explosives), the cargo being of such a nature as will load vessel to Lloyd's freeboard (subject to provisions of side clause) not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry, and being so loaded, shall proceed to San Francisco and deliver the same. The captain to sign bills of lading for the weight of cargo taken on board as presented, without prejudice to the tenor of this charter, provided same equal the amount of the chartered freight. Charterers' liability with respect to this charter to cease, except for freight as provided, on the vessel being loaded, the captain and the owner to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all unpaid freight and demurrage. Freight for the said cargo to be paid on final discharge at the rate of 16s., except on cargo shipped in Hull, as hereinafter provided, per ton of 2,240 lbs. on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees. The freight to be due and paid as follows: Two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the said cargo, to be paid in United States gold coin at the exchange of 4 dols. 80 cents. per £ sterling. The act of God . . . fire, &c., mutually excepted." The charter-party contained in the margin the following clause: "Charterers undertake to ship, and owners to load, 1,000 tons of dead-weight cargo (of which 500 tons may be cannel coal in charterers' option) in manner which mines and minerals can be reserved is in a mining lease, which is provided for by section 17. The best rent for the property demised has not been reserved as required by section 7 (2). Therefore the lease is invalid.

C. H. Lindon, for the vendor.—Buckley v. Howell does not apply to a lease under the Settled Land Act. Moreover, the Confirmation of Sales Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. 108), authorized trustees to sell minerals apart from the surface. Section 17 of the Settled Land Act, while expressly giving power to reserve mines and minerals in a mining lease, does not prohibit it being done in other leases. Section 13 allows grants "of any part of land" upon surrenders. If the lease is otherwise invalid it is cured by section 20 (2) of the Act, and also by the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 26, which makes valid leases which would otherwise be invalid owing to deviation from the powers under which they are granted: Walsh v. Lonsdale, 21 Ch. D. 9, 30 W. R. Dig. 109. If the reservation of minerals is wrong, the lease is otherwise valid, and the reservation only fails.

KEKEWICH, J.—In my judgment the objection taken by the purchaser is a sound one. The person from whom the vendor derives his title is a tenant for life having power of leasing conferred upon him by the Settled Land Act, 1882, including the power to grant building leases for a term of ninety-nine years. The Act, however, also provides for his granting them for a longer term with the sanction of the court, and that sanction the tenant for life has obtained. But the order of the court which he has obtained only gave him power to lease under the Act for building purposes for a longer terms than he could otherwise have done, so that in other respects he derives no assistance from the terms of the order, but is thrown back on the Act.

The powers conferred on a tenant for life with respect to granting leases is contained in section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, which provides that "A tenant for life may lease the settled land, or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind, over or in relation to the same, for any purpose whatever, whether involving waste or not, for any term not exceeding (1) in case of a building lease, ninety-nine years; (2) in case of a mining lease, sixty years; (3) in case of any other lease, twenty-one years." It is therefore clearly shown that under this section a lease of minerals—that is to say, what is beneath the surface, may be granted, but the question here is whether a building lease of the surface can be granted reserving the minerals. The section provides that the tenant for life may lease the land "or any part thereof," and it is said that these mines and minerals below the surface are necessarily "a part of" the land. According to the old rule, it is said, a grant of land comprises everything from the sky to the centre of the earth, and a grant of the surface being a lateral division of the land must therefore be a grant of "a part of" the land. But as I understand the law as laid down by Lord Romilly in Buckley v. Howell, which has received sanction by the consequent and subsequent passing of the Confirmation of Sales Act, 1862, it is not right to speak of "a part of" land where the division is lateral; and that view is supported by the decision in the case of Dayrell v. Hoare, cited by Mr. Micklem, where Littledale, J., says: "I think the grant bad on the simple ground that the entirety in the particular part is not demised." I need not go into the rest of that; the case dealt with the reservation of sporting rights—but apply here the phrase I have just quoted. Here you have taken part of the land measuring so many square feet on the surface, and having taken it you have demised it all, but you have reserved the minerals—that is to say, you have divided it by a lateral section—viz., the minerals, and that is not permitted, as there is no special power here given to the tenant for life enabling him to do so. It is not demised otherwise than as a building lease, and I do not see that the words "whether involving waste or not" makes any difference. I expect that in this particular lease the leasing must involve waste, but that does not extend the power of leasing or make any alteration in the Act.

Then there are other provisions of the Act which require consideration, and the first is section 17 (1), which provides that: "A sale, exchange, partition, or mining lease may be made either of land, with or without an exception or reservation of all or any of the mines and minerals therein, or of any mines and minerals." That shows that the Legislature saw that it was necessary to separate mines and minerals from the surface where mining leases are granted, but it does not assist the vendor to say that a building lease may be granted reserving the mines and minerals; on the contrary, so far as pertinent at all, it tends to show that the Legislature knew it was necessary in certain cases to insert a special power to enable the mines and minerals to be reserved at all. Then there is section 13 which which provides that (1) "A tenant for life may accept . . . a surrender of any lease of settled land, whether made under this Act or not, in respect of the whole land leased, or any part thereof, with or without exception of all or any of the mines and minerals therein, or in respect of mines and minerals, or any of them"; and (2) "On a surrender the tenant for life may make of the land or mines and minerals surrendered, or of any part thereof, a new or other lease, or new or other leases, in lots."

There are difficulties of construction in this section which may some day require decision, but I will not dwell upon them here further than to say that the section only contemplates the necessity, which is one that constantly occurs, of accepting surrenders and granting new leases, and, to effect that, larger powers are given, and the Legislature provides that where mines and minerals alone, which were demised under an old lease, are surrendered, a new lease may be granted reserving the mines and minerals, having reference to the particular circumstances, and these provisions do not affect building leases.

Then if I am right so far, the present lease is bad; but it is said that there are two Acts of Parliament which cure it. One is the Settled Land Act, 1882, itself, by section 20, sub-section 2, which provides that a deed of conveyance under the Act "to the extent and in the manner to and in which it is expressed or intended to operate and can operate under this Act, is effectual to pass the land conveyed." To say that that helps the vendor is to beg the question, because if the lease operates under the Act there is no need to come here, and if it does not so operate the section does not help him. Then it is said that there is another Act—12 & 13 Vict. c. 26—which assists to cure defective powers in leases, but that Act only applies to defects in forms and ceremonies, and does not refer to the substance of the powers given. Were I to hold that that Act made this lease good, you might neglect every provision of the Settled Land Act, and a tenant for life might make any kind of lease he pleased, and neglect all forms and ceremonies if he acted honestly. That cannot be the meaning of the Act in question, and I do not think it at all affects the present case, where the court is dealing with the substantial question whether a tenant for life can grant a building lease reserving the mines and minerals.

Then there was an objection taken by Mr. Micklem, which at first I thought might be of some importance. He suggested that if land was demised for building purposes, but the mines and minerals were reserved, you cannot say that the best rent has been reserved for the building lease as required by section 7 of the Act, sub-section 2 of which provides that, "Every lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained," because some part of the rental value must necessarily be attributable to the mines and minerals. But on reflection I do not think there is anything in that point, because if the land is demised reserving the mines and minerals, the reason that the full best rent is not reserved is that something has been reserved out of the demise itself; if, therefore, the vendor is right in saying that a demise of the surface with a reservation of the mines and minerals is good, then there is no real ground for saying that the tenant for life has not got the best rent for the thing he has demised. If on the other hand the tenant for life has no power to make such a demise, the objection is of no force. I do not therefore think that the argument that the tenant for life has not reserved the best rent obtainable is of any importance.

But for the reasons stated above I think that the demise is bad, and there should be a declaration to that effect against the validity of the lease in accordance with the terms of the purchaser's summons.

In re GOULDING'S SETTLEMENT.
DOBELL v. DUTTON. (a.)

Will—Residuary devise and bequest—Settlement—Power of revocation and new appointment—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 27.

The principle that a general devise and bequest does not operate under section 27 of the Wills Act, 1887, as an exercise of a power of revocation and new appointment applies to the case where the power of revocation and new appointment is that contained in the instrument originally creating it, as well as to the case where the power is that reserved by an appointment made in exercise of the original power.

Originating summons.

This summons was for the determination (among other things) of the question of the operation of a residuary devise and bequest upon property previously settled with powers of revocation and new appointment of the uses and trusts.

By his will made in 1869 George Goulding devised certain houses in Navigation-road, Northwich, to his wife in fee, and he gave the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees for sale and conversion, and to pay the income to his wife for life, and after her death (in the events which happened) to his sister, the wife of the defendant John Dutton, and his brothers John Goulding and Thomas Goulding, in equal shares.

In 1888 the testator conveyed the houses in Navigation-road and other freehold houses, and a leasehold house and the furniture therein, to the plaintiff Dobell, to the use of himself, the settlor, for life, and after his death upon trusts in favour of certain persons therein mentioned. And it was by the settlement declared that the settlor might at any time by deed or will revoke the said uses and trusts, and declare such other uses and trusts as he should think fit.

In 1890 the testator made a codicil to his said will, which recited that his sister Mrs. Dutton had died in 1879, and declared that her share should be paid to her husband, and that in all other respects the testator confirmed his said will. The testator had a few months previously destroyed the settlement. He died in 1891, leaving no property except a small amount in cash and what was comprised in the settlement.

The plaintiffs were the trustee and the persons entitled under the settlement; the defendants were the persons claiming under the will and codicil; and the question was whether they were entitled to any part of the property comprised in the settlement.

Rutherford, for the plaintiffs.—The residuary gift cannot affect the property comprised in the settlement. Section 27 of the Wills Act only makes a general devise or bequest operate as an exercise of a power of appointment, not of a power of revocation of trust: Pomfret v. Perring, 3 W. R. 81, 5 De G. M. & G. 775, In re Brace, 39 W. R. 508, [1891] 2 Ch. 671, Charles v. Burke, 43 Ch. D. 223*n*, 37 W. R. Dig. 137. If it is contended that the devise of the residuary real estate is specific, at any rate the bequest of personalty is general.

J. Rotch, for the defendant Dutton.

Cochran, for other defendants.—The codicil revives the will as of the date of the codicil, and the residuary devise consequently operated as an appointment of uses under the settlement. Pomfret v. Perring and In re Brace are cases where an appointment reserving power of revocation and new appointment had been made under the power in the original instrument, and it was held that a subsequent general bequest did not operate as a revocation of the existing appointment. That principle does not govern this case where there has been no appointment. The express devise of the houses in Navigation-road shows the intention of the testator to deal with the settled property: Reid v. Reid, 25 Beav. 469, 7 W. R. Ch. Dig. 104. [COZENS-HARDY, J., referred to Palmer v. Newell, 3 W. R. 333, 20 Beav. 32.] In re Wait, 33 W. R. 930, 30 Ch. D. 617.

Durandu, for other defendants, referred to the observations of North, J., in In re Gibbes' Settlement, 36 W. R. 429, 37 Ch. D. 143.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—The destruction of the settlement by the settlor did not operate as an exercise of the power of revocation so as to make the property his own. The testator had power to revoke the trusts of the settlement, and appoint fresh ones. These two things might have been done by one and the same instrument. Now, if I can find an intention on the part of the testator in his will to dispose of his settled property, I should desire to give effect to it. I find a specific bequest of the houses in Navigation-road followed by a residuary devise and bequest. It is admitted by Mr. Rutherford that the will operates to dispose of the houses in Navigation-road. But I cannot hold that it disposes of the rest of the property comprised in the settlement. The case no doubt comes under the new law. It has, however, been decided by cases binding upon me that there is nothing in the Wills Act which makes a residuary devise and bequest operate as an exercise of a power of revocation and new appointment. It is argued that the principle of these authorities does not apply to a case where the powers of revocation and new appointment were in the original instrument, but only where there has been an appointment under the original power which itself has reserved power of revocation and new appointment. I think that that is too narrow a view of the principle. The decision of the Master of the Rolls in Reid v. Reid has been pressed upon me, but it appears from the case of Palmer v. Newell that he considered that the doctrine of Pomfret v. Perring applied to a case such as this before me. It is said that I ought to find an intention to revoke and appoint because the testator had in his will expressly mentioned and devised part of the settled property, but that only shows that he did not intend to deal with the rest.

Declaration that the houses in Navigation-road were, but that the residuary real and personal estate was not, appointed by the will.

HEPWORTH v. PICKLES. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Covenant not to use as an inn or beerhouse—Acquiescence in sale—Waiver.

Acquiescence for a long period of years in the use of freehold premises in a manner inconsistent with the purpose of a restrictive covenant contained in the conveyance will amount to a waiver or release of the covenant.

Gibson v. Doeg, 6 W. R. 107, 2 H. & N. 615, followed.

Action for the rescission of a contract for the sale of a freehold shop and for the return of the deposit on the ground of misrepresentation by concealment of a restrictive covenant against the sale of beer on the premises.

By a contract dated the 23rd of September, 1898, the plaintiff agreed to purchase a shop in Lilycroft-road, Bradford, from the defendant for the sum of £1,050. The agreement contained a statement that the shop was licensed for the sale of beer and spirits to be consumed off the premises, and information to this effect was given to the plaintiff by the defendant's solicitor. No information was given as to the existence of the restrictive covenant, which was contained in a conveyance to the defendant's predecessor in title in 1874, and its existence did not become known to the plaintiff until the abstract was delivered. The covenant prohibited the user of any shop as an inn, or the sale of any beer or intoxicating liquors in any shop, built on the land conveyed. On making the discovery the plaintiff refused to complete, and demanded the return of his deposit, which the defendant then claimed that he was entitled to forfeit.

At the trial evidence was produced which showed that there was no general building scheme affecting the property in question, and that beer and spirits had been sold in the shop under an off-licence, of which a notice was duly set up over the door, and that this proceeding had been going on continuously ever since the year 1874. It was also proved that the solicitor acting for the defendant at the sale had no knowledge of the existence of the covenant, although he had the means of ascertaining it, the title deeds of the property being in the hands of a mortgagee.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Badcock, Q.C., and C. Church, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff will not be safe in taking the shop; he wishes to use it for the sale of beer and spirits, and does not wish to be entangled in a lawsuit. [FARWELL, J., referred to a case of In re Summerson before Romer, L.J., when he was a judge of the Chancery Division, in which Gibson v. Doeg, 6 W. R. 107, 2 H. & N. 615, was followed.] Gibson v. Doeg can be distinguished, because it is a case between landlord and tenant. It is not sufficient to show acquiescence by the original covenantee; it must be shown that the other persons who might claim under him, his lessees of adjoining property, for instance, have also acquiesced. It is the duty of the vendor's solicitor to know of the existence of the covenant, and his silence on the subject amounts to a misrepresentation sufficient to avoid the contract: Flight v. Barton, 3 My. & K. 282; Power v. Barrett, 19 L. R. Ir. 450, 36 W. R. Dig. 214.

Hughes, Q.C., and Clayton, for the defendant, were not called upon except as to costs.

FARWELL, J.—In this case the plaintiff entered into a contract on the 23rd of September, 1898, for the purchase of a dwelling-house and shop in Lilycroft-road, Bradford, the shop having an off-licence for the sale of beer and spirits. The house in question was conveyed in 1874 to the defendant's predecessor in title by a conveyance which contained a covenant by him that "no shop or other building to be erected on the said plot of land, or any part thereof, shall at any time hereafter be used as an inn, tavern, or beer-house, nor for any other purpose than as a dwelling-house or shop as aforesaid, nor shall any wine, beer, or other intoxicating liquors be sold on the said plot of land or in any shop or other building thereon." I find, as a fact, that very shortly after the date of the conveyance, beer, and afterwards spirits, were sold, and have continued to be sold for upwards of twenty years, on the premises, the fact of the licence appearing in large letters over the door. That being so, I hold that the shop is no longer bound by the restrictive covenant. I think the case is covered by the case of Gibson v. Doeg, and by the unreported case of In re Summerson before Romer, L.J. I apprehend that the law as regards the question of waiver by acquiescence is well stated by Pollock, C.B., in the former case. I take his statement of the law to mean that if you find a long course of usage extending, as in the present case, over more than twenty-four years, which is wholly inconsistent with the continuance of the covenant, the court will infer some legal proceeding which has put an end to the covenant in order to hold that such usage is now lawful, and not wrongful. This case was followed by Romer, L.J., in the case which I have mentioned, which was in some respects a stronger case. It was a case in which there was a sale under the order of the court, the Corporation of Newcastle being the lessors. There was a similar restrictive covenant. The actual lease was anterior to the root of title. The covenant was very stringent, but it was shown that the house in question had in fact for thirty years been used as a beerhouse. Romer, L.J., considered that he was bound by the decision in Gibson v. Doeg, and held that there must be presumed to have been an actual waiver or release. I propose to follow these authorities, and I find that in this case the covenant has been waived or released, and that there is no longer any actual doubt or question about it. Mr. Badcock has argued that the present case differs from those to which I have referred, because it is a case of a covenant between grantor and grantee. But in the circumstances I am unable to appreciate the difference between the case of a grantor or grantee and the case of a lessor and lessee. He has also suggested that there might be other persons who would be able to enforce the covenant besides the original grantor. As at present advised, I think it very unlikely that there can be any such person. I hold, therefore, that a good title can be made.

[His lordship then proceeded to deal with the alleged misrepresentation, and ultimately dismissed the action, but made no order as to costs.]

Company—Winding up—Order for public examination—Summons to discharge order—Time—Evidence of not being concerned in promotion of company—Admissibility.

A summons to discharge an order for public examination under section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, must be made with promptness to be in time. Thus, an application made two months after the order was served is too late.

Evidence that the applicant did not take part in the formation or promotion of the company cannot be admitted in support of a summons to discharge the order, as that is the very question which it is the object of the examination to ascertain.

Summonses to discharge an order for the public examination of the applicants.

On the 17th of June, 1898, a compulsory winding-up order had been made against the company. The official receiver made his further report under section 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, in which he stated that, in his opinion, fraud had been committed in the promotion or formation of the company by the applicants Willett and Taylor, among other people.

This report was filed on the 8th of May, 1899, and an order was made ex parte for the public examination of Willett and Taylor and others, and on the 17th of May notice was sent to them that the order had been made, and on the 26th of May they were served with a copy of the order.

The examination was fixed for the 7th of June, and was adjourned to the 17th of July and the 7th of August. On the second occasion counsel appeared on behalf of Willett and Taylor, and cross-examined one of the other persons ordered to attend for examination, but Willett and Taylor were not themselves examined.

On the 26th of July the applicants served the present summonses on the official receiver to have the order for their examination discharged, on the ground that they were not persons who had taken part in the promotion or formation of the company. The applicants filed affidavits in support of their application. The summons was ordered to be heard before the judge in court.

Ingle Joyce, for the official receiver.—The application is out of time. It should have been made within the time limited in the rules for appealing from an interlocutory order: In re Giles, 38 W. R. 273, 43 Ch. D. 391.

Muir Mackenzie, for Willett.—A judge of the Chancery Division is not tied as to the time within which he may discharge such an order: Dickson v. Harrison, 26 W. R. 730, 9 Ch. D. 243. He can enlarge the time if he think fit: In re Johnson, 37 W. R. 765, 42 Ch. D. 505. The applicant produces evidence by affidavit that he never took part in the promotion of the company. He therefore objects to the jurisdiction, as he is not a person who has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company: In re New Travellers' Chambers, 43 W. R. 282, [1895] 1 Ch. 395; Buckley on the Companies Act (7th ed.), p. 684.

John O'Connor, for Taylor.

WRIGHT, J.—It seems to me that this application ought not to be assented to. First of all, as regards the time, the applicant seems to me to be too late. He did not take out his summons till two months after he had been served with the order for his public examination, and he was during a part of that time represented in court by counsel, who cross-examined a witness, so that it is impossible for him to say that his attention was not called to the subject-matter of the examination. No special ground is shown for allowing an extension of time, and so I do not think I ought to allow it in any case of this kind. What the time is I will not attempt to lay down. The concensus of authority in the text books on the subject seems to be that it was formerly twenty-one, but that now it is fourteen days. I suppose the period runs from the time when the person ordered to be examined is served with the order. At any rate, the applicant ought to have come with reasonable promptness. Then on the merits I do not know if I ought to hear the statements which his counsel made on behalf of the applicant, though one is always anxious to hear statements of this kind if they can be allowed. He rightly admits that on the face of the report there was enough to justify the order. The applicant now seeks to show by affidavit that he did not take part in the promotion of the company, and it was urged that this evidence ought to be admitted, because it is an application going to the jurisdiction of the court to make the order, and that according to the judgment of Romer, J., in In re New Travellers' Chambers if the court has gone beyond its jurisdiction the party aggrieved can set it right, but I do not think this is an objection to the jurisdiction in any sense. The question whether the person named did take part in the promotion of the company or not, is one of the very things which it is the object of the examination to ascertain. It seems to me impossible to hold that there is no jurisdiction to order that the true facts as to whether the applicant did take part in the promotion or formation of the company shall be ascertained, if the official receiver has made a proper finding in his report on that point; and as I understand it that is the view which is taken in the very passage in Buckley to which the applicants' counsel referred, as the language there is, "To give the court jurisdiction to proceed under sub-section 3 it is essential . . . (d) That that individual is in the words of sub-section 3 one who has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company," i.e., "who according to the findings of the report is 'reported to have taken' such a part or who 'has been a director or officer of the company,'" so that I think that even if these statements are authoritative as to the meaning of the section, they do not help, but are rather against the contention that has been put forward for the applicant. The application must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Buckley's case. (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Fraudulent preference—Discharging legal obligation—Payment to satisfy conscience—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c, 89), s. 164—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 48.

If a company make a preferential payment to a creditor within three months of winding-up (which by section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, is equivalent to an act of bankruptcy), not from a sense of legal obligation, but from a sense of moral obligation, such payment is a fraudulent preference.

Motion by voluntary liquidators for a declaration that the payment of certain sums of money by the directors to Edmund Buckley & Co. was a fraudulent preference of that firm and for an order for the repayment with costs.

Buckley & Co. had entered into a contract with the company now in liquidation for the purchase of wool at the Liverpool sales for the sum of £900. The wool was purchased by Buckley & Co. from other people, the firm merely getting a brokerage fee. The wool was delivered on the 17th of January, payment being due on the 27th.

On the 24th of January the directors met—they then knew that the company was insolvent. They had, however, a large sum of money in their hands with which they determined to pay the smaller creditors of the company and exclude the larger ones. After paying they then had in hand customers' bills having five to seven months to run amounting to £790 19s. 2d. These bills they determined to hand over to Buckley & Co. The bills were accordingly sent on the 25th.

The judge found as a fact that they did this, not because they considered that they were under a legal obligation to pay the money back, but because they thought it hard on Buckley & Co. that they should have to pay the vendors of the wool, they being only brokers.

On the 24th of January they also passed a resolution to call a meeting of the shareholders to pass an extraordinary resolution to wind up the company voluntarily This was done, and the extraordinary resolution was passed on the 2nd of February. The company was in consequence wound up voluntarily. The voluntary liquidators now moved for a declaration that this payment to Buckley & Co. was a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the statute.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and P. F. Wheeler, for the liquidators.—This payment to Buckley & Co. is an undue fraudulent preference, and we are entitled to an order for repayment of the sum with costs.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and *A. J. D. 295; New, Prance, & Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting, [1897] 2 Q. B. 19, affirmed in the House of Lords as Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419.

They also referred to In re Fletcher, 9 Morrell 8.

[Wright, J., referred to In re Vingoe and Davies, 1 Manson 416.]

Wright, J., after stating the facts of the case, continued: The question is whether the preference is a fraudulent one within the meaning of the statute. Now, that depends primarily, at any rate, upon the state of mind of the directors when they authorized the payment which was made by handing over to the firm of Buckley & Co. certain bills accepted by other customers. Mr. Blackburn, who is the chairman, or at any rate the principal director of the company, said in his examination in chief that the directors paid the firm because they thought it hard on them, they being mere brokers and only getting a small commission out of the business, and yet standing to lose a large sum of about £900. Then Mr. Blackburn said that he, at any rate, did not at the time of ordering the bills to be handed over to the firm know or think at all about whether the money was then due from the company to the firm. Clearly, therefore, if that is correct, the directors did not make the payment to the firm because they thought they were under any legal obligation to do it. Then what was their view in paying the money? According to Mr. Blackburn's evidence in chief, their dominant view and their only view in preferring the firm was because they thought non-payment would be hard on the firm. In cross-examination he said: "We knew we were in difficulties, we paid Buckley & Co. because I did not feel easy about the way the Buckleys had been treated by my son and secretary. The payment was made to satisfy my conscience." Now, is a payment like that a fraudulent preference? I have no doubt that according to the recent authorities it is. For a long time it was almost impossible for anybody to know what a fraudulent preference was. Ever since the decision in New, Prance, & Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting, which has since been affirmed by the House of Lords, so little difficulty has been felt by gentlemen who practice in bankruptcy matters, both barrister and solicitor, that questions of fraudulent preference comparatively seldom now arise. But, having regard to New, Prance, & Garrard's Trustee v. Hunting, I do not think there is any doubt that this was a fraudulent preference, exactly because the payment was made with a view to prefer—because it was not a payment made merely for discharging a legal obligation. It was made, according to the evidence of the witness, because he thought it was hard on Buckley & Co. not to be paid, and it was in order to satisfy the directors' own conscience. In two cases to which I have referred—In re Fletcher and In re Vingoe and Davies—it was held, by very high authorities in these matters, that exactly what has been done in this case was a fraudulent preference—that if a debtor paid a creditor in advance of others, not from a sense of legal obligation, but from a sense of moral obligation or duty, that was a fraudulent preference. I entirely agree with those decisions, and I think, therefore, that the money must be paid back, however hard the case may be.

Pullen (Appellant) v. The Assessment Committee of St. Saviour's Union (Respondents). (a.)

(a.) Reported by C. G. Wilbraham, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The owner of a building in the metropolis containing a large number of tenements, separately occupied as artizan's dwellings, and having staircases common to several tenements, employed P. as his agent to collect the rents. Each tenant, in addition to the rent, paid to P. a weekly sum for the cleaning, lighting, and watching of the common staircase, and for removing the dust.

Held, that the weekly sum so paid was properly taken into account in arriving at the gross value of the tenements under section 4 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, for the purpose of rating the owner in respect thereof.

Case stated by justices of the County of London.

The appellant, who was the owner of buildings containing 616 separate tenement properties occupied as artizans' dwellings, known as Pullen's-buildings, in the parish of St. Mary, Newington, appealed to the quarter sessions against the supplemental valuation list for the parish on the ground that he was over-assessed in regard to thirty-two of the tenements. The tenements opened upon a common staircase which lay open directly, without doors, to the public footway.

The rents of the tenements, amounting to 8s. 6d. or in some cases 10s. per week, were paid to and collected by a man named Parker, an agent of the appellant, who was paid a commission on the rent so collected. A further sum of 6d. a week was paid to Parker by each of the tenants in respect of the cleaning, lighting and watching of the common staircase and for removing the dust. The persons employed in the carrying out of these services were not engaged or paid or dismissed by the appellant, but by Parker. If all the 616 tenements were occupied there would be a profit of about £1 per week accruing to Parker from the payment of 6d. a week by each tenant. Any loss in respect of the services fell upon Parker. No portion of the 6d. a week reached the pocket of the appellant.

The gas burnt for lighting the staircases was supplied through a separate meter, and was paid for in the following way. The gas company sent a bill once a quarter to the appellant for the amounts due in respect of these and other properties; the appellant sent them a cheque for the whole amount, Parker merely recouping himself for the gas burnt on the staircases. The 6d. a week was never entered in the tenants' rent-books nor was it included in the amount for which distress was levied. On the taking of the tenement there was no agreement in writing, but each tenant was given to understand that he would have to pay the 6d. a week.

The overseers in making out the supplemental valuation list included the sum of 6d. a week as though the same were paid to the appellant as part of the rent of each of the tenements, and the amount of the gross and rateable value was arrived at by means of such inclusion.

The appellant contended before the assessment committee, and subsequently before the quarter sessions, that the 6d. a week did not part of form the gross or rateable value of each of the tenements within the meaning of section 4 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. The assessment committee upheld the valuation, and the quarter sessions dismissed the appellant's appeal. Subject to this case, they held that the rents, so called, of 8s. 6d. and 10s., were not really rents but lump sums in return for which the tenants got water and had their taxes paid, and that the 6d. a week ought to be added to the lump sum.

Section 4 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, provides that in that Act "the term 'gross value' means the annual rent which a tenant might reasonably be expected, taking one year with another, to pay for an hereditament, if the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenants' rates and taxes and tithe commutation rent-charge, if any, and if the landlord undertook to bear the cost of repairs and insurance and the other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent."

Wheeler, Q.C. (Ryde with him), for the appellant.—The 6d. a week paid to Parker was not properly included in arriving at the value of the buildings. It was in effect money paid for services, which in other ranks of life would be done by domestic servants. The services for which the payment was made were not things done to the hereditament as such, nor were they in any way analogous to repairs or painting: Smith v. Churchwardens, &c., of Birmingham, 22 Q. B. D. 211. It is conceded that the payment was not rent for which distress could be levied. The annual value of premises is equivalent to the rent paid for them.

Marshall, Q.C. (Corrie Grant with him).—The question whether the 6d. a week was properly included as part of the rent paid for the tenement is one of fact and not of law. The justices found that the payment was part of the rent. The true view is that the landlord is obliged to provide a staircase, properly cleaned and lighted, and, as a matter of convenience, the payment has been made direct to the man who sees after those matters, and it constitutes a part of his wages.

DARLING, J.—I think that this appeal must be dismissed. What we have to arrive at is the value to the landlord upon which the property becomes rateable. In order to arrive at that we have to ascertain what is the rent which the landlord gets for the property. Now, here the landlord actually himself receives for each tenement 8s. 6d., but the tenant pays 9s., 8s. 6d. to the landlord and 6d. to Parker, who is the landlord's agent, and who also cleans and lights the staircase and removes the dust. It is said that only the sum which the landlord receives direct, is the rent and that the other sum which is paid to Parker is in no sense rent. I think that in order to ascertain what is the rent you must look at section 4 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. Picking out the words which refer to this case we have it laid down for us in that section that gross value means the annual rent which the tenant might reasonably be expected to pay if the landlord undertook to bear the expenses necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent. It seems to me here that what a tenant would be expected to pay is the whole of what the tenant does pay directly to the landlord, or indirectly through Parker, because the tenant takes a tenement among many tenements, and he cannot get there unless he goes up the staircase, unless it is lighted and unless it is cleaned. At all events he would not, I think, undertake to pay 8s. 6d. a week to the landlord and 6d. a week to Parker except he was assured that he would be able to go up that staircase at all hours of the night safely, because it was lighted, and at other times with decency, because it was cleaned. Therefore it seems to me that the rent which he might be expected to pay would be 9s. if the landlord undertook to bear the expenses necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent. I think, therefore, that that is the value on which the landlord ought to be rated.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the case is quite free from difficulty, but, on the whole, I have come to a pretty clear conclusion that this sum, although on the facts stated it is not a sum which, according to the bargain, made between the landlord and the tenant, could be distrained for, and is not, therefore, rent, nevertheless is a sum that must be taken into consideration in arriving at what we have to arrive at here—namely, what rent a tenant might reasonably be expected to pay for this tenement.

One of the elements of the value of a tenement is its position and the means of access to it, and that is a matter which would have to be considered when you inquire what is the annual rent which the tenant might reasonably be expected to pay for the tenement, and it does not signify if, in the bargain that is in fact made between the parties, the landlord chooses to split the thing up and say in substance, "You shall pay so much for the room and, in addition, instead of adding something on to the rent I shall expect you to pay some additional sum for keeping in order the means of access to this place which you are to use in common with other tenants of the same building." The landlord might expect that the keeping the means of access in order was something for which he could get his tenant to pay a higher rent and it does not signify that, in point of fact, the bargain between the parties is made in such a way that the sum so paid is not rent which could be distrained for. Consequently I think that the quarter sessions were right. But I am bound to say that the case is much complicated by the fact that the sessions gave some wrong reasons—reasons which would have led to a conclusion the other way.

Election law—Registration—Parochial electors—Separate list—Ownership parochial electors—Claims to be on parochial electors' list — Jurisdiction of revising barrister to revise separate list and claims—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 2 (1), 44.

The Local Government Act, 1894, gives the revising barrister, in the revision of the voters' list for counties, jurisdiction to revise, and imposes upon him the duty of revising, the separate list of parochial electors, being the list of persons entitled to vote as parochial electors only in respect of the ownership of property in the parish, also, the parochial electors' lists of claimants who claim as ownership claimants to be entered on the separate list of parochial electors in respect of the ownership of property in the parish; and the parochial electors' lists of claimants who claim to be entered on the separate list of parochial electors in respect of the occupation of property in the parish.

Rule nisi for a mandamus to the Revising Barrister for the Tewkesbury and Stroud Parliamentary Divisions of the County of Gloucester, commanding him to revise the parochial electors lists in the said divisions, and hear and determine the claims of persons to have their names entered in the parochial electors' lists in respect of the ownership and occupation of property in those divisions, and to hold a court for that purpose.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

The lists which the revising barrister refused to revise were these three: (1) Separate list of parochial electors, being persons entitled to vote as parochial electors only, in respect of the ownership of property in the particular parish; (2) list of ownership claimants, being the list of persons claiming to be entitled to have their names entered in the parochial electors' lists in respect of the ownership of property in the particular parish; and (3) list of claimants (parochial electors' list), being the list of persons claiming to have their names entered in the parochial electors' list as parochial electors only, in respect of the occupation of property in the particular parish.

Objection was taken before the revising barrister by one of the political agents that he had no jurisdiction to revise these lists. The other political agent contended that the revising barrister had jurisdiction to revise these lists, and requested him to revise them. The revising barrister was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction to revise these lists, and accordingly declined to do so; and upon the clerk of the peace formally applying to him to revise the lists he again refused, and returned the lists unsigned.

The above rule for a mandamus was then obtained by the clerk of the peace for the county of Gloucester acting on behalf of the county council of the county. There were about 193 names affected by the decision, and no objection was made to any of these names by the overseers or any other person.

Sutton, for the Treasury, showed cause.—The Local Government Act, 1894, which brought into existence these parochial electors, did not provide for the revision by the revising barrister of any separate lists of parochial electors. It neither gave jurisdiction to, nor imposed any duty upon, the revising barrister to revise any lists of parochial electors. The Act of 1894 did not direct the overseers or any other officials to prepare a list of any kind to be placed before the revising barrister for revision by him; and in the second place, before the Act of 1894 was passed the only lists which the revising barrister could revise—leaving out the lodgers' lists—were these: (1) the ownership lists relating to parliamentary and local government votes, being the lists of those who were entitled to or who claimed a parliamentary or local government vote in respect of an ownership qualification; and (2) the lists of those who were entitled to or who claimed similar votes in respect of an occupation qualification. Then came the Act of 1894, which created parish meetings; and section 2, sub-section 1, is most important as showing who composes the parish meeting, and who are parochial electors. It says that the parish meeting shall consist of parochial electors only, and it goes on to define who these parochial electors are; they are "the persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish." By that section the parochial electors are to be taken from the local government and parliamentary registers so far as they relate to the parish. Then we come to section 44, which in sub-section 1 says that the local government register of electors and the parliamentary register of electors, so far as they relate to the parish, shall together form the register of the parochial electors of the parish, and that any person whose name is not in that register shall not be entitled to vote as a parochial elector. By sub-sections 5 and 6 the separate list of parochial electors is to be arrived at as follows—namely, by the revising barrister placing a mark opposite the names of those entitled to vote as parochial electors only; then the names so marked are not to be printed in the parliamentary register, but are to be printed in a separate list of parochial electors. Those sub-sections show that the only lists the revising barrister has to revise are the parliamentary and local government lists, and it is from these two lists that the separate list of parochial electors is arrived at when the clerk of the county council comes, under sub-section 10, to print the lists. Sub-section 9, which provides that any person may claim for the purpose of having his name entered in the parochial electors' list, has to be read in conjunction with the other sub-sections. If a person claims to be on the list of parochial electors only, he claims on the parliamentary or local government list, and the revising barrister is then to place a mark opposite the name, if the claim is sustained, and by this means the separate list of parochial electors is got; and if a voter already on the separate list of parochial electors wishes to be on the list again he again claims on the parliamentary list, and thence his name is transferred to the parochial list. There is, therefore, under the Act of 1894, no provision for the separate revision either of the separate list of parochial electors or of the claims to be on such separate list, whether in respect of an ownership or an occupation qualification. The revising barrister was therefore right in refusing to revise the three lists in question.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Roskill with him), in support of the rule.—With regard to the ownership list, which must be distinguished from the occupation list, prior to the Act of 1894 if a person owned property sufficient to entitle him to a parliamentary vote in more than one parish in a parliamentary division, the revising barrister retained the name of such person on the ownership list for one of the parishes, and struck out his name for the other parishes. Then the Local Government Act, 1894, was passed, and under section 44 of that Act—upon which we rely—sub-section 1, the register of parochial electors is to consist of the local government register and the parliamentary register so far as they relate to the parish. Then sub-section 4 provides that nothing in any Act shall prevent a person, if duly qualified, from being registered in more than one register of parochial electors. By sub-section 6 the revising barrister, instead of striking out the name in all except one parish, is to put a mark opposite the name signifying that the person is entitled to be registered as a parochial elector, and those names so marked are afterwards taken out and are printed by themselves in the separate list of parochial electors. At this point, therefore, we have two lists —namely, the parliamentary register of electors and the separate list of parochial electors. When in the following year the ownership list of the parish is sent for revision to the revising barrister it is sent in two parts: the first part being those entitled to vote as parliamentary voters, and the second part those entitled to vote as parochial electors only. Sub-section 8, which is important, provides that "such separate list," that is, the separate list of parochial electors, "shall form part of the register of parochial electors of the parish, and shall be printed at the end of the other lists of electors for the parish, and the lists shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be part of such register." This sub-section is clear to show that the separate list of parochial electors entitled to vote in respect of an ownership qualification is to form part of the register, and the revising barrister is bound to revise that part as being a part of the register. He is bound to revise the register—that is, the whole register, and if he does not revise this part he does not revise the register. Then sub-section 9 shows that any person entitled can claim to be on the list of parochial electors without being on any other list; and by the form of precept of the clerk of the county council to the overseers (Registration Order, 1895, Schedule I., Part I., r. 2 (d), Rogers, p. 625) the list of ownership claimants means the list of persons who have claimed to vote either as parliamentary or parochial electors in respect of an ownership qualification in the parish; and that a person may claim to be on the separate or parochial list in respect of the ownership of property is shown by the forms as to ownership claims to be given by the overseers and claimants (Registration Order, 1895, forms 1 and 2, Rogers, pp. 630-1). As to claims to be on the parochial electors list in respect of the occupation of property, sub-section 9 gives the right to claim in such cases as well as in the cases of ownership claims; and the form for making such a claim is expressly given in the order of 1895 (Form K, No. 5, Schedule II., Rogers, p. 666), which therefore recognizes the right to make such a claim. The revising barrister was therefore wrong in refusing to revise these claims, and he was also wrong in refusing to revise that portion of the register of ownership voters which related to the parochial list only. If the contention of the revising barrister were right, it would follow that a person would not be able to make such a claim at all, and would thus be disfranchised; or, if he were once placed on the register he could not be removed from the list.

RIDLEY, J.—This is a matter of first impression and it is a matter of some importance, and possibly if there were no urgency about it we should have taken time to consider it, not for the reason that there is any doubt in the mind of the court on the subject, but for the purpose of putting in writing, more accurately probably than one would be likely to express it in words, what the view of the court is concerning it. The question is whether the revising barrister for a particular district is bound to revise first of all, the ownership list relating to parochial electors only; secondly, the ownership claimants list relating to parochial electors claims only; thirdly, the claimants list relating to occupiers claiming as parochial electors only. We are of opinion that the intention of the Local Government Act, 1894, is that he should do so. The Act contains in the first place section 2, upon which reliance might be placed as having a contrary effect, where it says that the parish meeting shall consist of the parochial electors and no others, and that the parochial electors are to be such persons as are registered in such portions of the local government and parliamentary registers of electors as relate to the parish. I can well understand that upon this Act coming into operation that provision might be used as an argument that there was nothing else to be considered by the revising barrister because it says that the persons registered are to be in the local government register of electors or in the parliamentary register of electors as regards the parish. Those words in that section are, however, certainly subject to the other provisions of the Act, and when we come to look at those other provisions we can see that those words cannot have been intended to be used in that sense, because there is a special provision in section 43 which shows that some other persons at all events may be entitled to be parochial electors who are not upon the parliamentary register or upon the register of voters for the county council—that is to say, married women—and there are others no doubt who are entitled to be parochial electors for each parish who are not entitled to vote for the county by reason of the other provisions of the Act which prevent a person from voting for more than one division of a county for Parliament or for a county council at the same election. There may be others also to whom it is unnecessary to refer. I think, therefore, section 2 has not the effect contended for in that sense, and although primâ facie one might be taken by an argument based upon it, it is not the real meaning of that section. When we come to consider the question as to whose duty it is, if it be the duty of any one, to revise the list of parochial electors, it seems to me that section 44 of the Act of 1894, and the Registration Order, 1895, are the matters which have to be considered. Let us see generally without referring specially to the words of that section what is the duty cast upon the revising barrister in this respect. Dealing for the present with county voters and omitting borough voters, the revising barrister has put before him a list of county voters for Parliament and county voters for the county council; and these lists were put before him in former years before the passing of the Local Government Act of 1894. These he had to revise, and no question ever arose on that subject, but when the new lists of parochial electors had to be made, either there had to be machinery provided from the very beginning under which such list was to be formed separately by the overseers or by the clerk of the peace, according to whether they were owners or occupiers; or else they had to be formed from the materials already provided to be sent before the revising barrister with such alterations as were necessary. The former method was not possible without, as it appears to me, passing over to the clerk of the peace or to the overseers duties with regard to which the discretion of the revising barrister ought to be exercised. The revising barrister therefore had to form under the new law a parochial list by consideration of the former lists, and it was only by the marking of the parliamentary ownership list and by cutting out of it those who were not entitled to vote because their names were on the list for other divisions, that he arrived at the ownership list of the parish, and in arriving at the ownership list of that parish that was the form relied upon. That is clearly part of the history of this matter, and it results from what the revising barrister does at the hearing upon the ownership list, which has been formed and put before him. With regard to that part of the case next year that ownership list comes before him, as furnished to him by the overseers with indications and marks showing that certain names represent those who are dead and those who have removed, and that the list requires rectification. It is argued by Mr. Sutton that the revising barrister took the right view in declining to consider that list because there is no part of the Act which expressly brings it within his jurisdiction. But it appears to me, when we consider the wording of section 44 and its various sub-sections, that that part of the list is made a portion of the register, and that the old ownership list comes within sub-section 8 because it is the portion of the list that is intended to be the list for parochial voters. It appears to me therefore that when the revising barrister has got that list brought before him it is a part of the register, and it is as such that he has to consider it. He has to rectify it in point of fact according to what his discretion may be as to the evidence, whether by marks or obliterations put before him by the overseers. If he does not do so it appears to me that there is no machinery at all provided for so doing, and the result would be that it would remain and would continue to be the list of former years. Surely it is not in accordance with the general intention of this Act of Parliament to say that such a conclusion must be drawn from it. It was intended to put all the lists, including that of parochial electors, upon the same basis and under the same authority—that is to say, that they should all come within the discretion of the revising barrister. In addition, I also think that it also comes within the special words of sub-section 8. So much as regards the list of voters which results from former years. With regard to claims, both as to owners and occupiers, it appears to me that the case is perfectly clear, and in fact it is hardly capable of argument. The provisions of the Act are simply these: that whereas there may be persons whose names do not appear on either the parliamentary or the local government voters lists, those persons may claim in respect of a vote in the parish only, and sub-section 9 meets that very case, as it says that any person may claim for the purpose of having his name entered in the parochial electors list, and that the law relating to claims to be entered in lists of voters shall apply. If a person enters a claim to be on the parochial list it is provided that he shall enter it in the forms which are given in the Registration Order, 1895; if he claims as an owner he follows the form in that order, form No. 2, Schedule I. (Rogers, p. 631), and if he claims as an occupier then he follows the form in the order, form K, No. 5, Schedule II. (Rogers, p. 666), being the form for the "List of Claimants (Parochial Electors List)." There the person is claiming to be put on the parochial electors list, and that form adds in a note: "Form No. 5 applies to persons who claim to have their names entered in the parochial electors list as parochial electors only"; and it also adds that "A copy of the claim must be entered in this form." Then the claims on either owners or occupiers list are put before the revising barrister and are supposed to form part of the complete list which will ultimately be made up under sub-section 10 by the clerk of the county council, or by the town clerk as the case may be. The question which is argued by Mr. Sutton is raised in this way. He says, "True it is that the claimants list is to come before the revising barrister with a provision that the law relating to claims to be entered in lists of voters shall apply"; but he says it is not proper to consider that list unless it is put forward as a portion of the other lists which, according to the general law, are to be dealt with by the revising barrister. I think that is not in accordance with the general spirit of the Local Government Act, 1894, on this subject, which intends that the revising barrister shall revise all the lists, including the separate list of parochial electors. Apart, however, from that, the form I have alluded to and sub-section 9 are precise to this effect, that a person so claiming is to claim in the form as belonging to the parochial electors list also, and if he does so in accordance with the form provided by the Act then "the law relating to claims to be entered in lists of voters shall apply." I do not see how we could properly read these words unless it gives the revising barrister the duty of revising, and I gather from Mr. Sutton that he would not have contended to the contrary if the claims had been made as a part of the two general lists. That objection seems to me not to have much weight because of the words of the Act of Parliament itself, and the form in which it is provided that claims shall be made. When all has been done by the revising barrister, then it becomes the duty of the authorities to make out a separate list of parochial electors, which includes, of course, the list of claims as revised, and the list of those who have been on the list for former years. Under these circumstances—although the matter is one which I can well understand might upon argument take a different shape in the mind of the revising barrister—it seems to me that the better and the right course to pursue according to law is to deal with the separate lists as if they formed part of the register to be put before the revising barrister; and it is his discretion upon which the Legislature relies, and his is the duty to see that the lists are correctly drawn up. For these reasons I am of opinion that the rule ought to be made absolute.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is perfectly clear that it is the duty of the revising barrister to revise the parochial register. He did revise the list so far as it related to parochial electors who were also parliamentary voters, persons described as ownership voters, and persons entitled to vote as parliamentary voters and as parochial voters. So far as the list consisted of those owners who were entitled to vote both ways, he revised the register, but when it came to revising the register as regards persons who were described as owners, but entitled to vote as parochial electors only, he came to the conclusion that he had no jurisdiction. I think he was wrong in that. That which he declined to revise was a portion of the register, and, therefore, if he did not revise that portion he did not revise the register. He only revised a portion of the register, but he was bound to revise the register, that is, all portions of the register. It appears to me, therefore, that he was distinctly wrong in refusing to revise any portion of the register. With regard to his refusal to revise the claims, I think the case is hardly arguable, having regard to the provision where it is distinctly enacted in sub-section 9 that any person may claim for the purpose of having his name put on the parochial electors list, and that the law relating to claims to be entered in the list of voters shall apply. He is bound to revise those claims, and if there were any doubt about the matter there is the Order in Council—the Registration Order of 1895—which gives the form in which persons are to send in these claims. These claims must be revised in some way, and there is no person other than the revising barrister who could revise them. I think the case is a very clear one.

BARON AND ANOTHER v. PORTSLADE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Sewers—Cleansing—Local authority—Neglect to cleanse—Damage to adjoining occupier—Liability of local authority—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 19, 299.

If a local authority knew that a sewer vested in them requires cleansing and neglect to cleanse the same as required by section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and damage is thereby caused to the occupier of adjoining land by sewage coming on his land, such occupier can maintain an action against the local authority in respect of the damage, and the remedy of the person so injured is not by complaint to the Local Government Board under section 299 of the Act.

Further consideration by Mathew, J.

The action, which was tried before Mathew, J., with a jury, at the summer assizes at Lewes, was brought by the plaintiffs, who were occupiers of certain premises at Portslade, consisting of a dwelling-house and agricultural land, against the defendants, who were the local authority for the district, to recover damages for a nuisance on the plaintiffs' land alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants as such local authority in not properly cleansing an open sewer belonging to and vested in them, whereby large quantities of sewage was brought on to the plaintiffs' land so as to cause a nuisance and damage to the plaintiffs.

It was admitted that there was a nuisance on the plaintiffs' land caused by the defendants, and that the defendants were guilty of a breach of their statutory duty in not properly cleansing and emptying the sewer, as required by section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the learned judge at the trial was of opinion that there was negligence on the part of the defendants in not cleansing and emptying the sewer after notice of its condition.

The question of damages alone was left to the jury, and they found for the plaintiffs for £75. The question of law was reserved as to whether the plaintiffs could, under the circumstances, maintain the action against the defendants.

Section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) enacts: "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied."

Witt, Q.C. (Sinclair-Cox with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action. It was admitted that there was a nuisance caused by the defendants, and it was found that this was owing to the negligence of the defendants in not properly cleansing this sewer after notice of its condition. There was a clear breach by the defendants of the duty imposed upon them by section 19. The defendants as the local authority were bound under section 19 to cleanse and empty this sewer, and although they had notice of its condition they failed to carry out their duty, and damage has resulted to the plaintiffs. For this damage the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action: Hammond v. Vestry of St. Pancras, 22 W. R. 826, L. R. 9 C. P. 316; Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works, 36 W. R. 501, 37 Ch. D. 272. These cases clearly show that if you prove negligence in cleansing and keeping the sewer an action can be maintained. It is said, however, that the remedy for this damage is not by action, but by an application to the Local Government Board under section 299 of the Act, and that that section provides the remedy for any breach of duty under section 19. Both upon the construction of the sections and upon the authorities this is not so. Section 299 is correlative to section 15 and not to section 19. Section 15 means that the local authority shall make and afterwards maintain such sewers as are necessary to drain their district—that is, that they shall have a proper scheme of sewers, and it contemplates the case where there are not sufficient sewers for the district. The remedy for that state of things and for any breach of duty on the part of the local authority under section 15 is by an application under section 299. Section 19, however, deals with a different state of things; it deals with the case where there is a sufficient sewer, but where this sufficient sewer is not kept in proper order; and where there is a sufficient sewer, but the local authority do not keep this sewer properly cleansed as required by section 19, then an action will lie for the damage caused thereby. That this is the true construction of the sections is shown by the two cases decided by the Court of Appeal upon section 15, the cases of Robinson v. Workington Corporation, 45 W. R. 453, [1897] 1 Q. B. 619, and Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, 45 W. R. 454, [1897] 1 Q. B. 625.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Thorn Drury with him), for the defendants.—This action cannot be maintained. The duties imposed upon the defendants under sections 15 and 19 are statutory duties, and are two-fold—namely, to provide sufficient sewers for their district, and to keep them in repair and cleanse them so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health. The defendants have merely neglected to cleanse the sewer; they have done nothing to increase the flow of the sewage, and have not otherwise contributed to the nuisance, and upon that ground they are not liable in an action for the damage: Attorney-General v. Dorking Union, 30 W. R. 579, 20 Ch. D. 595, a case which has been recently followed by Cozens-Hardy, J., in Brown v. Mayor of Dunstable, 47 W. R. 538, 80 L. T. Rep. 650. This is a case of insufficient sewage arrangements, and, as in the Dorking case, there was a neglect on the part of the defendants to make provision for receiving the sewage. There, as here, the authority did not cleanse the sewer they had, and instead of the sewage being carried away through the sewer it was carried into the plaintiff's stream and caused a nuisance. There it was held that no action would lie for the nuisance, and that really covers the present case. The second ground of defence is that for a breach of the statutory duty imposed by section 19 of cleansing the sewer, as well as for a breach of the statutory duty imposed by section 15 of providing sewers, there is a specific remedy pointed out by the Act—namely, an application under section 299 to the Local Government Board asking the board to put in force the provisions of that section and require a sufficient sewer to be made. That is the remedy pointed out by the Act, and that is the exclusive remedy to be followed. That section (section 299) applies not only to the case of providing the district with sufficient sewers, but also to the case of the "maintenance of existing sewers." The maintenance of existing sewers includes their cleansing, and therefore that section applies to this case. Although the cases of Robinson v. Workington Corporation and Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council arose under section 15, the principle there laid down—namely, that for a breach of these statutory duties the remedy was under section 299, applies equally to the breach of the statutory duty under section 19. Here there was at the most a mere act of non-feasance, and these and other cases show that for an act of non-feasance the defendants would not be liable.

Witt, Q.C., in reply.

MATHEW, J.—In this case there was abundant evidence at the trial of negligence. Before the present local authority was constituted the former one had, in the first instance, made an arrangement with the plaintiffs that the sewer in question, which was an open sewer, should be cleansed by the plaintiffs, and that a payment should be made in respect of that. At the time when the transfer of authority took place an alteration had shortly before been made by the local authority and they had taken the duty of cleansing this sewer upon themselves. When the new authority was constituted the sewer was the same as it had been—an open sewer—and if properly cleansed an adequate sewer for the requirements of the locality. But for some reason or other, although the attention of the local authority was called to the condition of this open sewer, and to the fact that it was a nuisance, nothing was done in time, and months were allowed to pass by, while considerable damage was done by reason of the neglect of the local authority.

Then there was cleansing, and the sewer was set right by the local authority; the work being done, as I have said, after injury had been inflicted on the plaintiffs.

Now, in those circumstances, it is said there is no cause of action against that local authority, and reference was made to section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which, if it had stood alone and had to be construed according to plain language, clearly would involve an obligation on the local authority of the district. It says: "Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied." The state of things contemplated by that section is a sufficient sewer, but no necessity for new works, and an obligation to keep that sewer in working order. But it is said there is no right of action if we look at the other sections of the statute, and that the proper remedy was to proceed by an application to the Local Government Board to obtain an order for the cleansing of the sewer. I am satisfied that the Act of Parliament, when it is looked at, never contemplated anything of the sort. I think section 299 is to be read with section 15, which provides that: "Every local authority shall keep in repair all sewers belonging to them, and shall cause to be made such sewers as may be necessary for effectually draining their district for the purposes of this Act." How has that to be secured? We now come to section 299, which says: "Where complaint is made to the Local Government Board that a local authority has made default in providing their district with sufficient sewers or in the maintenance of existing sewers, or that a local authority has made default in enforcing any provisions of this Act which it is their duty to enforce, the Local Government Board, if satisfied after due inquiry that the authority has been guilty of the alleged default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of their duty in the matter of such complaint." What does that clearly refer to? It clearly refers to the case where the existing sewers are insufficient, and where it is necessary that further provision should be made. That has no bearing whatever upon a case like the present, where the sewer is sufficient and all the injury that has been done is the result of the neglect of the local authority to cleanse it. This construction of the Act seems to me to be borne out by the cases referred to. It is borne out in the case of Hammond v. The Vestry of St. Pancras, where the necessity of reasonable care and diligence on the part of the local authority is pointed out, and again in the case of Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works, where the same point presented itself in the same way, and in the two very important cases of Robinson v. Workington Corporation in the year 1897, and the case that follows it of Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council. None of these cases is any authority for the contention of the defendants in this case, that the exclusive remedy for failure on their part to discharge their statutory duty under section 19 was by an application to the Local Government Board under section 299. When we look at section 299 it is clear that it does not apply to the case of cleansing a sewer. The word "maintenance" in section 299 was relied on for the defendants, and it was said that here there was an existing sewer which was not "maintained" because it was not cleansed. Maintenance does not seem to me to be equivalent to cleansing, and that construction of the section cannot be adopted. Then there was the further argument that where there was a remedy pointed out by the Act that remedy must be followed; but the remedy pointed out by the Act is section 299 is not applicable to this case. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the plaintiffs have established their case, and that the defendants have no answer in law to the action, and I think that judgment must be given against them with costs here and elsewhere.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DE PREVILLE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Settlement—Surrender of life estate to remainderman—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).

Where a tenant for life of settled property surrenders the life estate to the remainderman and dies within twelve months of the surrender, estate duty is not payable under the Finance Act, 1894, on the death of the tenant for life.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.), [1899] 2 Q. B. 238, reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) on the hearing of an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty: [1899] 2 Q. B. 238, 47 W. R. Dig. 73.

The question was whether, where a tenant for life of settled property surrenders the life estate to the remainderman and dies within twelve months of the surrender, estate duty is payable under the Finance Act, 1894, on the death of the tenant for life.

George Thomas Mowbray, of Grangewood House, in the parish of Seals, in the county of Leicester, deceased, by his will, dated the 4th of February, 1892, devised and appointed all the real estate to which he should be entitled at the time of his decease, or over which he might have any disposing power, to the use of his sister, Georgiana Anne, the widow of the late Pierre Richaud de Preville, for her life, and after her decease to the use of his nephew, the defendant, André George Richaud de Preville, the son of his said sister, and the heirs of his body, and in default of such issue to the testator's own right heirs.

The said George Thomas Mowbray died on the 29th of February, 1892.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 10th of October, 1845, the manor or lordship of Overseal, in the county of Leicester, and certain freehold messuages, lands, and hereditaments, therein described, were limited to the use of trustees in trust to permit the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville, then Georgiana Anne Mowbray, during such part of her life as she should be single and unmarried, to receive the rents and profits of the said hereditaments, and during any coverture of the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville to pay the said rents and profits to her for her separate use, and from and after her decease to the use of her first and other sons successively, according to seniority in tail male, with remainders over.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By an indenture dated the 5th of February, 1896, made between the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville, widow, of the first part, the defendant, André George Richaud de Preville, of the second part, and David Hale of the third part, reciting inter alia the said indenture of the 10th of October, 1845, and the said will of George Thomas Mowbray, and his death, and reciting (as the fact was) that the defendant, André George Richaud de Preville, was the eldest and only son of the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville, and that they were desirous of barring the estate tail of the defendant in the hereditaments comprised in the said settlement and devised by the said will, and of limiting the said hereditaments as thereinafter expressed to the intent that the life estate of the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville therein should be absolutely released in favour of the defendant, it was witnessed that the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville as settlor, and the defendant, André George Richaud de Preville (with the consent of the said Georgiana Anne Richaud de Preville as protector of the settlement and will), thereby granted unto the said David Hale, first, all the manor or lordship, freehold messuages, farms, lands, tenements, and hereditaments situate in the parishes of Overseal and Netherseal, or elsewhere, in the county of Leicester, comprised in the indenture of the 10th of October, 1845; and, secondly, all the freehold messuages and hereditaments devised by the said will of the said George Thomas Mowbray, and also all other freehold hereditaments which had become subject to the uses or trusts of the said indenture of settlement or of the said will concerning the said testator's real estate and all moneys, stocks, funds, and securities (if any) which were subject to be invested in the purchase of hereditaments of which the defendant would be tenant in tail male or in tail, and the hereditaments to be purchased therewith; to hold the same unto the said David Hale and his heirs discharged from all estates in tail male or in tail of the defendant at law or in equity, and all estates, rights, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of such estates in tail male or in tail, to the use of the defendant, André George Richaud de Preville, his heirs and assigns, for ever absolutely released and discharged from the life estate therein of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville. The indenture also witnessed that the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville thereby absolutely released unto the defendant the power of appointing a life interest to any husband with whom she might intermarry and of charging portions for her children by the said indenture of the 10th of October, 1845, given to her.

The lastly stated indenture was enrolled on the 11th of February, 1896. The said Georgina A. R. de Preville died within twelve months after the execution of the said indenture—namely, on the 11th of December, 1896—intestate. Letters of administration to her personal estate were granted to the defendant on the 9th of August, 1897.

The information alleged that on the death of Georgiana A. R. de Preville estate duty under sections 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, became payable in respect of the hereditaments and property comprised in the said indenture of the 5th of February, 1896 (or alternatively in respect of the life interest at the date of the last mentioned indenture of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville in the said hereditaments and property), as property passing on her death within the meaning of the Act.

The defendants answered that estate duty under sections 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, did not become payable on the death of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville in respect of the hereditaments and property comprised in the said indenture of the 5th of February 1896, or in respect of her life interest at that date, inasmuch as such property was not property passing on her death within the meaning of the said Act.

Dec. 20.—A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment: The real point upon which the decision of this case turns is whether section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes estate duty on a life estate which prior to the passing of that Act would not have had to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, upon the death of the tenant for life. The facts are peculiarly short. On and prior to the 5th of February, 1896, Georgiana Anne de Preville was tenant for life of real property situate in the county of Leicester, of which her son, the present appellant, was tenant in tail, and upon the day above named the mother and son executed a disentailing deed, by which the estate tail was barred, and the son thereupon became owner in fee of the property. On the 11th of December, 1896 —i.e., ten months after the execution of this deed—the mother died. The question is whether the life estate of the mother, which had passed to her son ten months before her death, is liable to estate duty upon her death. It has been held in this court, affirmed in the House of Lords in Attorney-General v. Beech, 47 W. R. 257, [1899] A. C. 53, that where the owner of a life estate has conveyed that estate to a donee more than twelve months before the death of the donor, estate duty upon the life estate is not payable by the donee upon the death of the donor, for the reason that by the Finance Act it is only the estate which passes upon death which is liable to estate duty, and that when the donor, the tenant for life, died nothing passed upon which the estate duty could operate, for the life estate had already passed to the donee before the death of the donor. It is now said by the Crown that Beech's case does not apply, because in the present case the tenant for life died within twelve months of the gift, and not after twelve months of the gift, as in Beech's case, and it is argued that upon this ground, by reason of the provisions of the remarkable section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act of 1894, this case is different from Beech's case, and that estate duty is leviable upon the life estate upon the death of the tenant for life. The Crown admits that, if section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, does not impose this duty upon the life estate upon the death of the tenant for life, there is no other section which does. Section 2 (1) (c) is as follows: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, as if those sections were in this Act enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." In the case of Attorney-General v. Earl Grey, 47 W. R. 37, [1898] 2 Q. B. 534, I expanded this composite section, and I will do so again so far as material to this case. It then reads as follows: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, which, as amended, enacts that real or personal property to be included in an account shall be property of the following description—viz., any real or personal property taken under a disposition by a person dying on or after the 1st of June, 1881, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, which shall not have been bonâ fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased." This section 38 of the Act of 1881 is one of a group of sections under the heading "Stamps," which relates to the taking out of probate and letters of administration to the estate and effects of deceased persons — i.e., of property which deceased persons die possessed of, or leave behind them—and it seems to me that this group of sections has nothing to do with property a deceased person has not left behind him, excepting cases in which a deceased person would have left property behind him had he not given it away before he died. It is only as regards such cases that an account is to be rendered. Section 38 being one of the sections in this group, what is its true reading? Does it mean that a life estate—which of necessity comes to an end on the death of the tenant for life, and which never, under any circumstances, can come into an account upon the death of the tenant for life—is nevertheless to be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than twelve months before death, or is its true reading that, if there be property which would come into an account upon death if it had not been given away, that property must be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than twelve months before death? Considering that the group of sections in the Act of 1881 is dealing with the property of which deceased persons in fact die possessed, or should have died possessed if they had not given it away, in my opinion it is not the true reading of section 38 that property must be brought into an account no matter whether it would or would not have had to be brought into an account if it had not been given away within twelve months of the death. It is only to be brought into an account if it would have had to be so brought but for the gift. In my judgment this section is to prevent persons giving away property less than twelve months before death which otherwise would have to be included in an account, and thus escaping the duty. It is not disputed by the Crown that the life estate in the present case could never have been included in an account, for upon the death of the owner of this life estate, even if it had not been given to the son, it ipso facto came to an end, and there was therefore nothing whatever to bring into an account. For those reasons section 2 (1) (c) in my judgment does not bring about what is contended for by the Crown, and, as before stated, there is no other section which does so. I need not discuss Lord Cowley's case, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198, for it has no bearing upon the point I have to decide. I think the Crown is wrong, and I cannot agree with the Divisional Court, though upon what ground that court decided in favour of the Crown I do not know, for it has not told us. I think this appeal must be allowed, with costs.

COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read the following judgment: The decision in this case depends, it seems to me, upon the meaning of the word "property" in sub-section 2 (a) of section 38 of the Act of 1881, 44 Vict. c. 12. Does property there mean any property irrespective of the interest of the deceased therein? Or is it limited to property in which the deceased had an interest which by its nature might continue after the death of the deceased—i.e., property capable of devolution as estate of a deceased—or, in other words, an interest not limited to determine with the life of the deceased? Now, Lord Cairns in Partington v. Attorney-General, L. R. 4 H. L. 100, at p. 122, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 1, says, speaking of the construction of revenue statutes: "The principle of all fiscal legislation is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. . . . In other words, if there be admissible in any statute what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute." On the other hand, a taxing Act is to be construed upon the same principle and by the same rules as any other Act: Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas, 51 L. J. Q. B. 114 at p. 118, 30 W. R. Dig. 96 per Brett, L.J. For instance, I suppose that, if upon the ordinary rules of construction general words would be limited on the ejusdem generis doctrine by preceding particular words, this construction would be applied in a taxing statute equally with any other statute. Now in the present case there is nothing to be found in the statute itself limiting the ordinary legal meaning of the word "property"; but the statute refers to antecedent legislation, that is to say, to the statutes beginning with 55 Geo. 3 and coming down to 43 Vict. c. 14, granting the Crown certain duties in respect of the value of the estate and effects of deceased persons, and provides for an inventory or account being made by the executor or administrator of such estate and effects, and section 38 deals with what shall be included, and says in effect that it shall include not only property forming part of the estate and effects of the deceased at his death, but also property which he has parted with within three (now twelve) months before his death. Now, must not this mean, according to the ordinary rules of construction, property of the same kind as that dealt with in the antecedent legislation? That is to say, property in which the deceased had such an interest that if he had not parted with it by a gift within twelve months before his death, it would have been estate and effects of a deceased, and therefore have been included in the property on the value of which the duty was granted? It is clear in the antecedent legislation that no duty was granted in respect of property the interest of the deceased in which terminated with his life, for the duty was in respect of property as being estate and effects of a deceased; and must not the word "property" in subsequent legislation be read in the same sense? On the whole I think it must, and I find nothing in the Finance Act generally or in section 2 (1) (c) to enlarge the sense in which the word "property" is used in the probate duty legislation and the account to be rendered thereunder. The Probate Duty Acts prior to 1881 dealt with property capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased at death; for it dealt with property which in fact devolved as such estate at death. Then comes the statute of 1881, which says that the tax shall apply to property which does not in fact devolve at death but shortly before death is transferred by what purports to be a gift inter vivos, but which property, the statute says, shall be taxed in the same manner as property in fact devolving at death. Surely, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the word "property" in the statute of 1881 must be limited to property in its nature capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased. Thus to construe the word "property" in sub-section 2 of section 38 of 44 Vict. c. 12, is only to apply the ordinary rule of construction, that words in the same and in cognate connected lists must be presumed to have the same meaning.

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Receipt—Scrip certificate of stock—"Consideration money therein expressed"—Instalments—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 3, sub-section 2; Schedule I., "Receipt," exemption 11.

A duly stamped scrip certificate for £100 stock was issued upon payment of the allotment money, the balance being payable by two instalments of £40 each at fixed future dates. Payment in full might be made at any time subject to discount, and upon default in payment of the amounts at their due dates the previous payments were liable to forfeiture. At the foot of the certificate two blank forms of receipt for payment of the two instalments respectively were printed. The instalments were duly paid and the receipts filled in.

Held, that the receipts were exempt from stamp duty within exemption 11 under the heading "Receipt" in Schedule I. to the Stamp Act, 1891, as they were written upon the duly stamped certificate, and acknowledged the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed.

Appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (reported in 68 L. J. Q. B. 787, 47 W. R. Dig. 82).

On the 10th of May, 1899, two receipts, partly in print and partly in writing, appearing upon the face of a duly stamped scrip certificate of the Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. Stock, were presented on behalf of the London and Westminster Bank to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which they were chargeable.

The scrip certificate and the receipts respectively were in the following form:

"Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. Stock.

"Issue of £3,107,400.

"Scrip Certificate for £100.

"The bearer of this scrip certificate is entitled to £100 Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. Stock, 1933-1943, after payment to the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), Lothbury, of the instalments due thereon as under, viz.:—£40 on April 10, 1899, £40 on May 10, 1899.

"Payment in full may be made at any time, under discount at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. If default be made in payment of the amounts at their due dates, the previous payments will be liable to forfeiture.

"This scrip certificate, when fully paid, must be lodged at the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), Lothbury, for inscription in the books of the 'Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. Stock, 1933-1943,' in such name or names (not exceeding four) as may be desired. The interest on the stock will be payable at the London and Westminster Bank (Limited) on February 1 and August 1 in each year, and the principal will be repayable there on February 1, 1943, the Government of the Cape of Good Hope having the option to redeem the stock at par on or after February 1, 1933, on giving 12 calendar months' notice to the stockholders. Six months' interest on the stock will be paid on August 1, 1899.

"The revenues of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope alone are liable in respect of this stock and the dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury are not directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto (40 & 41 Vict. c. 59, s. 19).

"For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), J. A. BAKER, London, March 14, 1899.

"Received the 10th day of April, 1899, £40, being the instalment on the above scrip certificate, due April 10, 1899.—For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), J. L. OVINGTON."

"Received the 10th day of May, 1899, payment in full.—For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), H. E. BILLINGE."

The scrip certificate was duly stamped as such with the duty of 1d., and the London and Westminster Bank contended that by reason of exemption 11 under the head "Receipt" in Schedule I. to the Stamp Act, 1891, the receipts were exempt from duty.

The commissioners, being of opinion that the exemption was not applicable, assessed each of the receipts with the duty of 1d.

The questions for the opinion of the court were—(1) Whether the receipts or either of them were chargeable with the duty of 1d. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty they were respectively chargeable.

The Divisional Court held that the receipts were exempt.

The Inland Revenue Commissioners appealed.

The material provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, are set out in the judgment.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the commissioners.—The receipts come within section 101 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and are not within exemption 11 under the heading "Receipt" in Schedule I. to the Act. The "consideration money" for the scrip certificate, which was only a provisional certificate, was the sum paid upon allotment when the certificate was issued. The subsequent instalments of £40 each did not constitute the consideration money. The receipts do not acknowledge "the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed" within the meaning of exemption 11, because the two sums of £40 were not any part of the consideration money for the certificate. Nor is there any "principal money secured" by the scrip certificate within the exemption. There is nothing secured by the scrip certificate. Again, section 3, sub-section 2, of the Act applies, as there is more than one instrument written upon the same paper, and by that section each instrument must be separately stamped.

McIntyre (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the London and Westminster Bank.—The scrip certificate is duly stamped, and the consideration money is the full sum mentioned therein, and not merely the sum paid on allotment. The scrip certificate contains a bargain with the bearer to give him £100 worth of stock if he pays two instalments of £40 each in addition to the sum already paid on allotment. The £80 is therefore part of the consideration money, and exemption 11 applies. The £80 is also "principal money therein mentioned" within the exemption.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., replied.

Dec. 16.—The judgment of the court was read by

COLLINS, L.J.—This is an appeal by the Crown from the decision of Day and Lawrance, JJ., allowing an appeal from the commissioners. The question is whether certain receipts indorsed on a scrip certificate for £100 Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. Stock are liable to a duty of 1d. each under the Stamp Act, 1891, First Schedule, or whether they fall within the exemption (11). The scrip certificate, so far as material, is in these terms. [His lordship read the scrip certificate and the receipts, and continued:] The following is the provision of the Stamp Act, 1891, Schedule I.: "Receipt given for or upon the payment of money amounting to £2 or upwards, 1d." Exemption 11 is as follows: "Receipt indorsed or otherwise written upon or contained in any instrument liable to stamp duty, and duly stamped, acknowledging the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed, or the receipt of any principal money, interest, or annuity thereby secured or therein mentioned." The scrip certificate had been duly stamped as such, and on the date of its issue the first instalment, a sum under £20, had been paid in respect of it.

We are of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court was right. The scrip certificate is duly stamped, and the receipts are indorsed respectively or otherwise written upon it. Therefore if they "acknowledge the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed," they fall within the exemption. What then is meant by the "consideration money therein expressed" of which the receipt is to be acknowledged? We think it is the money which it appears from the terms of the instrument is the consideration for the obligation undertaken by the issuer of the instrument—i.e., the Government of the colony. It is in return for the payment not of one, but of all the instalments, that the Government undertakes this obligation, and it can make no difference whether the consideration is paid in a lump sum, or by instalments, or with conditions of forfeiture on non-payment of an instalment or not. Neither is it material that the instrument can be transferred pending the payment of the instalments, so that each may be paid by a different person. The money consideration is the same by whomsoever it is paid, and whatever may be conditions to which it is made subject. The point made by the Crown in the court below, that the scrip certificate is not "an instrument" within the exemption, was not taken before us; but it was argued by the Solicitor-General that the consideration for the certificate was not the sums of £40, or either of them mentioned in the receipts, but the first instalment paid on the issuing of the certificate. We think, with deference, that there is a fallacy in this argument, in that it confounds that which is payable as a condition precedent to getting the custody of the certificate with that which is expressed in the certificate as the consideration, not for the handing over of the certificate with the inchoate rights arising therefrom, but for the acceptance of the final obligation which is only assumed when all the instalments are paid. Is the consideration expressed in an instrument as the total sum in return for which the obligation is accepted any the less the consideration because it is made payable by instalments, and the custody of the instrument is handed over in exchange for the first instalment? In our opinion the receipts on this instrument acknowledge the payment of the full sum in return for which, by the terms of the instrument, the Cape Government undertake to treat the holder as entitled to £100 Cape of Good Hope Consolidated 3 per Cent. Stock. The Crown also relied upon section 3, sub-section 2, which enacts that "if more than one instrument be written upon the same piece of material, every one of the instruments is to be separately and distinctly stamped with the duty with which it is chargeable"; but this only applies if the instruments do not fall within exemption 11 above set out. We cannot say whether our reasons coincide with those of the Divisional Court, for they have given none; but on the grounds above stated, we are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Wills and Bruce, JJ.) upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the court as to the amount of duty with which an indenture of assignment of leasehold property dated the 27th of December, 1897, was chargeable: reported in 47 W. R. 300, [1899] 1 Q. B. 335.

By an indenture of lease bearing date the 16th of October, 1893, Rowell demised to Mills a parcel of ground and three dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d., and by the said indenture Mills covenanted to complete the three houses, and expend on the building of each of such houses the sum of £100 at the least, and he also entered into numerous other stringent covenants such as are often inserted in building leases. The three houses were erected, and were numbered 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace.

Rowell, by another indenture of lease bearing date the 10th of March, 1894, demised to Mills a parcel of ground and two dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £2 11s. The covenants in this indenture were similar to the covenants in the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893. The two houses were erected, and were numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace.

By an indenture bearing date the 27th of December, 1897, made between Mills of the one part and Annie Penelope Swayne (the present respondent) of the other part, Mills in consideration of the sum of £503 to him paid by Swayne assigned and conveyed unto Swayne—first, the two houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, being two of the three houses demised by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893; and, secondly, the two houses 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace, being the two houses demised by the indenture of the 10th of March, 1894, to hold the same for the residue then unexpired of the terms of ninety-nine years subject as to Nos. 7 and 8 to the apportioned yearly rent of £2 11s., part of the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d. reserved by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained, and subject as to Nos. 9 and 10 to the payment of the yearly rent of £2 11s. reserved by the indenture of the 10th of March, 1894, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained. Swayne covenanted with Mills to pay the several sums of £2 11s. and to observe and perform the covenants and conditions in the leases to Mills respectively contained and to keep Mills indemnified, and Mills covenanted with Swayne to pay the apportioned rent of £1 5s. 6d., the residue of the rent reserved by the indenture of the 16th of October, 1893.

The indenture of the 27th of December, 1897, was submitted to the commissioners under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the amount of duty chargeable thereon.

The commissioners were of opinion that the instrument fell to be charged under the head "Conveyance on Sale" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. In accordance with their practice they did not assess duty upon the capitalized value of the yearly rent of £2 11s. payable in respect of the houses numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace. They were of opinion, however, that duty was chargeable upon the rent of the same amount payable in respect of the houses numbered 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace abovementioned, and they assessed duty upon the said sum multiplied by twenty under section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. They also assessed duty upon the sum of £503, the premium payable under the instrument.

It was admitted that the houses 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace were of equal value.

Section 56 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, enacts that "Where the consideration or any part of the consideration for a conveyance on sale consists of money payable periodically for a definite period exceeding twenty years or in perpetuity, or for any indefinite period not terminable with life, the conveyance is to be charged in respect of that consideration with ad valorem duty on the total amount which will or may, according to the terms of sale, be payable during the period of twenty years next after the day of the date of the instrument."

Section 57 enacts that "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty.

The Divisional Court held that the duty was not chargeable upon the rent payable in respect of either set of houses.

The commissioners appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the commissioners.—Where the parties have themselves apportioned the rent to be paid by the assignee on the assignment of part of a property, the rent so apportioned must be capitalized under section 56, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891, and ad valorem duty is payable on the capital value under section 57. The property is conveyed subject to the payment of money within the meaning of section 57. If the parties do not apportion the rent the law will do it: Stevenson v. Lambard, 2 East, 575. Where the term is assigned subject to the payment of the rent, the assignee is liable to the assignor by privity of estate and not by contract, the lessee becoming a surety to the lessor for the assignee during the continuance of the assignee's estate: Wolveridge v. Steward, 1 Cr. & M. 644. The payment of the rent is inherent in the possession of the property, and not something outside it. But where the parties apportion the rent, and there is a covenant to pay the apportioned rent, the liability to pay the rent is not inherent in the possession of the property; it depends upon the covenant, and extends beyond the continuance of the assignee's estate. The covenant is part of the consideration for the assignment. The capitalized value of the yearly rent of £2 11s. for Nos. 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace is therefore liable to duty under section 57.

They also referred to Inland Revenue Commissioners v. City of Glasgow Bank, 8 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 389.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondent, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal fails. It seems to me that the judgment of Bruce, J., is right. A person of the name of Mills was the lessee of three houses in Bowden-hill-terrace, numbered 6, 7, and 8, at the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d. He was also lessee of two houses, 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace, at a yearly rent of £2 11s. Mills, in consideration of a sum of £503, conveyed to the respondent Swayne Nos. 7 and 8, subject to the yearly rent of £2 11s. part of the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d., and also Nos. 9 and 10, subject to the yearly rent of £2 11s. It was admitted that the rent of £2 11s. in respect of the former houses was a proper apportionment. With regard to Nos. 9 and 10 the commissioners say that in accordance with their practice they did not assess duty upon the capitalized value of the yearly rent payable in respect thereof. For the reasons which have been given by Bruce, J., I think that the commissioners were quite right in that view, and I agree with Bruce, J., that there is no distinction between those houses and Nos. 7 and 8. When once it is remembered that the liability to pay the rent is inherent in, or in other words arises out of, the nature of the estate conveyed, I cannot see any difference between the two sets of houses. The principles applicable to the one set apply equally to the other.

COLLINS L.J.—I am of the some opinion, and can add nothing to the reasons so well given in the court below.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (47 W. R. 415, [1899] 1 Q. B. 345) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Wills and Bruce, JJ.) upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891: reported in 47 W. R. 415, [1899] 1 Q. B. 345.

A debenture was presented on behalf of the issuers thereof—the Knights Deep (Limited) (the apellants)—to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The instrument in question was a first debenture for £100 issued by the Knights Deep (Limited), incorporated under the laws of the South African Republic. The share capital was £550,000, divided into 550,000 shares of £1 each, the debenture being one of an issue of £400,000 in 4,000 debentures of £100 each, carrying interest at the rate of £5 10s. per cent. per annum, all ranking equally in security.

The debenture stated that "for valuable consideration already received the Knights Deep (Limited) (hereinafter called the company) will, as and when the principal moneys hereby secured become payable in accordance with the conditions indorsed hereon, pay to the Simmer and Jack Proprietary Mines (Limited), of 8, Old Jewry, E.C., or other the registered holder for the time being hereof, the sum of £100. The company will in the meantime until such payment pay interest thereon at the rate of

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£5 10s. per cent. per annum by half-yearly payments on every 1st day of July and 1st day of January. This debenture is subject to the conditions indorsed hereon which are to be deemed part of it."

The conditions indorsed on the debenture showed that the debenture was one of a series of debentures for securing principal sums amounting in the aggregate to £400,000, carrying interest at the rate of £5 10s., and that they were all to rank pari passu in point of charge without any preference or priority one over another.

Condition 8 provided that debentures of the nominal value of £26,000 would be redeemed by the company on the 1st of July, 1902, and on each succeeding 1st of July up to and including the 1st of July, 1917, when the balance then outstanding would be redeemed; that the debentures to be redeemed would be determined by annual drawings, which the company would cause to be made at its branch office in London or at such other place as the company should determine; and that such drawings would be made not less than twenty-one or more than sixty days before the respective yearly days on which the debentures were to be redeemed, and the principal moneys thereby secured would become payable on the 1st of July next after this debenture should have been drawn for redemption.

Condition 17 indorsed on the debenture provided: "The company may at any time after the 1st of July, 1900, redeem this debenture at £103 on giving six calendar months' previous notice in writing so to do to the registered holder, and upon the expiration of such notice the said sum of £103 shall become payable as if the same was the amount of the principal moneys secured, and shall thereupon cease to carry interest. Provided always that the company shall not without the consent of the registered holder be at liberty to give such notice unless concurrently it shall give due notice to redeem in like manner all the then outstanding debentures of the said series."

The appellants were a foreign company, and the debenture, which bore date the 8th of October, 1898, was made and issued by them in the United Kingdom and was capable of being sold in a stock market of the United Kingdom. In these circumstances it was admitted that the debenture fell within division (b) of the following head of charge in the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891—namely, "Marketable Security. (1) Marketable security (a) being a Colonial Government security, or (b) being a security not transferable by delivery, or (c) being a security transferable by delivery and bearing date or signed or offered for subscription before or on the 6th of August, 1885.

| "For or in respect of the money thereby secured. | "The same ad valorem duty according to the nature of the security as upon a mortgage." |

The commissioners were of opinion that the money thereby secured withing the meaning of the said head of charge was the sum of £103, and accordingly assessed the instrument as liable to a duty of 3s. 9d., being the duty payable on a mortgage of that amount.

The appellants contended that the money thereby secured was £100 only, in which case the duty under the said head of charge was 2s. 6d. only.

The questions for the opinion of the court were—(1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the duty of 3s. 9d. in accordance with the assessment of the commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty the instrument was chargeable.

The Divisional Court affirmed the order of the commissioners.

The company appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the appellants.—The money secured by the debenture is £100 only. When the debenture was presented to the commissioners for their opinion as to the duty, the company had not and could not then have exercised the option given by condition 17. Until the 1st of July, 1900, no more than £100 can possibly become payable. The company may at any time after that date, at their own option, give notice to pay off the debenture before its due date. If they elect to do so, they will have to pay a sum of £3 beyond the £100 secured by the debenture as the price payable for the privilege of redeeming at the earlier date: per Vaughan Williams, J., in Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1897] 2 Q. B. 194, at p. 198, 45 W. R. Dig. 71. By section 86, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, a mortgage is defined as a security for the payment of any definite and certain sum of money. The only definite and certain sum here is the £100.

They also referred to Barker v. Smark, 7 M. & W. 590.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the commissioners.—The debenture contains a promise to pay £103 upon the contingency of the company giving notice to redeem at the earlier date. Money secured on a contingency is chargeable: Dickson v. Cass, 1 B. & Ad. 343; Canning v. Raper, 1 E. & B. 164; Maxwell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 4 Ct. Sess. Cas., 3rd series, 1121. Upon the notice being given the company becomes liable to pay off the debenture at £103 under the covenant in the debenture. The moment the notice is given the obligation to pay £103 attaches, and from that moment the debenture gives a charge for that sum, condition 17 providing that upon the expiration of the notice £103 shall become payable as if the same was the amount of the principal moneys thereby secured. It is not the case of a mere option to pay off the debenture at a premium, without any charge being given for the premium, as was the case contemplated in the dictum of Vaughan Williams, J., in Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. If, however, that dictum is supposed to cover a case like the present, it cannot be supported. The actual decision in that case is in favour of the view now taken by the commissioners. It makes no difference that the fulfilment of the condition is at the option of the obligor.

They also referred to City of London Brewery Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 216, [1899] 1 Q. B. 121.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The sole point is whether or not within the meaning of Schedule I., heading "Marketable Security," in the Stamp Act, 1891, £103 or £100 is the money "secured" by this debenture. It is admitted that the debenture is a "marketable security." The same ad valorem duty is payable as in the case of a mortgage, and therefore if the sum secured is £100, the duty is 2s. 6d.; if £103, the duty is 3s. 9d.

Now, upon the face of the document the debenture is for £100 and no more. By clause 17 of the conditions indorsed on the debenture, the company has the option at any time after the 1st of July, 1900, of redeeming the debenture at £103 on giving six months' notice in writing. That gives the company the option, if they choose to adopt that course, at any time after the 1st of July, 1900, of paying off the £100 debentures before the time stipulated therein for payment—that is to say, two years before any of the debentures become due. The question we have to consider is, What sum does each debenture secure?

In my opinion the debenture secures the sum of £100 only, and not £103, because the obligors—that is, the company, need never, except of their own free will and pleasure, give notice to redeem the debentures at £103. I cannot agree with Wills, J., in the court below, that the decision in Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners covers the present case. In that case a company had issued debentures of £100 each, each debenture containing an undertaking by the company to pay to the registered holder on a specified date the sum of £100, together with a premium thereon of £7 10s., and it was held that such debenture was a security for the payment by the company of £107 10s. I think that the court was right in so holding. In the present case Wills, J., said: "If there were no absolute covenant to pay the £3 in a certain event, but only a stipulation that if the company chose to pay the £3 they were to have the privilege of paying off the principal should they be called upon to do so, the case would be different." To my mind, with great respect for the learned judge, that passage exactly covers the present case. There is no absolute covenant to pay the £103. There is only a stipulation that if the company elect to pay off the debentures after the 1st of July, 1900, and before their due date, they will pay £103 upon each debenture For these reasons I think that £100 is the sum secured by the debenture, and not £103, and the duty chargeable is 2s. 6d.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Though we are differing from the conclusion arrived at in the Divisional Court, I think we are really giving effect to the opinion expressed by Wills, J., in the passage which has been read by my lord. I therefore claim the authority of the learned judge in support of our decision, and for this reason: when the case is stripped of its fringe in the nature of the machinery as to giving notice, there is merely a stipulation to the effect that if the company choose to pay £3 they are to have the privilege of paying off the principal sum of £100 at a date prior to its maturity. It is true that before the company can exercise that option there are certain formalities which they must conform to. But whether they do or do not conform to these formalities depends entirely upon their own will and pleasure. Simply stated, the £3 is a liquidated sum which the company undertakes to pay in the event of their thinking it worth their while to pay off the debentures before their maturity and thereby to deprive the debenture-holder of the right to receive the stipulated rate of interest thereon up to maturity. A bond cannot be said to be a security for that which is only payable at the option of the obligor.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The £3 is a premium payable if the option given to the company of paying off the debenture before it would otherwise mature is exercised by the company. It is, to my mind, no part of the sum secured, and does not alter the amount of £100 secured by the debenture.

Company — Winding up — Liquidator — Invalid appointment.

Even assuming that it is competent for a company, after passing a resolution for voluntary winding up, to proceed forthwith, without previous notice of intention, to the election of a liquidator, yet the company will be taken to have abrogated this general power in cases in which notice has been given of intention to elect a particular person as liquidator, and will not be at liberty, in case such person is rejected, to proceed forthwith to the election of some other person.

Motion.

This was a motion in an ordinary debenture-holders' action asking, on behalf of the defendant company, that the receiver already appointed in the action by Kekewich, J., on the 1st of December, 1899, might be ordered to hand over to Mr. Marreco, the liquidator of the company, certain books and documents belonging to the company and not comprised in the debenture-holders' security.

It appeared from the affidavit of the receiver in the debenture-holders' action that he was perfectly willing to hand over the books in question as the court might direct, but that in the meanwhile he was informed by his solicitors that they had grave doubts as to whether Mr. Marreco had been properly appointed liquidator of the company. It appeared from an affidavit of the secretary of the defendant company that at an extraordinary meeting held on the 1st of November, 1899, the defendant company had duly passed the following resolutions: (1) That the company be wound up voluntarily; (2) That Mr. W. Walker be appointed as liquidator.

On the 6th of November notices were sent out to the shareholders convening an extraordinary general meeting for the 16th of November, 1899, for the purpose of confirming the above two resolutions. On the meeting being held on the 16th of November, the first of the above two resolutions was confirmed; but the appointment of Mr. Walker was not confirmed, and Mr. Marreco was appointed in his place.

Ward Coldridge, for the defendant company.—The liquidator is properly appointed. Liquidators may be appointed, without special notice, at the general meeting at which a resolution for voluntarily winding up is passed: Oakes v. Turquand, 15 W. R. 120, 2 H. L. Cas. 325, per Lord Chelmsford, at p. 355; In re Welsh Flannel and Tweed Co., 23 W. R. 558, L. R. 20 Eq. 360. Here, it is true, notice was given to appoint a particular liquidator; but that resolution having been lost, it may be treated as though no notice had ever been given of it, and an effective resolution to wind up having been passed, the company was thereupon free to elect whatever liquidator it chose: In re Indian Zoedone Co., 32 W. R. 481, 26 Ch. D. 70.

Warrington, Q.C., and Martelli, for the receiver.—This is not a case of a company being wound up simply, and of its then proceeding to appoint a liquidator without previous notice. Here a meeting has been expressly called to confirm the appointment of a particular gentleman, and to substitute another in his place at the last moment is practically to amend the previous resolution. That, however, is impossible.

Ward Coldridge replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This point arises in a peculiar way, and has, I think, never been decided before. I take it that what Lord Chelmsford meant by his dictum in Oakes v. Turquand is nothing more than this, that where a resolution to wind up requires confirmation, and there has been no resolution as to liquidators at all, then, if liquidators be appointed without notice at the confirmatory meeting, their appointment is perfectly good. I should have thought, indeed, that where a meeting is called for the express purpose of confirming a certain resolution, it would be open to argument that the meeting could do no more than confirm or reject that resolution. But even assuming that it could do more, that is not the case we have here. Here we have a liquidator actually appointed at the previous meeting; and then, at the confirmatory meeting, he finds himself rejected and another man appointed in his place. That seems to me to be wrong. I go on the ground that it is not possible to do more, in the case of any particular resolution of which notice has been previously given, than affirm or reject it as it stands—that it is not possible to amend it. A shareholder is entitled to know whether or not it is worth his while to attend a particular meeting. He may have no particular objection, for instance, to the appointment of a proposed person as liquidator, and so may decide not to be present. It would be unfair if some different and objectionable person were then to be appointed behind his back. It seems to me, for the reason indicated, that the liquidator in this case has not been properly appointed.

TITCHMARSH v. ROYSTON WATER CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Easement—Way of necessity—Vendor and purchaser—Land sold not entirely "landlocked" by other land of vendor—Implied grant.

Where land is sold which is surrounded, partly by other land of the vendor, but partly by the land of a stranger, a grant of a right of way, as of necessity, will not be implied over the other land of the vendor.

Motion.

By an agreement in writing dated the 5th of June, 1896, the directors of the defendant company entered into a contract with Lord Hampden for the sale to them of a certain plot of land measuring in extent about six acres. and then forming part of the Flint Hall Farm, the property of Lord Hampden.

By another agreement in writing dated the 27th of November, 1897, the Flint Hall Farm was let to the plaintiff upon a yearly tenancy at an annual rent of £252 11s. 6d.

The plaintiff had notice at the time of this latter agreement of the previous agreement of the 5th of June, 1896, and it was agreed between him and Lord Hampden that, on the execution by the latter of the conveyance to the defendant company of the aforesaid six acres, the plaintiff's rent should be reduced by £6.

The said conveyance was ultimately executed on the 25th of June, 1898.

It appeared from the affidavits read on the hearing of the motion that the plot of land then conveyed to the defendant company was bounded on three sides by an unsold portion of Flint Hall Farm, and on the fourth side by the public highway, which latter, however, ran at this point through a cutting in the chalk twenty feet deep, and with perpendicular sides, so as to be extremely difficult of access from the plot in question. There was, however, an existing accommodation road running over the unsold portion of Flint Hall Farm, by which the defendant company would be enabled to get to the six acres they had purchased. There was, however, no direct and regular connection between this road and the six acres in question. The defendant company having claimed a right of way over this accommodation road, broke open a lock on a gate kept fastened by the plaintiff, and made an opening on to their property through the plaintiff's hedge. The plaintiff now sought to restrain them by injunction from further trespassing on the land in his occupation.

It was agreed between the parties to treat this motion as the trial of the action.

R. J. Parker, for the plaintiff.

Warrington, Q.C., and Methold, for the defendant company.—A right of way over this road is an easement of necessity, and must accordingly be taken to have passed to us by an implied grant under the agreement of the 5th of June, 1896, and the conveyance of the 25th of June, 1898: Brown v. Alabaster, 36 W. R. 155, 37 Ch. D. 490.

R. J. Parker, in reply.—To imply the grant of a right of way as of necessity, it is incumbent on the purchaser to show not merely that these six acres are land-locked, but also that they are land-locked entirely by other land of the vendor.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case a right of way over the accommodation road is claimed by the defendants as a way of necessity. In Brown v. Alabaster, Kay, J., decided in favour of the right of way there claimed on the ground that there was an implied grant of a continuous and apparent easement; and about that nothing more need be said. But on the claim of a way of necessity he made the following observations, p. 500: "Now as a way of necessity I think it is difficult to support it, for the following reason. A way of necessity is not a defined way. A way of necessity is a way which is the most convenient access to a land-locked tenement over other property belonging to the grantor, and it is quite clear that a grantor has a right himself to elect in which line, in which course, the way of necessity should go. Here there is no case of election. The claim is to a way over this particular road, without any right of election at all on the part of the grantor. That of itself would be enough to show it is not a way of necessity."

I venture to doubt the soundness of this ruling, which if accepted would be fatal to the purchaser's claim here. It may hold good in a large majority of instances, but if there be only one possible mode of access—one line, that is, or one course—it would, I think, be going too far to say that this alone excludes a way of necessity when the other circumstances of the case are strong to establish it. The peculiar circumstances here are that the land in question is not blocked on all sides, though it is blocked on three sides, by land of the vendor. The question arises, Is the doctrine which calls into existence a way of necessity applicable to such a case? Many statements of that doctrine are to be found in the books, but there is none better than that in Williams' Saunders. In the notes in Pomfret v. Ricroft (vol. 1, p. 570) it is thus stated: "Where a man having a close surrounded with his own land grants the close to another in fee for life or years, the grantee shall have a way to the close over the grantor's land as incident to the grant, for without it he cannot derive any benefit from the grant." "A way of necessity," it is said on p. 571, "when the nature of it is considered, will be found to be nothing else but a way by grant. It derives its origin from the grant." This statement, by the use of the words "surrounded with his own land," excludes such a case as this, where the granted premises are not surrounded by land of the vendor, but abut on one side on land of a stranger. There is no authority for extending the doctrine to such a case as that. In Gale on Easements (5th ed.), p. 133, the doctrine is stated in almost precisely the same language, with this addition: "So, too, if the close be not entirely inclosed by my land, but partly by the land of strangers, for he cannot go over the land of strangers, quære." For this reference is made to Rolle's Abridgment and Viner's Abridgment. I have referred to these volumes, and have ascertained that the quotation is accurate, including the quære, which is to be found in both works; but I have not come across any comment on either the statement or the quære. It seems to me that this statement is inconsistent with the doctrine as above explained, and with the principle on which it is founded. No such excrescence is justified by the old and often quoted case of Clarke v. Cogge, in Cro. Jac., 170, where the extension of the doctrine to a reservation in favour of the vendor, as against the purchasers, is established.

Some argument was addressed to the peculiar feature of this case—i.e., that the boundary on the fourth side is a highway, and the fact that such highway runs in a cutting which would make connection with the granted land difficult. There is, however, no occasion for me, having regard to the view that I have taken in this case, to discuss the right of a man whose land adjoins a highway to make a road into it, if he has not already got access thereto.

ROGERS v. HOSEGOOD. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Restrictive covenant—Covenant running with the land—Intention—User—Private dwelling-house—Residential flats.

Covenants entered into by a purchaser for the benefit of the vendor's adjoining land are annexed to and the benefit of them passes with such land to the vendor's assignees, if the intention that they should do so is expressed in the conveyance to the original purchaser.

An express assignment of the benefit to the assignee is not necessary.

Action with witnesses.

The action was brought by William Rodrigues Rogers and the trustees of the will of the late Sir John Millais, as owners of property in Palace-gate, Kensington, for the purpose of enforcing restrictive covenants, to which the defendant's adjoining land was alleged to be subject.

On the 31st of May, 1869, William Duke of Bedford purchased from the firm of Cubitt & Co., of which the plaintiff Rogers was one of the partners, a piece of land situated at the corner of Palace-gate and Kensington-gore, which formed part of the property to which the action related, and covenanted to erect thereon no more than one messuage or dwelling-house, with such suitable outhouses and stabling (if any) as it might be thought fit to erect in connection therewith, and that such messuage should be adapted for and used as and for a private residence only, and that no trade or business should be carried on in or upon such plot. This covenant was expressed to be entered into with intent that it "might so far as possible bind the premises conveyed and every part thereof into whosesoever hands the same might come and might enure for the benefit of" Messrs. Cubitt & Co. "their heirs, assigns, and others claiming under them to all or any of their lands adjoining or near to the" land in question.

On the 31st of July in the same year an adjoining plot was conveyed to the Duke by Messrs. Cubitt & Co., and the conveyance contained a covenant by him that the messuage and buildings on the plot conveyed should be used as and for a private residence and necessary outbuildings and stables only, and that no trade or business should at any time be carried on, in, or upon the plot. This covenant was expressed to be entered into with the same intent as that in the earlier conveyance. Subsequently a third adjoining plot was conveyed to the Duke by the firm, but the conveyance contained no covenants of the like nature.

On the 25th of March, 1873, Messrs. Cubitt & Co. conveyed to Sir John Millais a plot in Palace-gate near those conveyed by them to the Duke of Bedford. The conveyance to him contained no express assignment of the benefit of the covenants entered into by the Duke of Bedford, but only general words conveying "all the rights, easements, and appurtenances belonging, or reputed to belong," to the plot of land.

The Duke of Bedford erected on the plots conveyed to him a large mansion known as Thorney House; the plot belonging to Sir John Millais was occupied by the house known as No. 2, Palace-gate.

William Duke of Bedford died in 1872, and was succeeded by Francis Charles Hastings, who became entitled as devisee under his predecessor's will to Thorney House and the adjoining land, which had been purchased from Cubitt & Co.

On the 30th of October, 1876, indentures were executed by Cubitt & Co., and by Francis Duke of Bedford, by which the former released the latter, so far as they lawfully could, from the restrictive covenants contained in the indentures of the 31st of May and the 31st of July, 1869, with respect to the number of messuages to be built on the land, and the latter covenanted to indemnify the firm and its members in respect of the release and its consequences.

Sir John Millais died in August, 1896, and by his will the plaintiffs—the trustees—became entitled to the plot of land conveyed to him by Cubitt & Co., and to the mansion erected on it. The plaintiff Rogers had, after the date of the release above-mentioned, purchased from the firm two other plots upon which were built the houses known as Nos. 7 and 11, Palace-gate.

The defendant had acquired from the devisees of Francis Duke of Bedford the plots acquired by him from Cubitt & Co., and proposed to pull down Thorney House and to build a large block containing from thirty to forty residential flats, eight on each floor.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting on the land any building other than a private residence and from carrying on any trade or business thereon; and the plaintiffs, the trustees, also claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting on either of the plots any building which, by reason of its consisting of flats or groups of flats or otherwise, should consist of more than one messuage or dwelling-house with suitable outhouses and stabling.

The evidence showed that the proposed flats were to be built round an open courtyard, which, with the corridors, lifts, and staircases communicating with it, was to be the only part of the building devoted to the common use of the tenants. None of the flats was to communicate directly with the street.

Haldane, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the plaintiffs.—The cases dealing with the devolution of the benefit of restrictive covenants fall into three classes: (1) Those where there is a general building scheme, (2) those where there is an express assignment of the benefit of the covenants, and (3) those where there is an expression of intention that the covenants shall enure for the benefit of the assignee. The present case falls into the last of the three classes. [FARWELL, J., referred to Eastwood v. Lever, 12 W. R. 195, 4 De G. J. & S. 114.] The deeds of May and July, 1869, contain the express intention which is necessary: Renals v. Cowlishaw, 28 W. R. 9, 11 Ch. D. 866, approved by the House of Lords in Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12. [FARWELL, J.—Is it enough to show that the vendor might have assigned the benefit of the covenants if he has not done so in fact?] This covenant is expressed to be intended to enure for the benefit of a subsequent purchaser, and it will so enure even if he is not aware of its existence. The benefit of the covenant is distributed, and is thus, as it were, become part of the land. It is like the case of a building scheme where the benefit of the covenant is said to be annexed to the land. Master v. Hansard, 25 W. R. 570, 4 Ch. D. 718, is distinguishable as being a case of lessor and lessee; but in London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562, the late Master of the Rolls said that in such cases a covenant is enforced on the analogy of an easement. Like an easement, the covenant is, as it were, a piece reserved out of the property. [FARWELL, J.—Where there is no building scheme there is not the same basis of knowledge among all the occupiers. It seems that the cases rest upon the common agreement among all the purchasers.] There is the same substratum here of the annexation of the covenant to the land. In Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 15 Q. B. D. 261, 16 Q. B. D. 778, 33 W. R. Dig. 231, it was held that covenants forming part of a general building scheme were binding upon a subsequent purchaser who had no knowledge of their existence. This is not a creation of a new estate but a restriction of the user of land. There is no reason why the benefit of this covenant should not run with the land at law, as well as in equity; it is within the first resolution in Spencer's case, 5 Rep. 16, see also the notes to the case in 1 Sm. L. C. 52. Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 33 W. R. 807, 29 Ch. D. 750, and Western v. Macdermot, 15 W. R. 265, L. R. 1 Eq. 499, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 72, show that where the benefit of the covenant runs with the land at law the assignee is bound in equity, and there is no question of notice. Child v. Douglas, 2 W. R. 461, Kay 560, and In re Birmingham and District Land Co. and Allday, 41 W. R. 189, [1893] 1 Ch. 342, show that since Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler the real question is that of intention. From Morland v. Cook, 16 W. R. 777, L. R. 6 Eq. 252, and other cases already cited, it is clear that Sir John Millais' trustees are entitled to the benefit of the covenants. The covenant is threefold: (1) To erect on the land only one messuage; (2) to use the messuage as a private residence only; (3) to carry on no trade or business there. What the defendant proposes to do is to construct a large number of messuages, which is a breach of the first part of the covenant; but if the proposed block is only one messuage then it cannot be said that it is used for a private residence only, but the trade of a lodging-house keeper will be carried on there, which would be a breach of the second and third parts of the covenant. Hobson v. Tulloch, 46 W. R. 331, [1898] 1 Ch. 424, shows what is meant by a private residence. Since Doherty v. Allman, 26 W. R. 513, 3 App. Cas. 709, it is clear that the real question is what the parties to the covenant intended by it, and not whether the act intended to be done will be for the benefit of the property. Nor is this like Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, 24 W. R. 996, 1 Ex. D. 469, a case of the construction of a statute.

Hughes, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the defendant.—There has been some confusion as to the meaning of covenants entered into for the benefit of the covenantee and other persons. They are primarily entered into with the covenantee only, and he is given the power of transferring the benefit to his assigns, but he is, except in the building scheme cases, under no obligation to do so. The plaintiff is compelled to say that a restrictive covenant is of the nature of an interest in the land. London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, which was cited for this purpose, was a case of an option to purchase, as was pointed out in Mackenzie v. Childers, 38 W. R. 243, 43 Ch. D. 265. No one can have a right unless he claims through the covenantee; the assign has no locus standi of his own. There are two questions which have not always been kept distinct:—(1) Did the vendor acquire the right to give the benefit to other persons? There is no question that in the present case he did; and in the building scheme cases this is implied by the court. (2) Has he given the benefit to his assignee? We submit that in this case it has not been shown that the benefit was assigned to Sir John Millais. The deed of conveyance to him contains a partial recital of the conveyance to the Duke of Bedford, but stops short before getting to the restrictive covenants. This is strong evidence that it was not intended to give Sir John the benefit of them, and so is the fact that the covenants entered into by Sir John himself are different. This is merely a personal right, and does not touch or concern the land, and therefore cannot run with the land at law; if it did, much of the discussion in cases like Keates v. Lyon, 17 W. R. 338, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 218, and Spicer v. Martin would be idle. The benefit of the covenant was not a right "belonging or reputed to belong" to the land: Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham and Thomas v. Hayward, L. R. 4 Ex. 311, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 73. If this covenant ran with the land Renals v. Cowlishaw must be wrong. In Western v. Macdermot there were mutual obligations. The covenants cannot be construed so as to enure to the benefit of the assignee: Child v. Douglas and Master v. Hansard. There is nothing to show that Sir John Millais purchased or intended to acquire the benefit of the covenant. As for the plaintiff Rogers, he has no power to object to the erection of any number of messuages. But in any case this is not more than one messuage; a house does not become several houses because it is occupied by several families: Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association. The fact that a house has several entrances or several staircases does not make it more than one house. It is a fair interpretation to the covenant to hold that a messuage means a block of buildings under one roof. As far as the London building laws are concerned a block of flats is treated as a dwelling-house.

Haldane in reply.—It has never been held to be a necessary condition for the covenant to run with the land at law that it should be reciprocal: 1 Sm. L. C. 87 (9th ed.). All that is necessary is that there should be a covenantor and a covenantee and that the covenant should "touch or concern" the thing transferred. As to the meaning of this see Vernon v. Smith, 5 B. & Ald. 1, and Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & C. 410.

Nov. 7.—FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows: In this state of facts three questions arise for determination: (1) Whether the building proposed to be erected by the defendant is a breach of the covenant in the indenture of the 31st of May, 1869; (2) of that in the indenture of the 31st of July, 1869; and, if so, (3) whether the plaintiffs or any of them are entitled to sue in respect of such covenant. In considering the first two questions I have to determine three points: (1) Whether the building proposed to be erected is one messuage or dwelling-house; (2) if it is one only, is it adapted and used as and for a private residence only? (3) will a trade or business be carried on upon the premises by the mode in which the defendant proposes to use the same? In my opinion, a block of flats such as is proposed is not one messuage, but several. I cannot see any substantial difference for the purposes of a covenant of this nature between a terrace of adjoining residences, separated from one another vertically, and a pile of residences separated from one another horizontally. If the building of the defendant was carried no higher than the ground floor it would, in my opinion, be impossible to contend that each of the residences opening on to the inner area was not a separate house, and I cannot see that the superposition of seven other rows of residences can make any difference. This is a mere question of construction, on which a rating case such as that cited, Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association (Limited), can have little bearing; but I would point out that in that case the court held that the whole block was a house, but pointed out that each set of chambers might be a house also. The case of the domus mansionalis cited at 24 W. R., p. 998 (Evans and Finch's case, Cro. Car. 473) has some bearing on the point. The covenant in the deed of July, 1869, differs from that in the earlier deed in that it contains no express covenant that there shall be one messuage only; but on the true construction of the covenant I have come to the conclusion that the result is the same. In my opinion a large building which is to be used as thirty or forty separate residential flats does not answer the description of a messuage to be used as and for a private residence. But even if the whole structure could be regarded as a private residence only, it is difficult to see how thirty or forty different families and establishments can find place therein, unless the owner of such entire messuage is carrying on the trade of letting apartments.

The third question is that which was most elaborately argued—viz., whether the benefit of the covenants in the two indentures of 1869 passed to Sir John Millais and through him to his trustees so as to enable them to maintain this action. It is not contended that the burden of these covenants has not passed to the defendant; he is obviously bound by reason of notice, whether the covenant as regards him runs with the land or not: Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phillips, 774. It has been argued that this is a covenant the benefit of which runs with the land at law, or if not at law, at any rate in equity, and further that even if this is not so the benefit of the covenants passes by the express general words "rights, easements, or appurtenances belonging or reported to belong thereto." In my opinion the benefit of the covenants runs with the land now vested in the Millais trustees at law. I do not think it necessary to call in aid the analogy of easements, as suggested by Mr. Haldane, on the authority of London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm. The accurate expression appears to me to be that the covenants are annexed to the land and pass with it in much the same way as title deeds, which have been quaintly called the sinews of land: Co. Litt. 6 a. Thus the right to sue on such covenants passes to the heir and not to the executor; the assignee of such covenants could sue under the old law in his own name in the days when the assignee of no other chose in action could do so, and before the practice as to venue was abolished, actions on such covenants, when brought by lessees, were local and not transitory: see Thursby v. Plant, 1 Wms. Saund. 300 n. 10. The law, in fact, acted on the sound principle of giving damage to the party aggrieved. Covenants which run with the land must have the following characteristics: (1) They must be made with a covenantee who has an interest in the land to which they refer; (2) they must concern or touch the land. It is not contended that the covenants in question in this case have not the first characteristic, but it is said that they fail in the second. I am of opinion that they possess both. Adopting the definition of Bayley, J., in Mayor of Congleton v. Pattison, 10 East 130, the covenant must either affect the land as regards mode of occupation, or it must be such as per se, and not merely from collateral circumstances, affects the value of the land. It is to my mind obvious that the value of Sir J. Millais's land is directly increased by the covenants in question. If authority is needed I would refer to Mann v. Stephens, 15 Sim. 377, a case very similar to the present; Vyvyan v. Arthur; The Priors case, 1 Sm. L. C. 56; Fleetwood v. Hull, 37 W. R. 714, 23 Q. B. D. 35; White v. Southend Hotel Co., 45 W. R. 434, [1897] 1 Ch. 767. I see no difficulty in holding that the benefit of a covenant runs with the land of the covenantee, while the burden of the same covenant does not run with the land of the covenantor. This must always be the case with regard to grants in fee if it be the better opinion (as Cotton, L.J., in Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham and the editors of Smith's Leading Cases think) that the burden of such covenants never runs with the land. At common law the lessee's covenants run with the land, but the lessor's did not run with the reversion; the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, was passed to give the reversioner the same benefit the lessee had; and the definition of a covenant which runs with the land, stated by the learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases (p. 58) is "when either the liability to perform it or with right to take advantage of it passes to the assignee of that land." But a covenant may have the two characteristics above mentioned and yet not run with the land; it is in each case a question of intention to be determined by the court on the construction of the particular document, and with due regard to the nature of the covenant and the surrounding circumstances. No covenant can run with the land which has not the two characteristics above mentioned, but every covenant which has those two characteristics does not necessarily run with the land. That it is a question of intention in each case to be determined on construction is apparent from the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Hall in Renals v. Cowlishaw, a judgment of the highest authority, not only from the weight attaching to the opinion of the learned Vice-Chancellor, but also from the approval that it has received in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords: see Spicer v. Martin and Nottingham Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler.

The courts have drawn the inference that the parties intended, or in other words the courts have held on the true construction of the documents that they have contracted, that the covenants shall or shall not run with the land from various circumstances. Thus in Renals v. Cowlishaw there was nothing to show what assigns where intended by the words of the covenant; there was no necessary implication that each assign of each parcel of the vendor's land, whether acquired before or after the date of the deed, was to have the benefit of the covenant; the impression, indeed, was to the contrary, and the courts accordingly held that the covenant did not run, but must be expressly assigned in order to pass. Contrast this with the case of ordinary covenants for title; these undoubtedly run with the land and each purchaser of each portion of the land gets the benefit of the covenants so far as they relate to the land purchased by him. In both these cases the covenants are entered into with the heirs and assigns, but in the former case the word "assign," on its true construction of the deed, means "assign of the covenant," in the latter "assign of the land, to which is annexed the benefit of the covenant by virtue of the evidence of intention so to contract which is found in the deed and the surrounding circumstances." Again, take the cases of building schemes. There is no express assignment of the benefit of the covenants, but it is held that the true intent of the parties, and consequently the true construction of the covenant, is to be found by applyi ng the words of the deed to the surrounding circumstances. A similar conclusion has been arrived at in cases where there is no general scheme, but various persons enter into similar covenants with reference to lands that lie adjacent to one another. It is sufficient for me to refer to Nottingham Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, Western v. MacDermot, Whatman v. Gibson, 9 Sim. 196; Coles v. Sims, 2 W. R. 151, Kay 56. Treating it, then, as a question of construction, I find the express contract to be that these covenants were entered into "with intent that they should bind the premises conveyed by the deeds of 1869, and every part thereof, into whosesoever hands the same might come, and should enure to the benefit of Messrs. Cubitt & Co., their heirs and assigns, and others claiming under them all or any of their lands adjoining or near to the said premises." The draftsman would appear to have had Hall, V.C.'s, words before him when he framed this covenant, and I think it would be difficult to express the intention in clearer words. Inasmuch as the covenantees at the date of the covenant owned the land now belonging to the Millais trustees and such land is in fact "near to" the defendant's land I see no uncertainty as to the land to be benefited. I should add that in my opinion there can be no difference between law and equity in construing such covenants with a view to seeing whether they do or do not run with the land. The same words in the same document must necessarily bear the same meaning in all the courts. It is true that in many of the cases decided by the Court of Chancery expressions are found to the effect that the defendants are bound in equity whether the covenants in strictness run with the land or not. But I think that such expressions are due to the reluctance that the Vice-Chancellors felt to expressing any opinion on points of common law, and for the reason that I have already stated I cannot see how such covenant could run in equity if it does not run at law. One other point was made by Mr. Hughes—viz., that Sir J. Millais knew nothing of the existence of these covenants at the time that he bought, and I assume this to be the fact, as no evidence to the contrary was tendered, but in my opinion it is immaterial; such knowledge has never been held a necessary condition to success in an action on a covenant which runs with the land at law. The plaintiff's right in such an action does not depend upon what he believes himself to have bought but upon what he has in fact bought, and he has bought the land with the covenants annexed. The defendant is not injured, for he bought the land with knowledge of the covenant, and he can claim no more than the land with that burden upon it. If authority is needed for this, Child v. Douglas is expressly in point and is not affected in this respect by anything said on the appeal or at the trial or by any subsequent authority. It is not necessary for me to determine whether the benefit of the covenants would pass under the general words to which I have referred above, if such covenants did not run with the land. If they are not in fact annexed to the land, it may well be that the right to sue thereon cannot be said to belong or be reputed to belong thereto, but I express no final opinion on this point. In the view that I take of the rights of the Millais trustees I must make a distinction and grant an injunction as asked, but it is at their suit alone that I do so. The plaintiff Rogers joined in a deed of the 30th of October, 1876, whereby Cubitts released the devisee of the late Duke of Bedford from the covenant as to the erection of one dwelling-house only. I have already held that the defendant threatened and intended to erect a number of dwelling-houses, and this, as against Rogers, he is entitled to do. I cannot hold that these facts constitute a business, although if I had thought that they constituted one dwelling-house only, I might have come to a different conclusion. I think that the proper course is to dismiss the action so far as it sets up any claim by Rogers: it would not be right that the judgment should appear to be made at his suit, or that he should be in a position to enforce an injunction which is obtained on the strength of another's title.

Petition by the executors of the will of John Scott, jun., against a claim made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for estate duty.

John Scott, jun., died on the 22nd of January, 1899, having by his will dated the 4th of May, 1896, left his property to the petitioners in trust for his widow and daughter, and after the death of the widow to the daughter absolutely. Probate of the will was granted to his widow on the 10th of March, 1899, and on her application for probate she delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an affidavit, with schedules, showing that the total net aggregate value of all property passing on the death of John Scott, jun., was £16,004 10s. On the 12th of May, 1899, John Scott, sen., the father of John Scott, jun., died, having by his will dated the 5th of June, 1891, devised freehold property valued at £80,000, to his son John Scott, jun.

On the 12th of May, 1899, the date of the death of John Scott, sen., his grandchild, the only child of John Scott, jun , was still living, and under the provisions of her father's and grandfather's wills, and by virtue of section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, the devise by John Scott, sen., to his son did not lapse, but took effect as if the death of John Scott, jun., had happened immediately after the death of John Scott, sen., so that the effect of the devise contained in the will of John Scott, sen., was that the property in the freehold premises devised by his will passed to the petitioners to hold upon the trusts of John Scott, jun.'s will. Estate duty was paid upon this property in respect of the death of John Scott, sen.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that a further estate duty was payable in respect of the property devised by John Scott, sen., as being property which also passed on the death of John Scott, jun., and that as the property passed under the disposition of John Scott, jun., it was liable to aggregation with his general estate under section 4 of the Finance Act, 1894. The petitioners claimed a declaration that such duty was not payable.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Edwardes Jones, for the petitioners.—The property devised by the will of John Scott, sen., never became the property of John Scott, jun. The effect of section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, is not to render the property devised by the will of John Scott, sen., the property of John Scott, jun., or to make it pass on his death, but merely to state the manner in which it is to devolve under the will of John Scott, sen. Assuming that the property did fall into the estate of John Scott, jun., it was not property which passed on his death within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1, nor within the meaning of section 22 (b) of that Act. If the property passed to John Scott, jun., it was property which passed upon the death of John Scott, sen., in respect of which estate duty was thereupon leviable, and was settled property by the combined effect of the two wills and the statutes 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 33, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 38, s. 2, and 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, s. 22 (1), and the interest of John Scott, jun., under the settlement failed by reason of his death before it became an interest in possession, and the subsequent limitations under the settlement continued and subsisted; and therefore by virtue of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, s. 5 (3), the property must not be deemed to pass on the death of John Scott, jun. Estate duty has already been paid since the date of the settlement in respect of the property, and neither has John Scott, jun., nor any other person died who was at the time of his death, or at any other time during the continuance of the settlement, competent to dispose of the property; and by virtue of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, s. 5 (2), estate duty is not payable. John Scott, jun., never had an interest in the property if it passed to him, and so if it had passed on his death it ought not, pursuant to 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, s. 4, to be aggregated to any other property of his.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the Crown.—This is property "passing on the death" of John Scott, jun., within the meaning of section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, because the life of the son is projected forward and his death postponed by the Wills Act, s. 33. Under section 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, this property is liable to estate duty as property of which the deceased, John Scott, jun., was at the time of his death competent to dispose. There is no settlement. A settlement must be for lives in succession. The gift by the father's will is an absolute gift to the son. If the father's will is the beginning of the settlement, then there has been since then, a person competent to dispose within the meaning of 57 & 58 Vict. c. 30, s. 5 (2). If it is a settlement by the son's will of property coming to him under his father's will, then there has been no payment of settlement duty. The intention of the Legislature was to substitute estate duty for probate duty.

Dec. 15.—DARLING, J., gave judgment as follows: The question raised in this case is whether the trustees under the will of John Scott, jun. (deceased), are to pay estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of certain real property which had been devised to John Scott, jun., by his father. [After stating the facts of the case, he proceeded:] John Scott, jun., never had an interest in the estate devised to him, for he died before his father, but it is claimed that the estate of John Scott, jun., is liable to estate duty in respect to the property so devised to him, by reason of the effect of the Finance Act, 1894, and section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837.

It is provided by section 33 of that Act: "That where any person being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear in the will." It is plain that the devise of the estate devised to John Scott, jun., by his father did not lapse, but enures to be disposed of according to the trusts of the son's will. Hereupon arises the claim to further estate duty, and it is argued on behalf of the Crown that this estate is covered by the words of the Finance Act, 1894, because it is property which "passed on the death" of John Scott, jun., within the meaning of section 1 of that statute. As a matter of fact this estate never was the property of John Scott, jun., although it would have become so had he in fact died immediately after the death of his father. For the Crown it is, however, contended that the natural death of John Scott, jun., should be disregarded for this purpose, and that "constructive death" at a later date must be imagined; or, in the words of the Solicitor-General, "the life of the son is projected forward, and his death postponed, by the Wills Act." In my opinion the Wills Act has no such operation, and this contention must go the way of that in Pearce v. Graham, 9 Jurist N. S. 568, where such a reading of the Wills Act was used to support the argument that coverture revived, so that a widow was reconstituted the wife of a man who had been dead some years. That contention, in itself sufficiently extravagant, might easily have led on to a doctrine of constructive bigamy, and the present suggested fiction of "life projected forward" or "death postponed" might, if accepted now, soon be coupled with another doctrine, too readily adopted by some—that of constructive murder—with consequences too absurd to be even alluded to here.

Many cases were cited to us as to the effect of section 33 of the Wills Act. I make no doubt they were rightly decided; but, none the less, I am unable to agree that all the language used in them is appropriate. Take, for example, this expression of Cresswell, J., in Parker's case to the effect that section 33 "renders the subject of the gift the absolute property of the predeceased devisee or legatee." That to my mind is impossible, for we do not carry anything out of this world. I think the matter is properly put by Kinderaley, V.C., where in Pearce v. Graham, he says, "The Wills Act simply prolongs by a fiction the life of a legatee for a particular purpose—viz., to prevent a legacy given to a child dying before, but leaving issue which survived, the testator, from lapsing."

The policy of the Wills Act is, moreover, well explained—as it seems to me—by Wigram, V.C., in Winter v. Winter.

For my part, I believe that the Act, having regard to parental affection, intended to recognize the truth expressed by Gray in his Elegy:

> "E'en from the tomb the voice of nature cries; > E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires"; and I think it meant no more. I cannot therefore hold that this was in fact property of the deceased, John Scott, jun., which passed on his death—meaning a fictitious death occurring months after his burial—by virtue of section 1 only, of the Finance Act, 1894.

But I have much greater difficulty in dealing with the contention that within section 2 (1) of that Act it is liable to estate duty as being property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose. I do not feel that I derive any assistance in construing these words from the terms of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 22 (2) (a); but it is to be observed that the Wills Act does not give the devised property to the issue of the devisee, although failing such issue the devise will lapse; and, further, a devise of the residue of his estate will enable the son who dies in his father's lifetime, leaving issue, to effectually dispose of what never would be his own, even—as Winter v. Winter shows—of property left to him by a will made after his death. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that this estate was property of which John Scott, jun., was "competent to dispose." It remains still to consider whether "at the time of his death" he was so competent. And here, for the reasons I have given already, I understand by the words "his death" his real, natural death, and not any decease by fiction of law. Now, what disposed of the property? Clearly it was the will of John Scott, jun. When? Well, four months after that will first came into operation—four months after the death of the maker of it. Yet that will had no force of its own. All that it could do was what its testator did, and what he did was to make the will. He made it before his death. It spoke with his last breath, and what he could not then say by means of it, that will cannot say nor ever would. Still it had force to devise this estate. That is to say, he who made it was competent to do what it in law effected. Therefore I think that the case comes within the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2. But I have arrived at this opinion after much doubt, and by a train of reasoning in which I am conscious that there may perhaps be some defect. Still I think this conclusion is right; for my learned brother Channell has arrived at the same end by a different road. Estate duty must therefore be paid. How that duty shall be calculated remains to be determined. I am of opinion that this property is, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1894, ss. 5 and 22 (1) (l), and by virtue of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to be considered as settled property, and therefore is liable only to such duty as can be charged upon it having regard to those provisions. I understand that additional settlement duty is not in this case claimed.

CHANNELL, J., after briefly referring to the facts The question we have to decide is whether estate duty is payable by the petitioners as upon the passing, or supposed passing, of the property on the death of John Scott, jun. During the argument of this case I certainly was of opinion that the question must be determined by ascertaining what was the true legal construction of the material provisions of the Finance Act. These provisions are extremely intricate, and when we came to apply them to the case before us it was very difficult to arrive at any clear conclusion as to their effect. I was, however, then, and I still am, unable to bring myself to the conclusion that the property really did pass on the death of John Scott, jun., even under the definition of property passing given by section 22 (1) (l), and certainly not without it. I think that is so whether "passing on the death" means passing in point of time on the death or "passing by reason of the death," as suggested by the Solicitor-General. It seems to me that after the death of John Scott, jun., as before it, the freehold premises remained absolutely the property of John Scott, sen. Nothing had happened either to pass the property in them or to interfere with Scott, sen.'s, absolute right to dispose of them as he pleased. The property neither passed on the death in point of time, nor did it then or ever pass by reason of the death.

It passed by reason of John Scott, sen.'s, death and of his disposition of the property.

The question whether John Scott, jun., was competent to dispose of the property within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) is somewhat more difficult. It is said on the one hand that any man who dies leaving both a parent and a child living is made competent by the Wills Act to dispose of anything which the parent may happen afterwards, during the life of the grandchild, to leave to him by will. But, at most, the son only directs to whom the property shall go if his father chooses to adopt that mode of disposition, and it is really the father who disposes. Further there is a doubt whether to bring the case within section 2 (1) (a) there must be power to dispose of the specific freehold houses in question, which is more difficult still to see. I have, however, come to the conclusion, that this case does not turn so much upon the consideration of these clauses of the Finance Act as upon the question of the true construction of the Wills Act. What is the meaning of the devise "taking effect as if the son had died immediately after the father." Several cases on the construction of this section were quoted to us on the argument, and some difficulty was occasioned by the fact that several of them report language to have been used by counsel and by learned judges which cannot be considered literally accurate. It may be, and I think it is the fact, that in none of the cases was the language used by the judges misleading in the particular cases having regard to the facts of those cases, but when the expressions used by the judges are quoted, and it is sought to apply them to other cases, the language used becomes misleading. It is not the fact that the statute placed the son in the same position as if he had survived the father, nor is it literally true to say that the Wills Act "makes the subject of the gift the absolute property of the predeceased legatee or devisee," though it might be true to say that the Act directs that the subject of the gift should be dealt with as if it had been the absolute property of the deceased. Kindersley, V.C., in Pearce v. Graham states the effect of the statute correctly when he says that the "Act simply prolongs the life of the legatee for a particular purpose —namely, to prevent a legacy given to a child, dying before but leaving issue which survived the testator, from lapsing, and does not prolong the life for any other purpose." But the Act does say just a little more. What the Act does say is that the devise is not to lapse, but is to take effect "as if the son had died after the father." Now, how is this to be carried out? If the son has died intestate his heir takes as he would if the son had in fact survived his father. If the son has made a will containing appropriate words, by residuary devise or otherwise, to carry the property, the devisees take. If the son has died insolvent, the creditors take. So far the matter is fairly clear. But what do they take in each case? And does the Crown take anything? If the son had in fact survived the father the beneficiaries of the son would have taken the property subject to the payment of duties to the Crown. The duties are a charge on the property. If those duties are not to be paid when the devisees get the property by virtue of the Wills Act the beneficiaries will take more than if the son had survived the father. Is this making the devise take effect as if the son had survived the father? It seems to me that it is giving the devise a different effect, and the only way to give it the same effect is to hold that, as the Wills Act gives the property to the devisees of the son as if he had survived his father, it gives it, subject to the same duties, as if the son had survived the father.

I think this must be considered to have been held by the Court of Exchequer in Executors of Perry v. The Queen. That is one of the cases which contains some expressions not altogether accurate as to the effect of the Wills Act, and various reasons are given by the judges which are perhaps not quite consistent with each other, but the judgments of Kelly, C.B., and Channell, B., appear based mainly on the ground I have stated. I think also that both the cases of Lord Advocate v. Bogie and Attorney-General v. Loyd accord with this view of Perry's case. Counsel in his reply on behalf of the petitioners contended that the effect of the Wills Act was to write into the will of John Scott, sen., the words, "And if my son dies in my lifetime the said property shall devolve as if my son had died immediately after me." If that were so the case would be similar to Bogie's case and Loyd's case, and as Lord Watson points out in one case, and Wright, J., in the other, the question would be one of ascertaining the intention of the testator. Did the testator intend by the words used to give the Crown the same duties as if the son had survived? In neither of the two cases did the judge find any indication of such an intention, nor would it be likely that such an intention would exist in fact. But Wright, J., said, and I think Lord Watson probably meant, that the Wills Act stood on a different footing. Whether they and the other judges taking part in Bogie's case and Loyd's case approved of Perry's case, I do not know, but at any rate they did not say anything to shake its authority. Looking at Perry's case as turning merely on the construction of the Probate Duty Acts, though binding on us, it is not in point in this case, because the words of the Probate Duty Acts and of the Finance Acts are very different, but looking at it as putting a construction on the Wills Act it is not only binding upon us but in point. I think that, upon my own view of the true construction of the Wills Act and also upon the authority of Perry's case, we are bound to hold that the 33rd section of the Wills Act gives to the Crown the same duties as if the son had survived the father, and gives the property to the devisees of the son subject to the payment of the same duties as if the son had survived. That being so I do not think that there is any difficulty in holding that the machinery of the Finance Act applies to the assessment and recovery of the duty.

Estate duty is, in my opinion, payable, and, of course, upon the view I have taken, the settlement question, which would have been one of some difficulty, does not arise. I think there was in fact a settlement by the combined effect of the two wills and of the Wills Act; but I think that effect must be given to it as if the son had survived—that is to say, that it takes effect as a settlement made by the son. The duty out of this property must be the same as if the son had survived. The rate of duty on the property, therefore, will be arrived at by taking the rate applicable to the property when aggregated with the other property of John Scott, jun. I do not know whether the Crown claims any additional duty—that is to say, at a higher rate than paid on the £16,000, the property of John Scott, jun., by reason of the aggregation with it of this freehold property; but I do not think the Crown entitled to such a higher rate on the £16,000. The Wills Act gives the duty on the property passing by virtue of it; but it is difficult to see how it could give a higher duty on other property. This case should be dealt with as coming under section 7 (6) (a) and (b), which provision happens to fit this case. There must be judgment for the Crown.

HAMPTON URBAN COUNCIL v. SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATER CO. (a.)

Local government—Rating—General district rate—Reservoir — "Land covered with water" — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211, sub-section 1 (b).

A reservoir of a water company held to be "land covered with water" within the meaning of these words in section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, and therefore assessable to general district rates at one-fourth of its annual value.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 47 W. R. 177, [1899] 1 Q. B. 273, affirmed.

Appeal by the Hampton Urban Council from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.), affirming the decision of a Divisional Court (Wright and Darling, JJ.).

The case is set out in the court below, 47 W. R. 177, [1899] 1 Q. B. 273.

By section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, it is enacted as follows: "With respect to the assessment and levying of general district rates under this Act the following provisions shall have effect . . . (b) The . . . occupier of any land covered with water or used only as a canal or towing path for the same . . . shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof."

The Court of Appeal held that: "The reservoir was 'land covered with water' within the meaning of section 211, sub-section 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875."

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and H. Courthope-Munroe, for the appellants.

Cripps, Q.C., and Walter C. Ryde, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think if one applies oneself to the particular matter, and only to the particular matter, which your lordships have to decide in this appeal, the question, whether asked in a court of law or in the most popular assembly in the world, must come to this: "Is a reservoir, land covered with water?" I think it is, and I have heard nothing which induces me to suppose that the Legislature used that phrase in any other or different sense from that in which I should understand it as one of the ordinary subjects of the Queen using his own mother-tongue in the ordinary sense. This is "land covered with water," and it seems to me that it would be a very extraordinary thing indeed if, after the use of this language in this sense, not for thirty-eight years only, but ever since the earlier period from which this phrase was derived, one was to find out some new and extraordinary mode of construing these words, which would prevent its being what it is. It is land covered with water. And it is a remarkable thing that when it was put to the learned counsel more than once, "If a reservoir is not land covered with water, what is it?" I heard no other reply to that question than the statement that it is a reservoir.

It is manifest that what it is attempted to do here is to put into the language of the statute by construction words which are not there. The only other meaning, alternative to that given to it by the Court of Appeal, is that you must put into the statute by construction some such words as "land covered with water," which is not made "land covered with water by an artificial construction," or some words to that purport and effect. What foundation there is for taking that liberty with the language of the Legislature, and putting into the statute words which are not there, I am wholly unable to understand.

I confess the thing that puzzles me most about this case is the doubts which appear to have been entertained by the two learned judges below, Wright and Darling, JJ. I have not the least notion what they mean. To my mind the language of the statute is extremely clear, and is not susceptible of any other meaning than that which has been put upon it by the Court of Appeal. The one point which occurred to me as susceptible of doubt was the words which follow, and which Rigby, L.J., has commented upon: "Or used only as a canal or towing path." At first sight that would seem curious, no doubt. If "land covered with water" was enough, why should they have put in the word "canal" too? And if the words "towing path" had not been added, I should have thought it really was curious; but I think the explanation which has been given is quite satisfactory. The thing which was to be rated was the adventure, the whole construction; and if the Legislature had not put in these words this question upon the rating would have arisen; you have got to rate the canal itself—that is to say, that part of the earth on which the water rests—at one rate, and the towing path, which is only ancillary to it, and is only useful as making part of the artificial construction by which the adventure of the company is carried on, at a different rate. Therefore, for these very obvious reasons, the Legislature have not contented themselves by simply abiding by the phrase "land covered with water," but have added to it "canal or towing path for the same."

I am wholly unable to understand on what ground we are asked to disturb or throw any doubt upon the construction of these words which has prevailed for a very considerable period. Speaking for myself, I must say that I should feel very great hesitation upon such a question in attempting to overrule the judgments of the learned judges in the cases which have been cited to us in the Court of Queen's Bench. That was particularly the court in which rating cases were decided, and very often decided under circumstances in which there was no appeal, so that in many cases the decisions were final. And three of those learned judges were judges of very great eminence, and specially familiar with questions of rating. I think this case is abundantly clear. In my opinion, your lordships ought to dismiss the appeal with costs, and I move accordingly.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely concur.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I think this is an extremely clear case, and I also concur in the judgment which has been moved.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Agreement in consideration of fixed annual payments—"Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever"—"Only or principal or primary security for any annuity" for indefinite period—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), Schedule I.

By an agreement in writing not under seal, R. agreed to pay a telephone company the sum of £12 per annum for the use of a telephone wire and apparatus which the company was to affix to his house. The rent was to be payable every year in advance, and either party might put an end to the agreement by giving the other three months' notice.

Held, that this instrument was within the words "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever, being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity" for an "indefinite period" in Schedule I. of the Stamp Act, 1891, and chargeable with the ad valorem duty therein stated.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 47 W. R. 247, [1899] 1 Q. B. 250, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins, L.JJ.) 47 W. R. 247, [1899] 1 Q. B. 250, affirming the judgment, of the Divisional Court, upon a case stated by the commissioners in pursuance of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 13.

On the 10th of February, 1897, an instrument, of which a copy is hereinafter set out, was presented on behalf of the National Telephone Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the appellants), by Mr. William E. L. Gaine, the company's solicitor, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The following is a copy of the instrument, which is upon paper headed "The South of England Telephone Co. (Limited)—Head Offices, 50, Old Broad-street, E.C. No. 900":

"March 9, 1886.

"The undersigned hereby agree with the South of England Telephone Co. (Limited) (subject to above conditions) to pay them the sum of £12 per annum yearly in advance, the first payment to be made on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the undersigned, and each subsequent payment to be made on the corresponding day in each and every following year for the use of a private wire between No. 155, North-street and the South of England Telephone Co.'s local exchange system in Brighton.

"Either the company or the lessee may put an end to this agreement by giving to the other three calendar months' notice in writing expiring on the day previous to the rent being due in any year. No verbal notice can be recognized.

"Signature of renter,

"(Signed) SAMUEL RIDLEY.

"N.B.—All rentals are payable yearly in advance, and the first year's rent becomes due on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the renter."

The Court of Appeal held that this instrument was liable to an ad valorem duty under the head "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, as "being the only or principal or primary security for any . . . sum or sums of money at stated periods for an indefinite period."

Asquith, Q.C., and Roskill, for the appellants.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), was stopped.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—My opinion upon this matter may be stated as shortly as the Solicitor-General's argument.

I am wholly unable to draw any distinction between what is included before the words "any instrument whatsoever" and those that are behind them. The real truth is that this taxing Act intended, as it appears to me, to apply taxation to every document of this kind; it mentions, in the first instance, those under seal, and then it occurred to the framers of the Act, "Well, but unless we add some words that will bring within the ambit of taxation documents which do exactly the same thing as the instruments under seal, the result will be that whoever does not particularly care about its being an instrument under seal, but wants to effect the same object, will escape taxation by simply omitting the sealing and delivering, and merely signing the document in question." Therefore they added the word "whatsoever," and I think they intended to include everything of that character. My opinion is that this document is of that nature, and that therefore this judgment ought to be affirmed, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lords MACNAGHTEN, BRAMPTON, and ROBERTSON concurred.

BAVINS AND ANOTHER v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN BANK (LIMITED). (a.)

Banker—Negligence—Order in writing for payment of money—Trover—Conversion—Measure of damages—Money had and received—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 3 (1) (2). 11 (2), 73, 82—Inland Revenue Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 55), s. 17.

An order in writing, directing a bank to pay to the plaintiffs or their order a sum of money conditionally upon the signature by the plaintiffs of a receipt form at the foot of the document, was stolen from the plaintiffs, and taken to the defendant bank for collection on behalf of a customer of theirs. The signature of the plaintiffs had been forged, both on the indorsement and on the receipt, but both signatures were badly written and the name of one of the plaintiffs was written as "Trench" instead of Junior. The defendant bank, without making any inquiries, received the order, collected the amount from the paying bank, and placed it to the credit of their customer. The plaintiffs subsequently gave notice to the defendant bank that the order had been stolen, and claimed the amount received by the defendant bank. The account of the customer of the defendant bank had been drawn upon in the interval, but nothing had occurred to disentitle the defendant bank from cancelling the credit given to their customer.

Held, that the defendant bank had been guilty of negligence, and consequently could not avail itself of the benefit of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, as enlarged by section 17 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1883; and that the plaintiffs could recover the amount from the defendant bank as money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs.

Semble (per A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), that the plaintiffs could also recover the amount as damages for the conversion of the order.

Appeal of the defendants from the judgment of Kennedy, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the sum of £69 7s. as damages for the conversion of a certain order for the payment of money, or, in the alternative, for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs.

The facts were as follows: On the 7th of July, 1898, the Great Northern Railway Co. were indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £69 7s.; and the company gave to the plaintiffs in payment of the debt a document in the following terms: "The Great Northern Railway Co., London, the 7th of July, 1898. The Union Bank of London (Limited), No. 2, Prince's-street, Mansion-house, E.C. Pay to J. Bavins, jun., & Sims, the sum of £69 7s. Provided the receipt form at foot hereof is duly signed, stamped, and dated. £69 7s. (Signature of secretary.) (Signature of assistant-secretary.) Received from the Great Northern Railway Co. the above-named sum as per particulars furnished. This receipt is not to be detached from the cheque. Signature . . . . Dated . . . , 189 ." The order was crossed generally. This document was stolen from the plaintiffs before they had either signed the receipt or indorsed it.

On the 15th of July, 1898, the document was brought to the Shoreditch branch of the defendants' bank by a man whose name was unknown, and who was accompanied by a man named Donsala. The wife of Donsala kept an account at the branch, and her husband was in the habit of paying in cheques to her account. The document had been indorsed. The writing of the indorsement was very bad, and it appeared as if some illiterate person had attempted to copy the names of the payees from the face of the document, but had misread the word "junr." as "Trench." The receipt form at the foot of the document had not been filled in, and the bank clerk drew attention to the omission. Thereupon one of the men filled in the receipt and stamped it. The signature to the receipt was in the same form as that of the indorsement.

The document was then received by the defendants for collection, and they credited Mrs. Donsala with the amount. On the 16th of July the defendants received the amount from the Union Bank of London in exchange for the document. The defendants first knew on the 13th of August that the document had been stolen from the plaintiffs and that the signatures were forgeries. Between the 16th of July and the 13th of August Mrs. Donsala's account with the defendants had been drawn upon to an amount exceeding £69 7s.

The defendants relied upon section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and also contended that if the document was not a cheque within the meaning of that section, the plaintiffs were only entitled to recover nominal damages. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had been guilty of negligence.

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61): Section 82. Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment.

Section 73. A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand.

Section 3. (1) A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed and determinable future time a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer. (2) An instrument which does not comply with these conditions, or which orders any act to be done in addition to the payment of money, is not a bill of exchange.

Section 11. (2) An instrument expressed to be payable on a contingency is not a bill, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect.

Kennedy, J., held that the defendants had not been guilty of negligence, but that by reason of the proviso that the money was not to be paid until the receipt form had been filled up, the document was not an unconditional order to pay, and therefore not a cheque, and that the defendants were not entitled to claim the protection of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed and gave the plaintiffs notice that at the hearing of the appeal they would rely on section 17 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1883, which had not been pleaded in the defence or relied on at the trial of the action. The Inland Revenue Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 55), s. 17 enacts that "Sections 76 to 2, both inclusive, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 . . . shall extend to any document issued by a customer of any banker and intended to enable any person or body corporate to obtain payment from such banker of the sum mentioned in such document and shall so extend in like manner as if the said document were a cheque. Provided that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to render any such document a negotiable instrument."

Herbert Jacobs, for the defendants.—Assuming that Kennedy, J., was right in holding that this document is not a cheque, it is, nevertheless, a document issued by the customer of a banker, and intended to enable the plaintiffs to obtain payment from such banker, and, therefore, by the combined effect of section 17 of Inland the Revenue Act, 1883, and section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the defendants have a good defence to the action, unless they have been guilty of negligence. On the question of negligence, Kennedy, J., found, and rightly found, in the defendants' favour. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—We are of opinion that the defendants were guilty of negligence in dealing with the document without making inquiries, indorsed as it was with a name different from that of the payees.] In any event the defendants are only liable in nominal damages for the conversion of the document. It is a mere authority to pay, and is, of itself, of no value: Clegg v. Baretta, 56 L. T. Rep. 775, 35 W. R. Dig. 62. The defendants are not liable for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs. The money received by the defendants was the money of the Union Bank. That bank cannot debit the railway company with the amount, and the railway company are still liable to the plaintiffs: Wills v. Wells, 8 Taunt. 264; Rogers v. Kelly, 2 Camp. 123. Lastly the plaintiffs are too late in bringing this action, for the defendants, before due in respect of the said premises as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of such rent." That was repealed by the Act of 1862, and under the Act of 1862, by section 64, provision is made referring to the provisions of the earlier statute, saying that certain works, matters, and things are required to be constructed, made, or executed on the requisition of vestries and district boards by the owners or occupiers of the premises therein referred to —the 73rd and the following sections being the sections in the earlier Act which are applicable in the case of constructing drains—"and in case any such owner or occupier refuse or neglect to commence, proceed with, or complete the same, as the case may be, the vestry or district board are authorised to perform and execute such works, matters, and things, and recover the costs incurred thereby in manner therein provided." It is enacted that in case of any such neglect or default by any person or persons to comply with the order of any vestry or district board to execute any works, matters, or things under any of the said provisions, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay to the vestry certain penalties therein mentioned, and in their discretion they may either execute or perform any such works, matters, or things, and recover the costs and expenses thereof from the owner of the property, as aforesaid, or proceed for and recover the said penalty or penalties, but nothing herein contained shall render any person or persons liable to be proceeded against for the penalty as well as for the costs and expenses of the work. The argument founded upon that, as I understand it, is this, that up to this point the effect of that section is not to render an occupier liable for anything more than damages.

Then we turn to section 96, and we find that that provides that "the 217th, 218th, and 219th sections of the firstly recited Act are hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted: "It shall be lawful for any vestry or district board, at their discretion, to require the payment of any costs or expenses which the owner of any premises may be liable to pay under the said recited Act or this Act, either from the owner or from any person who, then, or at any time thereafter occupies such premises, and such owner or occupier shall be liable to pay the same, and the same shall be recovered in manner authorized by the recited Act and this Act; and the owner shall allow such occupier to deduct the sums of money which he so pays out of the rent from time to time becoming due in respect of the said premises as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of the rent: provided always, that no such occupier shall be required to pay any further sum than the amount of rent for the time being due from him." Then follow some words which I do not think I need read. Then there is the following proviso: "Provided also that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affect any contract made or to be made between any owner and occupier of any house, building, or other property, whereof it is or may be agreed that the occupier shall pay and discharge all rates, dues, and sums of money payable in respect of such house, building, or other property, or to affect any contract whatsoever between landlord and tenant."

Now I think it is quite impossible to read that proviso at the end of that section without seeing that the Legislature contemplated that there might be a contract making the tenant liable for that which the landlord was primarily and ultimately liable under the Act and it uses words—with the exception of the words "dues" appearing there instead of the word "duties"—almost corresponding with the words used in the present case when referring to a contract which presumably it was deemed would affect that primary liability of the landlord. Of course I have to look at the exact bargain that was made between the parties.

Now I am sure Mr. Foa will not consider that it is from any disrespect to his argument, which was extremely thorough, that I do not go through the cases that have been cited before me. In the first place it would take far too long, and in the second place I think if I refer to two or three of them that will be quite sufficient. There were two leading authorities, one of Thompson v. Lapworth, 16 W. R. 312, L. R. 3 C. P. 149, and the other of Tidswell v. Whitworth, L. R. 2 C. P. 326. In Thompson v. Lapworth there was a covenant to pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever which during the continuance of that demise should be taxed, assessed, or imposed on the tenant or landlord of the premises thereby demised in respect thereof whether parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, except property or income-tax, and in that case it was held that the amount payable under the Metropolis Management Acts for paving was a duty or assessment assessed or imposed upon the owner in respect of the premises, within the covenant. In that case Tidswell v. Whitworth was expressly referred to and distinguished, and the learned judge whose judgment has been chiefly referred to in the matter, Willes, J., expressly refers to it, and distinguishes it from the case that was then before the court.

I have been asked to say that Tidswell v. Whitworth is applicable to the present case, and that Thompson v. Lapworth is not, and I have been asked to say that Sweet v. Seager, 5 W. R. 560, 2 C. B. N. S. 119, is also a case not applicable to the present case. Now it is observable that Sweet v. Seager, though the words used in the covenant are different so far as the Acts of Parliament are concerned, is substantially the same as the present case, and I find that Sweet v. Seager is a case which has been constantly recognized in the subsequent cases.

Now I come to a case of a much later date—namely, a case which has recently been before the Divisional Court of Brett v. Rogers, 45 W. R. 334, [1897] 1 Q. B. 525. That is an authority binding upon me, and it is a case in which the learned judges have gone carefully through the cases of Thompson v. Lapworth, Tidswell v. Whitworth, and the other cases. There the covenant was "to pay the land tax, sewers rate, and all other taxes, rates, duties, assessments, and impositions, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are or shall at any time during this demise be assessed or imposed on or in respect of the said demised premises." I think I am right in saying Mr. Foa did not suggest that the statutory provisions in that case could be fairly distinguished from the statutory provisions in the present. The learned judges in dealing with this covenant said, "We think that the obligation imposed upon the landlord to take up the defective drain and lay a new one, was a duty imposed on her in respect of the demised premises, and is within the words of the covenant."

I cannot distinguish the covenant in that case from the covenant in the present case, except that the word "payable" is subsequently used. I cannot think there is any real distinction to be drawn between the two cases because the words are "pay and discharge" in the present case, and the word is "payable" subsequently following in the other case. I do not think that is a real distinction. I think that the view taken by the learned judges was that it was a case indistinguishable from Payne v. Burridge, 12 M. & W. 727, and from Sweet v. Seager, in principle, and that in fact the tenant had by his covenant covenanted to indemnify the landlord against payments which the landlord would otherwise have to make in respect of duties—in the sense of performable duties neglected — in the sense of "duties" being payments which he had to make.

That being so, even if I thought this covenant did not apply in the present case, I do not see that I could draw any fair distinction between the present case and the case of Brett v. Rogers, and that I should be wiredrawing if I were to try and draw a distinction between them which would avail the tenant in the present case.

I have used the word indemnity, and I think it is only right to refer to it as Mr. Foa has laid great stress and spoken about this point. He says that we have in the present case no words of indemnity. It appears to me that being paid clear of all deductions and that being followed by a covenant by the tenant to pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever payable for or in respect of the premises, with these very large words it is in fact a covenant amounting to a covenant to indemnify the landlord against such of the payments and duties mentioned as would otherwise have fallen upon the landlord. It is not merely a covenant by the tenant to pay such liabilities as the law casts upon himself. As I have said I have not gone through all the cases, but I have carefully followed Mr. Foa's argument founded upon them, and I think I have sufficiently referred to them to show the grounds upon which I base my decision. The tenant is liable to pay for the works done.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Edgar Foa, for the appellant.—The word "duties" in this covenant, being controlled by the expression "payable in respect of the premises," must mean sums of money due, and cannot mean acts to be performed, and is therefore not a word of indemnity. Cases of this kind all refer to those payments for which there is a direct liability on the tenant (like so-called landlord's taxes), and not to those for which there is direct liability on the landlord alone: Tidswell v. Whitworth. Here there is no liability on the tenant to make the payment, for section 85 of the Act of 1855 is controlled by section 64 of the Act of 1862; and section 96 of the latter Act does not make the tenant liable, but only provides a remedy against him in the nature of a garnishee order: Allum v. Dickinson, 30 W. R. 930, 9 Q. B. D. 632. In order to make the covenant extend to those payments for which the landlord alone is liable there must be clear and express words to that effect: Rawlins v. Briggs, 27 W. R. 138, 3 C. P. D. 368; Hill v. Edwards, Cab. & Ell. 481. Moreover in this case the statute does not empower the vestry to do the work and exact payment in the first instance, but only entitles them to exact payment on the default of the landlord in complying with the notice. It is therefore not a payment "in respect of the premises," but in the nature of a penalty: Tidswell v. Whitworth.

Levett, Q.C., and Gatey were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R., said: If anybody could persuade us that Byrne, J.'s judgment was wrong, Mr. Foa is the man to do it, for he has drawn our attention to the authorities and to the sections of the Acts of Parliament with great minuteness, and has addressed to us an argument which is extremely lucid and extremely clear, but after all said and done we must come back to the doctrine with which we have to deal.

Now here is a lease for seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years at a rent of £125, and the lessee of course agrees to pay that, and then he agrees to this: he covenants that he will pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever which now are, or hereafter may become, payable for or in respect of the said premises hereby demised or any part thereof whether parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, except the landlord's property tax. I cannot imagine wider words than those, and it is not language which we always find in the same form. We have not got the word "impositions," and we have not got one or two others which are found in the old forms, but taking the language which is found there, "all rates, taxes, duties, and assessments whatsoever payable for or in respect of the said premises except the landlord's property tax," I do not see very well how it is possible to use much larger language.

Now the facts are that during the tenancy the drains of the premises continued in bad order owing to structural defects, and not owing to the tenant's negligence in repairing, and then notices were given on the 2nd and 12th of November by the parish, stating that the drains were in bad order, and requiring the drains to be reconstructed according to the regulations of the vestry, and then it was done by arrangement between the landlord and the tenant without any other question except as to the expense, of course, and now comes the question as to who is to bear it.

Now the power of the vestry which requires the drains to be put in order, and if not, to do it themselves and recover the money from the owner or occupier, is conferred by section 85 of the Metropolitan Management Act, as modified by the Act of 1862. We are asked to say that section 85 of the Act of 1855 has been repealed by section 64 of the Act of 1862. It has no doubt been modified, but I cannot say it has been repealed. Section 85 is the one which authorizes the vestry to require the drains which are out of order to be put right by serving notices on the owner and occupier. Other portions of it, no doubt, are modified, but when you look to the sections of the Act of Parliament, which I am not going to read in detail, it is impossible, I think, not to come to the conclusion that there is a duty cast by those Acts of Parliament upon the owner or occupier (I do not care which for the moment) to put the drains in order if they receive a proper notice; and there is also a duty under the said Acts of Parliament to compel or oblige the owner or occupier of them (I do not say which at this moment) to pay the expense. I agree with Mr. Foa in his very able argument that, having regard to the language here, "will pay and discharge all duties payable," "duties" here means sums payable pursuant to some duty imposed by an Act of Parliament. The sum which is here payable appears to me to be a duty payable in the sense of a sum payable in respect of a duty.

But, apart from that altogether he wants us here to put in the words "payable by the owner"; in other words, he wants us to say that the only sums payable by the tenant are sums payable in respect of duties other than those imposed upon him peremptorily. That is his whole point. Now, does the language admit of that? If you look at the language apart from the authorities, I venture to say it does not do anything of the sort. The language is perfectly general; it does not say by him, it does not cut down the word "payable"; it is "become payable for or in respect of the premises." Then there is a very notable exception, "except the landlord's property tax," which does throw light upon the general expression so far as it goes. It excludes, to my mind, the narrow construction which we are asked by Mr. Foa to put.

Now, in his despair he comes to the cases, and he says this case is covered by the decision

due in respect of the said premises as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of such rent." That was repealed by the Act of 1862, and under the Act of 1862, by section 64, provision is made referring to the provisions of the earlier statute, saying that certain works, matters, and things are required to be constructed, made, or executed on the requisition of vestries and district boards by the owners or occupiers of the premises therein referred to —the 73rd and the following sections being the sections in the earlier Act which are applicable in the case of constructing drains—"and in case any such owner or occupier refuse or neglect to commence, proceed with, or complete the same, as the case may be, the vestry or district board are authorised to perform and execute such works, matters, and things, and recover the costs incurred thereby in manner therein provided." It is enacted that in case of any such neglect or default by any person or persons to comply with the order of any vestry or district board to execute any works, matters, or things under any of the said provisions, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay to the vestry certain penalties therein mentioned, and in their discretion they may either execute or perform any such works, matters, or things, and recover the costs and expenses thereof from the owner of the property, as aforesaid, or proceed for and recover the said penalty or penalties, but nothing herein contained shall render any person or persons liable to be proceeded against for the penalty as well as for the costs and expenses of the work. The argument founded upon that, as I understand it, is this, that up to this point the effect of that section is not to render an occupier liable for anything more than damages.

Then we turn to section 96, and we find that that provides that "the 217th, 218th, and 219th sections of the firstly recited Act are hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is enacted: "It shall be lawful for any vestry or district board, at their discretion, to require the payment of any costs or expenses which the owner of any premises may be liable to pay under the said recited Act or this Act, either from the owner or from any person who, then, or at any time thereafter occupies such premises, and such owner or occupier shall be liable to pay the same, and the same shall be recovered in manner authorized by the recited Act and this Act; and the owner shall allow such occupier to deduct the sums of money which he so pays out of the rent from time to time becoming due in respect of the said premises as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of the rent: provided always, that no such occupier shall be required to pay any further sum than the amount of rent for the time being due from him." Then follow some words which I do not think I need read. Then there is the following proviso: "Provided also that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affect any contract made or to be made between any owner and occupier of any house, building, or other property, whereof it is or may be agreed that the occupier shall pay and discharge all rates, dues, and sums of money payable in respect of such house, building, or other property, or to affect any contract whatsoever between landlord and tenant."

Now I think it is quite impossible to read that proviso at the end of that section without seeing that the Legislature contemplated that there might be a contract making the tenant liable for that which the landlord was primarily and ultimately liable under the Act and it uses words—with the exception of the words "dues" appearing there instead of the word "duties"—almost corresponding with the words used in the present case when referring to a contract which presumably it was deemed would affect that primary liability of the landlord. Of course I have to look at the exact bargain that was made between the parties.

Now I am sure Mr. Foa will not consider that it is from any disrespect to his argument, which was extremely thorough, that I do not go through the cases that have been cited before me. In the first place it would take far too long, and in the second place I think if I refer to two or three of them that will be quite sufficient. There were two leading authorities, one of Thompson v. Lapworth, 16 W. R. 312, L. R. 3 C. P. 149, and the other of Tidswell v. Whitworth, L. R. 2 C. P. 326. In Thompson v. Lapworth there was a covenant to pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever which during the continuance of that demise should be taxed, assessed, or imposed on the tenant or landlord of the premises thereby demised in respect thereof whether parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, except property or income-tax, and in that case it was held that the amount payable under the Metropolis Management Acts for paving was a duty or assessment assessed or imposed upon the owner in respect of the premises, within the covenant. In that case Tidswell v. Whitworth was expressly referred to and distinguished, and the learned judge whose judgment has been chiefly referred to in the matter, Willes, J., expressly refers to it, and distinguishes it from the case that was then before the court.

I have been asked to say that Tidswell v. Whitworth is applicable to the present case, and that Thompson v. Lapworth is not, and I have been asked to say that Sweet v. Seager, 5 W. R. 560, 2 C. B. N. S. 119, is also a case not applicable to the present case. Now it is observable that Sweet v. Seager, though the words used in the covenant are different so far as the Acts of Parliament are concerned, is substantially the same as the present case, and I find that Sweet v. Seager is a case which has been constantly recognized in the subsequent cases.

Now I come to a case of a much later date—namely, a case which has recently been before the Divisional Court of Brett v. Rogers, 45 W. R. 334, [1897] 1 Q. B. 525. That is an authority binding upon me, and it is a case in which the learned judges have gone carefully through the cases of Thompson v. Lapworth, Tidswell v. Whitworth, and the other cases. There the covenant was "to pay the land tax, sewers rate, and all other taxes, rates, duties, assessments, and impositions, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, which now are or shall at any time during this demise be assessed or imposed on or in respect of the said demised premises." I think I am right in saying Mr. Foa did not suggest that the statutory provisions in that case could be fairly distinguished from the statutory provisions in the present. The learned judges in dealing with this covenant said, "We think that the obligation imposed upon the landlord to take up the defective drain and lay a new one, was a duty imposed on her in respect of the demised premises, and is within the words of the covenant."

I cannot distinguish the covenant in that case from the covenant in the present case, except that the word "payable" is subsequently used. I cannot think there is any real distinction to be drawn between the two cases because the words are "pay and discharge" in the present case, and the word is "payable" subsequently following in the other case. I do not think that is a real distinction. I think that the view taken by the learned judges was that it was a case indistinguishable from Payne v. Burridge, 12 M. & W. 727, and from Sweet v. Seager, in principle, and that in fact the tenant had by his covenant covenanted to indemnify the landlord against payments which the landlord would otherwise have to make in respect of duties—in the sense of performable duties neglected — in the sense of "duties" being payments which he had to make.

That being so, even if I thought this covenant did not apply in the present case, I do not see that I could draw any fair distinction between the present case and the case of Brett v. Rogers, and that I should be wiredrawing if I were to try and draw a distinction between them which would avail the tenant in the present case.

I have used the word indemnity, and I think it is only right to refer to it as Mr. Foa has laid great stress and spoken about this point. He says that we have in the present case no words of indemnity. It appears to me that being paid clear of all deductions and that being followed by a covenant by the tenant to pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever payable for or in respect of the premises, with these very large words it is in fact a covenant amounting to a covenant to indemnify the landlord against such of the payments and duties mentioned as would otherwise have fallen upon the landlord. It is not merely a covenant by the tenant to pay such liabilities as the law casts upon himself. As I have said I have not gone through all the cases, but I have carefully followed Mr. Foa's argument founded upon them, and I think I have sufficiently referred to them to show the grounds upon which I base my decision. The tenant is liable to pay for the works done.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Edgar Foa, for the appellant.—The word "duties" in this covenant, being controlled by the expression "payable in respect of the premises," must mean sums of money due, and cannot mean acts to be performed, and is therefore not a word of indemnity. Cases of this kind all refer to those payments for which there is a direct liability on the tenant (like so-called landlord's taxes), and not to those for which there is direct liability on the landlord alone: Tidswell v. Whitworth. Here there is no liability on the tenant to make the payment, for section 85 of the Act of 1855 is controlled by section 64 of the Act of 1862; and section 96 of the latter Act does not make the tenant liable, but only provides a remedy against him in the nature of a garnishee order: Allum v. Dickinson, 30 W. R. 930, 9 Q. B. D. 632. In order to make the covenant extend to those payments for which the landlord alone is liable there must be clear and express words to that effect: Rawlins v. Briggs, 27 W. R. 138, 3 C. P. D. 368; Hill v. Edwards, Cab. & Ell. 481. Moreover in this case the statute does not empower the vestry to do the work and exact payment in the first instance, but only entitles them to exact payment on the default of the landlord in complying with the notice. It is therefore not a payment "in respect of the premises," but in the nature of a penalty: Tidswell v. Whitworth.

Levett, Q.C., and Gatey were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R., said: If anybody could persuade us that Byrne, J.'s judgment was wrong, Mr. Foa is the man to do it, for he has drawn our attention to the authorities and to the sections of the Acts of Parliament with great minuteness, and has addressed to us an argument which is extremely lucid and extremely clear, but after all said and done we must come back to the doctrine with which we have to deal.

Now the power of the vestry which requires the drains to be put in order, and if not, to do it themselves and recover the money from the owner or occupier, is conferred by section 85 of the Metropolitan Management Act, as modified by the Act of 1862. We are asked to say that section 85 of the Act of 1855 has been repealed by section 64 of the Act of 1862. It has no doubt been modified, but I cannot say it has been repealed. Section 85 is the one which authorizes the vestry to require the drains which are out of order to be put right by serving notices on the owner and occupier. Other portions of it, no doubt, are modified, but when you look to the sections of the Act of Parliament, which I am not going to read in detail, it is impossible, I think, not to come to the conclusion that there is a duty cast by those Acts of Parliament upon the owner or occupier (I do not care which for the moment) to put the drains in order if they receive a proper notice; and there is also a duty under the said Acts of Parliament to compel or oblige the owner or occupier of them (I do not say which at this moment) to pay the expense. I agree with Mr. Foa in his very able argument that, having regard to the language here, "will pay and discharge all duties payable," "duties" here means sums payable pursuant to some duty imposed by an Act of Parliament. The sum which is here payable appears to me to be a duty payable in the sense of a sum payable in respect of a duty.

But, apart from that altogether he wants us here to put in the words "payable by the owner"; in other words, he wants us to say that the only sums payable by the tenant are sums payable in respect of duties other than those imposed upon him peremptorily. That is his whole point. Now, does the language admit of that? If you look at the language apart from the authorities, I venture to say it does not do anything of the sort. Then there is a very notable exception, "except the landlord's property tax," which does throw light upon the general expression so far as it goes. It excludes, to my mind, the narrow construction which we are asked by Mr. Foa to put.

Now, in his despair he comes to the cases, and he says this case is covered by the decision in Tidswell v. Whitworth, to which he has referred at considerable length. I am bound to say that the language here, if not wider than the language in that case, would cause considerable difficulty. The language here is wider, and if we look at the cases decided since Tidswell v. Whitworth we cannot help seeing that in this case there is language to make it wider and to take it out of Tidswell v. Whitworth. It seems to me, having regard to this language, we should not only be introducing difficulty in the cases cited by Mr. Foa if we did not take that view, but we should also be introducing confusion if we did not do it. In every case where the word "duties" has been introduced, the construction has been against the tenant and in favour of the landlord. Mr. Foa is justified in saying that in almost all of these cases where the word "duties" is found, there is a money payment imposed upon the landlord or something of that kind. Well, if you look at the decisions—especially Brett v. Rogers, which he asked us to overrule, but which, I think, is quite right—you will see that in the covenants the word "duty" is inserted. I think Byrne, J., is quite right, and we should be splitting hairs and splitting straws, which we had better not do, if we differed from him; we should do a great deal more mischief than we should do good, and I think, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge put his main decision on the case of Brett v. Rogers. Mr. Foa very fairly in his argument challenged that case and said it was wrong, and I do not think he could have taken any other course. It appears to me in the case of Brett v. Rogers the very ground was traversed which he has sought to traverse in this case. In the case of Brett v. Rogers the case of Tidswell v. Whitworth was referred to, and the peculiarity of that case was pointed out and the answer given; and I think the true answer was, that if the covenant in that case contained the word "duties," it is quite inconsistent with the reasoning of the judgment. That appears to me to sum the whole matter up; and in this case it seems to me they have deliberately and of set purpose enlarged the covenant, such as it was, in the case of Tidswell v. Whitworth, for the express purpose of avoiding the ratio decidendi in that case. The moment you come to that point of view, and look at the word "duties" as enlarging that covenant, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, and as including sums payable in respect of duty, it appears to me that those who drew the covenant showed that they knew what they were about in avoiding the decision of Tidswell v. Whitworth, and that the case of Brett v. Rogers was rightly decided; and I think, in those circumstances, the judgment of the learned judge below was quite right, and should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—The covenant in this case is peculiarly worded. The numerous cases founded on cases of this class are not easily reconciled, and give rise to fine distinctions. In the state of the facts, I feel myself at liberty to construe this covenant in accordance with what appears to me its true meaning. I think that this covenant is not limited to taxes, rates, duties, and assessments payable by the tenant in respect of the premises, but is general, and means taxes, rates, duties, and assessments payable by either landlord or tenant in respect of the premises; and, further, I think that in this covenant the word "duty" covers the sums that are payable in this case, and for these reasons I agree in thinking that Byrne, J.'s, decision was right, and ought to be affirmed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CLARKSON. (a.)

Inland revenue — Settlement estate duty — Contingent settlement—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 5 (1) (a)—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2 (1)—Finance Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 10), s. 14.

The construction put on section 5 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, in Attorney-General v. Fairley, 45 W. R. 589, [1897] 1 Q. B. 698—viz., that a contingent settlement of property is a settlement within the meaning of the section—has been adopted by the Legislature in section 14 of the Finance Act, 1898, and will not now be questioned by the courts.

This was an appeal against a decision of Wills and Bruce, JJ., sitting as a Divisional Court.

The question involved was whether property contingently settled is liable to estate duty under section 5 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894.

The facts were as follows: The testator, the late Mr. Peter Robinson, died in 1895. By his will he bequeathed £30,000 to each of three of his sons "to be paid to them respectively if and when they respectively shall attain the age of twenty-five years," with interest in the meantime. In case either of the sons should die under twenty-five leaving issue, his legacy was to be held in trust for his children. But in case either of the sons should die under twenty-five without leaving issue his legacy was to fall into the testator's residuary personal estate. And the testator gave the residue of his estate on trust for such of his seven other children—four of whom were daughters and three sons—"as, being male, attain the age of twenty-five years, or, being female, attain that age or marry, in equal shares as tenants in common." The share of any of the children who was a daughter was not to vest absolutely in her, but was to be retained by his trustees upon the usual trusts of a marriage settlement for the benefit of the daughter, her husband, and children. In case any of the daughters should die in the testator's lifetime leaving issue living at his death, the share thereinbefore directed to be held upon trusts for her and her issue, and the income thereof, was to be held upon the same trusts as if the daughter had died immediately after the testator. If any of the three sons should die in the testator's lifetime leaving a child or children living at the testator's death, the share thereinbefore bequeathed in trust for him, and the income thereof, was to be held in trust for his children or child who, being sons or a son, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters or a daughter, should attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares, and if there should be no such child to go by way of addition to the share or shares of the others or other of the testator's children. Two of the three first-mentioned sons attained twenty-five before the death of the testator; the third attained twenty-five in August, 1897. One of the seven secondly-mentioned children died before the testator and under twenty-five. The other six were living at the time of the testator's death, and were all unmarried. One of the daughters had since married, but all the six were still under twenty-five.

In these circumstances, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed the payment of settlement estate duty on the whole of the residue of the testator's estate, including the sum of £30,000 contingently bequeathed to the son who attained twenty-five in August, 1897. The appellants, who were trustees and executors of the will, contended that no such duty was payable.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5, sub-section 1, "Where property in respect of which estate duty is leviable is settled by the will of the deceased, or, having been settled by some other disposition, passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property, (a) a further estate duty (called settlement estate duty) on the principal value of the settled property shall be levied at the rate hereinafter specified, except where the only life interest in the property after the death of the deceased is that of a wife or husband of the deceased." By section 22, sub-section 1, "(h) The expression 'settled property' means property comprised in a settlement. (i) The expression 'settlement' means any instrument, whether relating to real property or personal property, which is a settlement within the meaning of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or if it related to real property would be a settlement within the meaning of that section." By the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 2, "Any deed, will, . . . or other instrument . . . under or by virtue of which instrument . . . any land, or any estate or interest in land, stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates or is for purposes of this Act a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement." (4) "The determination of the question whether land is settled land for purposes of this Act or not is governed by the state of facts and the limitations of the settlement at the time of the settlement taking effect." By the Finance Act, 1898, s. 14, "Where, in the case of a death occurring after the commencement of this Act, settlement estate duty is paid in respect of any property contingently settled, and it is thereafter shown that the contingency has not arisen, and cannot arise, the said duty paid in respect of such property shall be repaid."

The Divisional Court, following the decision in Attorney-General v. Fairley, held that the claim for estate duty was well founded.

The defendants appealed.

Haldane, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the appellants, argued that to constitute a settlement within the meaning of the Act the property must be settled on persons "by way of succession."

They referred to Attorney-General v. Fairley, 45 W. R. 589, [1897] 1 Q. B. 698; In re Pocock's Contract, 44 W. R. 247, [1896] 1 Ch. 302; In re Morgan, 31 W. R. 948, 24 Ch. R. 226, [1899] 1 Ch. 275, Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198; Attorney-General v. Coulson, [1899] 2 Q. B. 253, 47 W. R. Dig. 74; In re Webber, Gribble v. Webber, 44 W. R. 489, [1896] 1 Ch. 914.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with him).—It is impossible to argue that estate duty would not have been payable if this death had taken place since the Finance Act, 1898. The Legislature has in section 14 of that Act adopted the construction put on the Act of 1894 in Attorney-General v. Fairley. [He was stopped by the court.]

LINDLEY, M.R.—The question we have to decide is one of some difficulty, but I am bound to say that I think the argument for the appellants, ingenious as it is, is not conclusive, and it is not really open to us to accede to it. The real question, and the only question we have to consider (although it involves an investigation into other matters) is this: Whether the property in respect of which estate duty is claimed—that is, the residuary estate of Mr. Peter Robinson, who died in October, 1895—is settled by his will? That is what we have got to consider and to determine. If it is, then by section 1 "a further estate duty" (that is, in addition to the estate duty) "called settlement estate duty on the principal value of the settled property" (that is, the property settled by his will, if any, of course) "shall be levied at the rate hereinafter specified, except where," and so on.

Now if we look at the will I cannot possibly say that in ordinary conveyancer's language this residuary estate is not "settled." The will has been read so often I will not take up time by going through it again, but it strikes me that in ordinary language the residuary estate certainly is settled. But then it is argued very forcibly that we must look and see whether it was settled on any persons in succession when the will came into operation—that is, on the testator's death. That is got at by turning to section 22 of the same Finance Act, and to the Settled Land Act, 1882, which contains the definition of "settlement" and of "settled land."

Well, now, having listened to that argument I will concede that it raises a very nice question, whether this property can be regarded as governed by that 4th clause (which I am not at all convinced about) and whether it can be regarded as settled in succession.

Now it stands in this way. The Divisional Court has decided in Attorney-General v. Fairley, that upon the true construction of section 5, having regard to section 22 and to section 2 of the Settled Land Act, settlement estate duty is payable on property settled in the same manner as this, and we are asked to overrule that decision. Very well. On looking at it I not convinced that the appellants would have succeeded in inducing us to overrule it, even if we had not that subsequent Act of Parliament which I will refer to presently. I will concede that it is an exceedingly nice point, and by no means free from difficulty, but as we have not heard the other side upon it I will say no more. But admitting this difficulty, it appears to me that section 14 of the Act of Parliament passed in 1898 concludes the question. It is very true that the Act of 1898 does not apply to this particular case, because Mr. Peter Robinson died in 1895 and the Act applies to deaths occurring after the commencement of the Act. But the section, as it seems to me, recognizes the construction which has been put by the courts upon the Finance Act of 1894 and makes the contention of the appellants quite untenable.

Section 14 says: "Where in the case of a death occurring after the commencement of this Act settled estate duty is paid in respect of any property contingently settled, and it is thereafter shown that the contingency has not arisen and cannot arise, the said duty paid in respect of such property shall be repaid." Now, just consider what that means. In substance it proceeds upon the assumption that the decision in Attorney-General v. Fairley was right, and affirms it. It adopts the construction put by that decision upon section 5, and the sections of the Act of 1882 which are incorporated in the Act of 1894, and says in unmistakable language: "The duty must be paid before it is known whether the contingency will or will not arise. If you have a property settled on a contingency you must pay the duty, and if you can afterwards satisfy us that the contingency has not arisen and cannot arise, then we will repay the duty. Well, if that is the construction of section 5 which has been adopted by Parliament, how can we say that it was wrong when the testator died in 1895 and is right after the Act of 1898? We cannot do that. It appears to me that section 14 of the Act of 1898 is a Parliamentary adoption of the construction put by the court on section 5 of the Act of 1894. This construction may work oppressively, because there is no provision for restoring the money which, in the event which has proved to have happened, ought not to have been taken from the taxpayer, and Parliament has said, "We will take it and see what happens, and if it so happens that it ought not to have been paid, we will refund it." It is easy to understand the reason for that, because, if the Inland Revenue did not get the money in that way they could not tell if they would ever know whether the contingency had or had not happened. One sees the reason for that. In the face of section 14 it appears to me that we cannot give effect to the doubt which the appellant's counsel has raised as to meaning of the word "settled." I do not say that we should have arrived at the same conclusion without the Act of 1898, but, with that Act before us, it is not possible to adopt the argument.

Sir F. H. JEUNE, P.—I am of the same opinion. I should have had great doubt whether the decision in Attorney-General v. Fairley, was right. I was much impressed by the argument of Mr. Haldane, and especially by that of Mr. Danckwerts, upon the use of the words "by way of succession." But, having regard to that Act of 1898, it seems to me that it is impossible for us to take any other view of the construction of section 5 than that which in my opinion the Legislature has imposed upon us. Our duty is to interpret the meaning of the Legislature, and if the Legislature in one Act has used language which is admittedly ambiguous, and in a subsequent Act has used language which proceeds upon the hypothesis that a particular interpretation is to be placed upon the earlier Act, I think the judges have no choice but to read the two Acts together, and to say that the Legislature has acted as its own interpreter of the earlier Act. Taking that view, I have no doubt that our present decision must be in accordance with that of the Divisional Court in Attorney-General v. Fairley.

Copyright — Verbatim report of speech—"Author"— Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45).

A reporter who takes down a speech in shorthand and afterwards corrects it for publication, making the most accurate report he can of the speaker's words, is not an "author" within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1842; though a reporter who recasts a speech, giving the substance of it in his own language, would be.

In the former case, therefore, neither the reporter nor his assignee can acquire copyright in the report by first publication.

Appeal from North, J.

In June, 1899, the defendant published a book which he called "Appreciations and Addresses—Lord Rosebery," and which consisted of reports of speeches delivered in public by the Earl of Rosebery on various occasions. The plaintiffs, who were the proprietors of the Times newspaper, then brought this action, seeking to restrain the publication of the book on the ground that five of the "addresses" were practically exact copies of the Times reports of Lord Rosebery's speeches, and also claiming a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to the copyright in the reports of the five speeches.

It was admitted that whatever copyright had originally vested in the reporter had passed to the Times. Lord Rosebery took no part in the controversy.

The reporter, who gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs, thus stated the course of procedure which was usually adopted in preparing reports of such speeches for the Times, and which had been followed in the present case: "In the course of our duty the reporters of the Times have to exercise their judgment and skill so as to represent in a form fit for publication the features of the meetings and the material parts of and the sense of the speeches made at them. This involves considerable skill and labour. Notes of the proceedings and speeches are taken in shorthand, which are afterwards carefully corrected and revised, and written out and punctuated fit for publication."

The plaintiffs moved, before North, J., for an interim injunction restraining the publication of copies of their reports.

North, J., holding that the reporter acquired copyright in the report, granted the injunction, and the defendant appealed. It was agreed that the appeal should be treated as an appeal from a judgment at the trial of the action.

Nov. 9.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the judgment of the court, after stating the material facts: Now, the case turns on the true construction of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45). That Act defines "copyright" and "book" (by section 2), and confers copyright on every "author" of a book or his assigns (by section 3). Periodical publications are dealt with in section 18. The Act contains no definition of "author," but it confers copyright on the authors of books first published in this country. There can be no copyright in what is not published in a book; but it does not follow that the first person who publishes a book acquires a copyright in it. The meaning of the word "author" as used in the Act must be gathered from its own language and the decisions upon it. The word occurs constantly throughout the Act, but nowhere is it used in the sense of a mere reporter or publisher of another man's verbal utterances. It is plain that a person who is not the author of a work may nevertheless be the proprietor of the copyright in it; for example, in the ordinary case of an assignment of copyright. The author is one person, the proprietor of the copyright is another. The expression "proprietor of copyright" constantly occurs in the Act. Sometimes the expression clearly includes author; sometimes it as clearly does not, but means his assigns. The latter part of section 3, which relates to the publication of books after the death of their authors, shows that authors and first publishers are by no means synonymous expressions. Again, section 16, which relates to actions for infringement and objections to the title of the plaintiff, shows that authors and first publishers may stand on different footings. The wording of these sections justifies the view that the owner of an unpublished manuscript, although not the author of it, acquires copyright in it by first publishing it. That has been decided in Scotland, and the cases are referred to in Phillips on Copyright, pp. 55, 56. The author of an unpublished manuscript has no copyright in it, but he has a right to acquire copyright in it; and this right he may impliedly transfer to anyone to whom he sells or gives the manuscript. Further, the author who sells or gives away an unpublished manuscript composition of his own may be fairly inferred to transfer his own right to publish it, unless he expressly or impliedly prohibits the publication of the manuscript which he sells or gives. This is intelligible, but it does not carry the plaintiffs far enough. A thief or other unlawful possessor of an unpublished manuscript would not acquire copyright in it by first publishing it. He would not be the author or proprietor of the manuscript.

Again, Lord Rosebery had no copyright in his speech; and, although he could have acquired copyright in it by putting it into writing, or printing and publishing it, he did not do so; and there is no evidence whatever to justify the inference that he transferred to the plaintiffs his right to acquire the copyright in his own compositions, whether written or verbal. The plaintiffs do not derive their title to their publication from Lord Rosebery. Section 18 of the Act refers to copyright in what is printed in newspapers and periodical publications. Unless otherwise agreed, the copyright in such matter belongs to the author. But the publisher or proprietor of the newspaper can himself obtain the copyright in any article published in the newspaper, &c., if he employs someone to "compose" what is published on the terms that the copyright shall belong to the publisher or proprietor. The word "compose" here cannot mean copy or write from dictation; it obviously means compose in the sense of being the author of the matter published. This is made perfectly clear by the language of the proviso, which prevents the publisher or proprietor of the newspaper, &c., from publishing the article in a separate form without the consent of the "author," and which entitles the author to publish it himself in a separate form. The "author" here is the person employed to "compose" the article. The more closely the Act is studied the more clearly it appears that, in order that the first publisher of any composition may acquire the copyright in it, he must be the "author" of what he publishes, or he must derive his right to publish from the author by being the owner of the manuscript or in some other way.

It was contended, and North, J., took the view, that although the reporter had no copyright in the speech, he was entitled to copyright in his report of it. But we cannot follow this. The report and the speech reported are, no doubt, different things, but the printer or publisher of the report is not the "author" of the speech reported, which is the only thing which gives any value or interest to the report. The printer or reporter of a speech is not the "author" of the reported speech in any intelligible sense of the word "author." To hold that every reporter of a speech has a copyright in his own report would be to stretch the Copyright Act to an extent which its language will not bear and which the Legislature obviously never contemplated. The Act was passed to protect authors, not reporters. Moreover, although it may be that reporters and their employers ought to be protected from the unauthorized appropriation of their labours by others, it by no means follows that Parliament would place reporters and their employers on the same footing as authors. It is only by treating reporters as authors of what they report (which they clearly are not) that they can be brought within the existing Copyright Act.

Although we have no sympathy with the defendant we are quite unable to decide in favour of the plaintiffs. Plausible as are the arguments addressed to the court on their behalf, these arguments are all based on the untenable doctrine that, for the purpose of copyright, reporters are authors. The analogy of directories, road-books, maps, &c., is, in our opinion, wholly misleading. There, each man who himself makes a directory, &c., and publishes it, is the author of what he publishes. The reporter of a speech is not. The distinction is all-important, but it is only by wholly ignoring it that the decisions on directories, &c., can be invoked by the plaintiffs.

If the reporter of a speech gives the substance of it in his own languge; if, although the ideas are not his, his expression of them is his own and not the speaker's, with immaterial differences, the reported speech would be an original composition, of which the reporter would be the author, and he would be entitled to copyright in his own production. This is the ground on which copyright in law reports is based. They are by no means mere transcripts of judgments delivered in court. But we have not to deal with speeches re-cast by the reporter. He has reproduced to the best of his ability not only the ideas expressed by the speaker, but the language in which the speaker expressed those ideas. In other words, we are dealing with the most accurate report of the speaker's words which the reporter could make. No doubt it requires considerable education and ability to make a good report of any speech. But an accurate report is not an original composition, nor is the reporter of a speech the author of what he reports.

The appeal must be allowed, and the action dismissed.

BARSHT v. TAGG. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Construction—Liability for expenditure on property—Expense of compulsory sanitary work before completion—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 4, 141.

Conditions of sale provided for completion of the purchase on a certain day, and for the apportionment of rents, rates, taxes, and outgoings up to that day, and also in the event of completion being delayed beyond such day for the purchase-money bearing interest or, at the vendor's option, he to receive the rents up to the day of actual completion of the purchase.

Held, that in the event of completion being delayed beyond the appointed day the vendor had the option of either claiming interest and accounting to the purchaser for rents since the appointed day, or of keeping all sums in fact received by the vendor since that day from tenants; but there being no words expressly relieving the purchaser from the obligation to discharge outgoings after the appointed day, and no ground for inserting anything by implication, the expense of complying with a sanitary notice under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, after the appointed day and after the title having been accepted, must be borne by the purchaser.

Action.

This was an action by a purchaser for specific performance of a contract annexed to the conditions of sale in respect of three leasehold houses, known as 167, 168, and 169, Elwin-street, Hackney-road, Middlesex, sold by auction at the Mart, on the 7th of July, 1898, the three houses comprising Lot 5 in the particulars of sale.

The third condition of sale was as follows: "Each purchaser is, at the close of the sale to him, to pay down a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount of his purchase-money, and to sign an agreement in the form subjoined to these conditions for the completion of his purchase according to these conditions, and to pay the remainder of his purchase-money on the 11th day of August, 1898, at the office" of the vendor's solicitor, "at which time and place the purchases are to be completed, and a purchaser paying his purchase-money is as from that day to be let into possession or receipt of rents and profits, and up to that date all rents, rates, taxes, and outgoings are (if necessary) to be apportioned, and such apportioned rents shall be paid on completion by such purchaser to the vendor. If, from any cause whatever, other than wilful default on the part of the vendor, the completion of the purchase is delayed beyond the before-mentioned day, the remainder of the purchase-money is to bear interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum from that day to the day of the actual payment thereof, or, at the option of the vendor, he may receive the rents and profits up to the day of the actual completion of the purchase. The property shall, as from the day of sale, be at the sole risk of the purchaser, and the vendor shall not incur any liability by reason of its then or subsequently becoming or remaining untenanted, uninsured, or deteriorated."

The plaintiff paid a deposit of 10 per cent. and a title was made out to his satisfaction and was accepted before the 11th of August, but the plaintiff was not then in a position to complete, and did not complete, and the defendant had ever since remained in possession of the property.

On the 9th of November, 1898, notices were served under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, upon the defendant, as "owner" of the three houses forming Lot 5, that nuisances existed on the houses, the nature of the alleged nuisances being specified in the notices, which required the nuisances to be abated. The defendant, without waiting for any further proceedings to be taken by the public authority, caused the requisite work to be done to the houses and paid the cost of the work, amounting to £24 17s. 3d.

The plaintiff insisted that if the defendant retained the rents and profits since the 11th of August the defendant ought himself to pay this sum, and, as the defendant refused to complete on these terms, brought the above action.

Buckmaster, for the plaintiff.—Section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, throws the liability on the vendor, as he is in receipt of the rents, and is therefore "owner" within the Act: see section 141. Tubbs v. Wynne, [1897] 1 Q. B. 74, 45 W. R. Dig. 168, shows that the expense on the work ordered to be done would have been "outgoings" within the third condition of sale. [Eve, Q.C., referred to Carrodus v. Sharp, 20 Beav. 56.] The meaning of this condition is that the vendor is to be entitled to the benefit of the rents, less outgoings, until the actual day of completion, and the condition ought to be construed as though the actual day of completion was put in place of the day named in the contract.

Eve, Q.C., and Earle, for the defendant.—The condition only provides expressly for apportionment of outgoings up to the 11th of August, 1898, and on the true construction there is nothing to relieve the purchaser from subsequent outgoings including these expenses. They are not charged on rents and profits.

They referred to Key and Elphinstone's Conveyancing (6th ed.). vol. 1, p. 240, with regard to the form of the condition.

COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows: I think it is settled law that in the absence of any stipulation on the subject the vendor must bear all expenses and outgoings of property sold down to the time when a good title was first shown, so that the purchaser could prudently take possession, and as from that time all such expenses and outgoings must be borne by the purchaser, and the purchaser must also pay interest on his unpaid purchase-money from that time: see Carrodus v. Sharp. The sum in question is an "outgoing" to which this principle would be applied: see Tubbs v. Wynne. As the title was accepted on or before the 11th of August, I think that, in the absence of any stipulation, the plaintiff would have been entitled, on the one hand, to the rents and profits as from that date, and, on the other hand, would have been bound to repay the sum which the defendant has paid in respect of these outgoings. The question which I have to decide is whether to any, and if so what, extent the position of the parties is altered by the express stipulation contained in condition 3. Now that condition distinctly provides that, if completion takes place on the 11th of August, all rates, taxes, and outgoings are to be apportioned, and that the purchaser is to pay to the vendor an apportioned part of the current rents which have not yet been received but which in due course the purchaser will receive from the tenants. If, however, the purchaser is not ready to complete on that day, what is to happen? It is clear that the vendor must remain in possession until completion, and it seems to me that an option is given to the vendor. He may say, "You must pay me 6 per cent. interest, and I will account to you for the rents and profits since the 11th of August"; or he may say, "I have in my pocket a certain sum which I have received from tenants since the 11th of August. I will keep that sum and make no claim against you for interest." I do not think that in that event he can require the purchaser to make any payment in respect of the apportioned part of the current rents. He can only retain so much of the rents and profits as he has in fact received up to the actual completion. Is there anything in this condition to relieve the plaintiff from the obligation to discharge the outgoings? I think not. I cannot regard the second sentence of the condition as simply making the first sentence applicable to the actual date of completion whenever it may be. There are not in it any words about outgoings or apportionment, and I think it would be wrong to insert them by implication. I may observe that in Key and Elphinstone's Precedents the words "less outgoings" are expressly added. The result is that I think the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance except on the footing of paying to the defendant, in addition to the balance of the purchase-money, the sum of £24 17s. 3d. I presume the plaintiff elects to complete on that footing.

WHITHAM v. ANDREW. (a.)

Will—Secret trust—Joint tenants—Notice to one only.

A secret trust of property bequeathed absolutely to two persons as joint tenants communicated only to one of them is not binding upon the other, unless it is made upon the faith of an antecedent promise by the one to whom the communication is made.

Action with witnesses for a declaration of the rights of parties interested in the estate.

Maria Stead, by her will dated the 29th of April, 1897, after giving a number of specific and pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed her residuary real and personal estate to her executors and trustees, the defendants John Marsh and Mrs. Andrew and the plaintiff, on trust to sell the same, and after payment out of the proceeds, of expenses debts and legacies to hold the remainder in trust for the plaintiff and the defendant Mrs. Andrew absolutely.

The testatrix died on the 1st of May, 1898, leaving no real estate, and the value of her residuary personal estate did not exceed £2,000.

After the death of the testatrix the plaintiff stated that the testatrix had expressed a desire that £2,000 out of the residue of her estate should be given to her nephew, the defendant J. W. Collett, and the remainder to certain charities.

The defendant Mrs. Andrew denied that she had any knowledge of the existence of the trust until she was informed of it by the plaintiff, and refused to admit that she was bound by it.

At the trial the plaintiff stated that the testatrix had communicated her intention to create the secret trust to the plaintiff before the execution of her will; but the solicitor who prepared the will gave evidence which tended to show that the testatrix had no intention to benefit the defendant Collett in the manner alleged. The defendant Mrs. Andrew, in her evidence, denied all knowledge either of the residuary bequest or of the alleged secret trust until after the testatrix's death.

Dibdin, for the plaintiff.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and F. H. L. Errington, for the defendant J. W. Collett.—There is here a gift of residue to the plaintiff and the defendant Mrs. Andrew, who take as joint tenants; and the trust was communicated to one of them, and therefore affects the other: Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204; Moss v. Cooper, 1 Joh. & Hem. 352, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 114; Tee v. Ferris, 4 W. R. 352, 2 K. & J. 357; Robotham v. Dunnett, 26 W. R. 529, 8 Ch. D. 430. In this respect the case differs from that of tenants in common: see the last two cases cited, and the recent case before Byrne, J., of Freeman v. Laing, ante p. 9, [1899] 2 Ch. 355.

They also referred to Lester v. Foxcroft, 2 W. & T. L. C. 10th ed., p. 460, and the notes, and to Theobald on Wills (4th ed.), p. 65.

E. P. Hewitt, for the defendant Mrs. Andrew.—The cases where the communication to one trustee has been held to bind the other are cases of actual fraud. They are rested upon the principle of Huguenin v. Baseley, 1 W. & T. L. C. 10th ed., p. 247, and do not depend upon the presence or absence of a joint tenancy. The evidence shows that the trust was not communicated to the plaintiff until after the signature of the will.

P. B. Abraham, for the defendant John Marsh, took no part in the argument.

Dibdin, in reply.—I submit that in this case the trust was communicated to the plaintiff before the execution of the will. The principle which governs these cases is that laid down by Lord Cairns in Jones v. Badley, 16 W. R. 713, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 362.

Nov. 27.—FARWELL, J., after stating the facts and pointing out that the plaintiff had not discharged the burden of proving to his satisfaction that the defendant Mrs. Andrew was affected with a trust, continued as follows: The facts, therefore, stand thus: A gift by will to Mrs. Whitham and Mrs. Andrew in joint tenancy; a trust affecting that gift communicated by the testatrix to and accepted by Mrs. Whitham alone after making her will; entire ignorance of such trust by Mrs. Andrew until after the testatrix's death. The authorities establish the following propositions: If A. induces B. either to make or to abstain from revoking a will leaving him property by expressly promising or tacitly consenting to carry out B.'s wishes concerning it, the court will hold this to be a trust, and will compel A. to execute it: see McCormick v. Grogan, 17 W. R. 961, L. R. 4, H. L. 82 at p. 89. If A. induces B. either to make or to leave unrevoked a will leaving property to A. and C. as tenants in common by expressly promising or tacitly consenting that he and C. will carry out the testator's wishes, and C. knows nothing of the matter until after A.'s death, A. is bound, but C. is not: see Tee v. Ferris, the reason stated (p. 368) being that to hold otherwise would enable one beneficiary to deprive the rest of their benefits by setting up a secret trust. If, however, the gift were to A. and C. as joint tenants, the authorities have established a distinction between those cases in which the will is made on the faith of an antecedent promise by A., and those in which the will is left unrevoked on the faith of a subsequent promise. In the former case the trust binds both A. and C. (Russell v. Jackson and Jones v.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Badley), the reason stated being that no person can claim an interest under a fraud committed by another (Burney v. Macdonald, 15 Sim. 6); in the latter case A. and not C. is bound (Moss v. Cooper); the reason stated (p. 367) being that the gift is not tainted with any fraud in procuring the execution of the will. I am bound to decide in accordance with these authorities, and I accordingly hold that Mrs. Andrew is not bound by any trust.

The action must be dismissed, but the plaintiff must have her costs out of the fund which she admits that she holds in trust for the defendant Collett.

NEWTON-IN-MAKERFIELD URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. LYNN.
THE SAME v. BROWN. (a.)

Market — Toll — Exposure for sale — Newton District Improvement Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. c.), s. 59, Schedule B.

The plaintiffs were authorized by section 59 and Schedule B. of the Newton District Improvement Act, 1855, to collect a toll "for every cart used by any person for exposing or in which shall be exposed for sale any article," &c.

An ærated water dealer was in the habit of sending round a cart loaded with ærated waters to the houses of his customers. The man in charge of the cart entered the house of the customer, took his order, and there and then delivered from the cart the goods ordered.

Held, that the goods were not exposed for sale within the meaning of the schedule, and that no toll was therefore chargeable in respect of the cart.

Appeals from a county court.

The two appeals were heard together, the facts being precisely similar.

The actions in each case were brought to recover 9d., the amount of the toll.

The facts in Lynn's case were as follows: The respondent, who dealt in ærated waters, was in the habit of sending round a cart loaded with boxes of ærated waters to his customers. On the 10th of March, 1899, the cart, in charge of the respondent's son, stopped in front of a shop kept by Mrs. Kirkman. The defendant's son went inside the shop and asked Mrs. Kirkman if she wanted any ærated waters, and, if so, how much. She replied, "One and a-half boxes." The defendant's son then took the amount named from the cart and brought it into the shop. Mrs. Kirkman dealt with the respondent regularly. At first she used to give an order, and the respondent would bring what she ordered the next time he came round.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendants in each case.

Horridge, for the appellants.—The goods in the respondents' carts were articles exposed for sale within the meaning of the Act, and the respondent in each case was therefore liable to pay the toll claimed in respect of the cart: see Pletts v. Campbell, 43 W. R. 634, [1895] 2 Q. B. 229, and White v. The Mayor, &c., of Yeovil, 61 L. J. M. C. 213, 41 W. R. Dig. 132.

S. H. Day, for the respondents.—The goods were not exposed for sale in the cart, but were merely in the cart ready to be delivered when sold.

BIGHAM, J.—In my opinion the learned county court judge was right. It is said that the respondents in these two cases sent round these boxes of ærated waters in order to expose them for sale. In my opinion they did not do anything of the kind. The goods were sent round to the customer's house not to be exposed for sale, but in order that they might be there if the customer bought any. That is not an exposure for sale in any sense. I will not attempt to define what is an exposure for sale. It is sufficient to say that the facts of these cases do not bring them within the definition, whatever it may be.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object primarily aimed at by the statute is to tax carts hung round with articles for sale so as to tempt people to buy. It is not necessary to say how far the facts are short of an exposure for sale. It is sufficient to say that the carts here were used not to expose the goods in them for sale, but to facilitate the delivery of the goods when sold.

BURTON v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE PARISHES OF ST. GILES-IN-THE-FIELDS AND ST. GEORGE, BLOOMSBURY, AND THE SURVEYOR OF TAXES FOR THE DISTRICT COMPRISING THE SAID PARISHES. (a.)

Poor Law—Rating—Land used for exhibition of advertisements — Advertisement hoardings — Advertisement contractor—Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 27), s. 3.

An advertisement contractor hired from builders and owners of land the right to affix advertisements upon the hoardings erected by the builders during building operations, and affixed thereto the advertisements of the persons whose advertisements he had agreed to exhibit.

Held, that the advertisement contractor was not a person who permitted the land on which the hoardings stood to be used for the exhibition of advertisements within the meaning of section 3 of the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, and that he was not rateable, as beneficial occupier, in respect of such land.

Case stated by justices of London.

The appellant objected before the assessment committee to the insertion of his name in the supplemental valuation list of the parish of Bloomsbury as being the rateable occupier of an "advertising station" situate at 72 and 86, Southampton-row, and of "hoardings" situate at 100 and 112, Southampton-row, and at other places. The objection was disallowed and the assessment confirmed. The appellant appealed to the quarter sessions, who dismissed the appeal subject to this case.

The appellant was an advertisement contractor carrying on business under the name of the Partington Advertising Co. He obtained licences from builders, owners, or lessees of land to affix during building operations advertisements on the exterior of hoardings necessarily erected during the continuance of building operations, and he affixed on such hoardings the advertisements of those whose advertisements he had agreed to exhibit. The advertising station and hoardings in respect of which his name was inserted in the valuation list were hoardings used by him in the above manner.

Licences had been obtained in respect of each of the hoardings from the board of works, pursuant to section 5 of the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act, 1889, subject to the monthly payments imposed by the board in such cases.

Section 3 of the same Act provides as follows: "Where any land is used temporarily or permanently for the exhibition of advertisements, or for the erection of any hoarding, frame, post, wall, or structure used for the exhibition of advertisements, but not otherwise occupied, the person who shall permit the same to be so used, or (if he cannot be ascertained) the owner thereof, shall be deemed to be in beneficial occupation of such land or part thereof, and shall be rateable in respect thereof to the relief of the poor, and to all local rates, according to the value of such use as aforesaid."

R. C. Glen, for the appellant.—The appellant's name was wrongly inserted in the valuation list. So far from being the person who permitted the land on which the hoardings were erected to be used for the exhibition of advertisements he was the person who actually used them. The builder was the right person to be rated: see Chappell v. Overseers of St. Botolph, 40 W. R 192, [1892] 1 Q. B. 561, and Shelley v. Dillon, 30 L. R. Ir. 304, 30 W. R. Dig. 172.

Macmorran, Q.C., and Ryde, for the respondent.—In Chappell v. Overseers of St. Botolph the question raised was, as between the owner and the builder, which of these was the right person to be rated. No question was then raised as to the liability of the advertisement contractor. The decision is therefore not an authority on this point. The appellant is clearly a person who permits the land to be used for the exhibition of advertisements.

GRANTHAM, J.—We think that the justices were wrong. We have no doubt on the facts of this case that the appellant was not the person who ought to have been rated. It would be highly inconvenient if the advertisement contractor were the person to be rated. It would be inconvenient both for the agent and for the overseers. Take, for instance, the case of boards erected in fields close to a railway. It would be very inconvenient for the overseers to collect the rates from an advertisement contractor, whose business may very likely be carried on, not in the parish, but in some town far away.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. As I understand the facts of this case, the appellant would not have been rateable before the Advertising Stations (Rating) Act was passed. I am clearly of opinion that he is not a person rateable within the meaning of that Act.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Aug. 12, 1899.

"THE HAABET." (a.)

Ship—Bottomry—Absence of maritime interest—Bond payable on vessel putting into port short of port of destination—Payment of bottomry loan by cheque or approved draft—Insurance of bond.

A bottomry instrument may be valid though it does not stipulate for maritime interest, and notwithstanding that it be made payable if the vessel on which the money is lent on bottomry "shall, in the course of the voyage on which she is now being despatched, go into any port of refuge to repair there."

The Cecilie, 4 P. D. 210, 27 W. R. 198, followed.

This was an action of bottomry instituted on behalf of Messrs. Hanschell & Co. against the Norwegian barque Haabet and her freight.

The writ of summons in the action was indorsed as follows: "The plaintiffs' claim is for the sum of £144 17s. 7d. in respect of necessaries supplied to the Norwegian barque Haabet. Alternatively the plaintiffs claim the said sum upon an engagement entered into by the master of the said vessel for the requirements of the ship in the capacity of master. In the further alternative the plaintiffs claim the said sum as the holders of a bottomry bond or instrument of hypothecation dated the 7th of April, 1898, and signed by the master of the said vessel."

So far as material the instrument so referred to in the above indorsement was in the following terms: "Within ten days after arrival at port of discharge in Europe or at any other place at which the voyage may terminate of the Norwegian barque Haabet under my command now being despatched for a voyage from Apalachicola, I promise to pay in an approved bankers' freight-draft or cheque on London in sterling to the order of Messrs. Brodr Trier, Copenhagen, or if on arrival so instructed by them, to them direct, or at their option my consignees are hereby directed to deduct from the freight due to the vessel and to hold at the disposal of Messrs. Brodr Trier for credit of Messrs. Hanschell & Co., Barbadoes, the sum of £144 17s. 7d. being amount of cash advances made to me here by the said Hanschell & Co. to defray vessel's necessary expenses and disbursement at this port, and for which I hereby pledge the said vessel, her freight and her owners; all cost of remittance to be for vessel's account. This claim to have priority over all others that may be presented against the said freight and vessel, with the express agreement, however, that it shall not invalidate nor affect the lien upon or right of process against the said vessel and freight and owners for the amount of this bill with costs and expenses of recovering and interest in case of its not being duly accepted and paid. Provided always, and it is hereby expressly agreed and declared that if the said vessel shall in the course of the voyage on which she is now being despatched go into any port of refuge to repair there, all the moneys for the payment of which the said vessel, her freight and owners, are hereby pledged shall forthwith become due and payable, and it shall be lawful for the said Messrs. Brodr Trier or their agents or representatives to proceed at once against the vessel, freight, and owners, or any or either of the same separately, to recover the amount of this bill and costs and expenses incurred in recovering the same.

"Barbadoes, the 7th April, 1898.

"Master Norwegian barque Haabet."

Two actions of necessaries were also instituted against The Haabet and her freight, the plaintiffs in one of such actions claiming the sum of £171 4s. 5d., and as it was apprehended that on The Haabet being sold by the court she would not realize the amount of all the claims against her, the plaintiffs in the action of necessaries in which £171 4s. 5d. was claimed took out a summons in chambers in the action instituted by them for an order directing the payment to them out of the fund in court representing the proceeds of The Haabet of the sum of £171 4s. 5d., together with the taxed costs of the action of necessaries in which the summons was taken out, or that in the alternative such order may be made as to the judge may seem fit for dealing with the claims against The Haabet in respect of which action may brought.

This summons was adjourned into court and came on for hearing before the judge in court (Bucknill, J.) on the 27th of June last, before any pleadings had been delivered in the bottomry action or judgment obtained either in that action or in any of the actions of necessaries instituted against The Haabet. The hearing was continued on the 3rd of July last.

Roche, for plaintiffs in the action of necessaries in which £171 4s. 5d. was claimed.—The form of the instrument which the plaintiffs in the bottomry action ask the court to pronounce to be a bottomry bill shows that the transaction was not one of bottomry. No stipulation is to be found in the document for maritime interest. Payment is to be made on the vessel putting into a port to repair, and a cheque or draft on which the master, who is also the owner of the vessel, would be personally liable is to be given as part of the arrangement entered into. The following cases support this view: The Emancipation, 1 Wm. Rob. 124; The Royal Arch, 6 W. R. 191, Swa. 269; The Indomitable, Swa. 446, 7 W. R. Adm. Dig. 18.

He also referred to Stambank v. Sheppard, 1 W. R. 505, 13 C. B. 418.

Noad, for plaintiffs in the action of bottomry.—The cases of The Laurel, 13 W. R. 352, Br. & Lush. 317, The Cecilie, 4 P. D. 210, 27 W. R. Dig. 198, and The Elpis, L. R. 4, A. & E. 1, show that the instrument signed by the master of The Haabet at Barbadoes was a valid bottomry bill. The bill has become due as the ship arrived safely at Dover, and the court for the saving of expense is asked to express its opinion at the present stage of the actions whether the instrument referred to in the indorsement on the writ of summons in the bottomry action is a valid bottomry bill, and, therefore, giving the bottomry bill holder priority over the claimants for necessaries.

It appeared by an affidavit filed in the action of necessaries in which the summons had been taken out, that John Edward Kjorswig, the master of The Haabet, was the sole registered owner of that vessel, and that his name appeared as such in the Norwegian register of shipping issued at Christiana. It was admitted at the bar that the plaintiffs in the necessaries action in which the summons had been taken out were entitled to judgment for the amount of their claim, and that if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs in the action of bottomry were right in construing the instrument of the 7th of April, 1898, as a bottomry bill, the amount claimed by them was due to them on bottomry, and they were entitled to a decree pronouncing for the validity of the bottomry bill proceeded on. Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 12.—BUCKNILL, J.—The question I have to decide is whether the document is a bottomry bond. It is in the following terms: [The learned judge read the document of the 7th of April, 1890, above set out, and continued:] From the document itself it is clear that it purports to be in the nature of a bill transaction as well as a pledge of the ship and freight. It is also clear that the lender did not stipulate for what is commonly called maritime interest, but it is also clear that he was running the risk of the vessel not reaching the port of discharge in Europe, unless whilst on her voyage she should put into a port of refuge to repair, in which case the loan was to become at once due and payable, and for the recovery of which the lender was to have power at once to proceed against the ship. It is said, on the one hand, that this is not a bottomry transaction, but a bill transaction or a mortgage, as distinguished from a bottomry bond. I have no doubt that those who prepared the document intended that it should be both a bill transaction — as it is in fact described — and a bottomry bond as well — that is, that if on the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge a bill at sight or cheque was given, or freight to the amount of the loan was remitted to or held at the disposal of the agents of the lender, then that the ship should be free, but if not then that the ship should be held liable.

It appears, however, from the case of The Elpis, 21 W. R. 576, L. R. 4 A. & E. 1, that a document if in substance and effect a bottomry bond is not invalid because it is called something else. There the document was called "this first of exchange" but Sir Robert Phillimore said: "Now it is clear to me that this is in substance and effect a bottomry bond, and looking to the precedents in this court it must be so considered." It that case it must be observed that there was no maritime interest paid or agreed to be paid by the borrower, but there was a maritime risk, because unless the ship arrived at her port of discharge the loan was lost. That case was followed by The Cecilie, which was decided by the same learned judge seven years later, and is important on the question of maritime risk, and, there there had been no stipulation made for interest. Sir Robert Phillimore said: "I am satisfied that on the authority of precedents and decided cases I must hold that the instruments in respect of which this action is brought are valid bottomry bonds." There, as here, the money was to be paid not only in the event of the ship's arrival at her port of discharge, but in the event of her putting in at some place between the port of sailing and the port of discharge which involved a maritime risk, because if she was lost at sea after setting sail and was never heard of again the lenders would lose their loan. On the other hand "the total absence of any mention of a maritime risk, either express or implied," would invalidate the document as a bottomry bond: see The Emancipation, and see also The Indomitable, where it was attempted to make the document a bottomry bond; but the court held, as it was impossible to find any intention on the part of the lenders to include a maritime risk, it was not a bottomry security. That case may also be referred to on another point. In the margin of the document which I have to construe appears this memorandum: "Insured under open policy with . . . through Brodr Trier, Copenhagen," who were the agents of the persons who made the advances to the master of The Haabet. Now, in The Indomitable, Dr. Lushington said: "I agree that if there was a maritime risk directly stated, the mere fact that the insurance was to be made by the lenders and paid for by the borrowers might not invalidate the bond." I follow that dictum and find that as there was a maritime risk in the case so the fact of insurance by the lender—as I suppose it was—does not invalidate the bond.

Remembering that it is the practice of this court to construe liberally such a document as this, where the parties intended to treat the loan as one of bottomry, and finding, as I do, that by the language of the instrument the lenders incurred a maritime risk, and that neither the bill transaction nor the insurance memorandum invalidate it, I pronounce for the validity of the bond.

RUABON STEAMSHIP CO. v. LONDON ASSURANCE. (a.)

Insurance, marine—Underwriters' liability—Repair to ship—Owners taking advantage of ship being dry-docked—Apportionment of expenses.

A ship was dry-docked solely to enable the underwriters to effect the repairs for which they were liable. The owners took advantage of the ship being in dry dock to have her surveyed for the purpose of reclassification at Lloyds, but no extra expense was occasioned to the underwriters thereby.

Held, that the underwriters were alone liable for the whole dock dues and the cost of getting in and out of dock, the owners being under no liability for them whatsoever.

Marine Insurance Co. v. China Transpacific Co. (Limited) (Vancouver case), 35 W. R. 169, 11 App. Cas. 573, commented on and explained.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, 46 W. R. 417, [1898] 1 Q. B. 722, reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the Court of Appeal (Chitty and Collins, L.JJ., A. L. Smith, L.J., dissenting), 46 W. R. 417, [1898] 1 Q. B. 722, affirming judgment of Mathew, J. The facts are given at length in the report in the court below, and shortly in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Cohen, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for appellants.—It is not enough that an incidental advantage should be taken to fix us with any liability. The steamer was put into the dock for the underwriters' purpose alone, and there was no increase of expense owing to our action. The Vancouver case, 35 W. R. 169, 11 App. Cas. 573, is really in our favour.

J. Walton, Q.C., and Hamilton, for respondents.—This case is covered by the Vancouver case.

Cohen, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The sum sought to be recovered in this case is a very small one, but the principle discussed and decided is one of very far-reaching importance, and I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. The agreed facts may be very shortly stated. The steamship Ruabon having been placed in dock for the purpose of repairs, for which the underwriters were liable, while she was in dock the owner took advantage of the opportunity to have the vessel surveyed. It is part of the agreed facts that the holding of the survey added not a farthing to the cost, or a moment to the period of time during which the execution of the repairs proceeded, and the question raised is whether the owner of the vessel is liable on any reason known to the law to bear part of the expense involved in the docking of the vessel and keeping her there while the repairs were being executed. I notice that in more than one of the judgments it is said that the owner of the vessel used the dock for his own purposes. I think that there is a fallacy in the employment of that word "used." He went on to his own vessel and held a survey, and I think that it is not true to say that the dock was used for his purposes at all. He took advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him by another person (the insuring company) being under contract to do themselves that which gave him an opportunity of seeing the vessel, and for which, if he had been minded to make a survey, he would have had to pay himself. But unless the phrase "using of the dock" is explained, it seems to me to be fallacious first to say that he used the dock and then to infer that as he used the dock he is called upon to pay for it. I propose to examine in detail the various cases, or rather the various classes of cases, where the right to contribution has been held to be part of our law. But it seems to me a very formidable proposition indeed to say that any court has a right to enforce what may seem to them to be just, apart from common law or statute. The courts, no doubt, will enforce the common law, and will apply it to new questions of fact which arise; but I cannot understand how it can be asserted that it is part of the common law that where one person gets some advantage from the act of another a right of contribution towards the expense from that act arises on behalf of the person who has done it. Many cases might be put where the generality of such a proposition would be plainly contrary to any received principle, and to my mind the question now in debate—admitted to be absolutely novel — would not be covered by any principle known to the law, except such a general proposition as I have indicated above. Now, I am unable to affirm that that is the condition of the common law. The doctrine of "average" has been repeatedly held to be a rule derived from the maritime law of Rhodes. In his judgment in Strang, Steel, & Co. v. Scott, 38 W. R. 452, 14 App. Cas. 601, Lord Watson said: "The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text as presented by Paulus, Dig. L. 14, tit. 2, is, Si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est." Bramwell, L.J., it is true, in Wright v. Marwood, 29 W. R. 673, 7 Q. B. D. 62, rested it upon an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested. Brett, M.R., on the other hand, in Burton v. English, 32 W. R. 655, 12 Q. B. D. 218, spoke of it as a right arising not from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, which had been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not necessary to go minutely into the arguments arising from the difference of opinion as to the origin of the law. It is, at all events, a known principle enforceable by the courts, resting either upon positive enactment adopted into our law or from an implied contract between the parties. So Lord Coke in Sir William Harbert's case, 3 Rep. 11*b*, at 14*b*, explains very clearly when dealing with "contribution." He says: "Note, reader, when it is said before and often in our books that if one purchaser be only extended for the whole debt, that he shall have contribution; it is not thereby intended that the others shall give or allow to him anything by way of contribution, but it ought to be intended that the party, who is only extended for the whole, may by audita querela or scire facias, as the case requires, defeat the execution, and thereby he shall be restored to all the mean profits, and compel the conusee to sue execution of the whole land; so in this manner everyone shall be contributory, hoc est, the land of every ter-tenant shall be equally extended." Lord Redesdale in the case of Stirling v. Forrester, 3 Bligh, 575. at p. 596, said that "the decision in Dering v. Lord Winchilsea, 1 Cox Ch. 318, 2 Bos. & Pull. 270, proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries, that where several persons are debtors all shall be equal. The doctrine is illustrated in that case by the practice in questions of 'average,' &c., where there is no express contract, but equity distributes the loss equally. On the prisage of wines, it is immaterial whose wines are taken; all must contribute equally, so it is where goods are thrown overboard for the safety of the ship, the owners of the goods saved by that act must contribute proportionally to the loss. The duty of contribution extends to all persons who are within the scope of the equitable obligation." I know of no case in which anything like the present claim has been advanced. There is no debt here for which both the parties in question are bound to some third person. It cannot be denied that the underwriters here were themselves bound to incur all the liability they did incur, and that the shipowner was under no such liability. There is here no joint ownership which makes a liability upon all partaking of that ownership, and which liability each is under an obligation to some third person to fulfil. In another part of Lord Redesdale's observations in the case of Stirling v. Forrester, his lordship makes clear what he means by his commentary on the case of Dering v. Lord Winchilsea. He says: "The principle established in the case of Dering v. Lord Winchilsea is universal, that the right and duty of contribution is founded in doctrines of equity, it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted and one makes the payment the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditors to exact or receive payment from one and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract but always in conscience as far as he is able, to put the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of the decision in Dering v. Lord Winchilsea, and in that case there was no evidence of contract as in this. So in the case of land descending to coparceners, subject to a debt, if the creditor proceeds against one of the coparceners the others must contribute. If the creditor discharges one of the coparceners he cannot proceed for the whole debt against the others; at the most they are only bound to pay their proportions." In all the cases to which I have referred, and in all the observations made by the learned judges, the liability of each of the persons held to be bound to contribute is assumed to exist either by contract or by some obligation binding them all to equality of payment or sacrifice in respect of that common obligation. But this is the first time in which it has been sought to advance that principle where there is nothing in common between the two persons, except that one person has taken advantage of something that another person has done, there being no contract between them—there being no obligation by which each of them is bound; and the duty to contribute is alleged to arise only on some general principle of justice, that a man ought not to get an advantage unless he pays for it. So that if a man were to cut down a wood which obscured his neighbour's prospect and gave him a better view, the neighbour ought upon this principle to be compelled to contribute to cutting down the wood. Or if a man built a wall so as to shield his neighbour's house from undue wet or danger from violent tempests, he ought to be entitled to contribution because the latter has got an advantage from what his neighbour did. I can find no authority for any principle which includes this case. The heads of "Average," "Principal and Surety," "Joint Debtor," or "Ownership of Lands," all of which are liable in execution and only one of which has been made the subject of execution, are intelligible heads of the law, and are included within well-known and ascertained principles. This case seems to me to go entirely beyond those ascertained principles, and for it there would appear to be no authority. No statute has authorized it; no principle of the common law comprehends it; and I am therefore unable to concur with the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal.

But it remains to consider whether the case is not covered by authority. That supposed authority is to be found in what has been called the Vancouver case—Marine Insurance Co. (Limited) v. China Transpacific Co. (Limited). I cannot think that that case establishes any such proposition as is insisted on here. In that case the sole question was whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondent exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty. It is necessary to observe somewhat minutely the facts of that case in order to see whether there is anything in it which affects the question now in debate. The Vancouver, the vessel in question, was insured in a time policy which contained the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." During a voyage covered by the policy she sustained certain damage not known at the time, but when some time after the owners for their own purposes of cleaning and scraping her, put her into dock, the damage was observed then and there, and the underwriters were, of course, liable to make good the particular average loss for which under the policy they were liable. The question having arisen in this form, and the owners having paid the whole of the dock dues while the vessel was being scraped and cleaned, and while simultaneously the obligation of the underwriters was being fulfilled by the repair of the damage, it was argued that by the accidental circumstance of the owner having put his vessel into dock, and the underwriter having thereby escaped any liability to the dock-owner for dock dues, the cost of repairs to him was brought under the agreed amount of 3 per cent. What the court had to determine was the liability under the policy in question, and with reference to that question, which, be it observed, is to be measured by what the damage would cost to repair, the court held that the dock dues were part of the cost, and that, under the circumstances, as the operations were simultaneously performed, the cost should be attributed (let the phrases be noted) in moieties to the operations of those two persons interested. Now the owner paid the dock dues, and if he had not done so the underwriter would undoubtedly have had to pay for dock dues, and if he had, the amount paid would have been over 3 per cent. It came, in fact, to a calculation of the extent of the damage done, and that being measured by its cost of repair, it was held that the 3 per cent. was reached. What Lord Herschell meant is, I think, sufficiently explained by what he says in commenting on the case of Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 30 W. R. 906, 9 Q. B. Div. 192, as to the mode in which the particular average loss was to be arrived at in that case. He says: "All the judges were, I think, agreed that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled as a general rule to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances." Now the facts found in that case (Vancouver case) which is relied on were that the vessel was put into dry dock on the 4th of January, 1876. It was discovered on the afternoon of the same day that her stern-post was broken. It was found by the special case that if the vessel had required nothing but scraping and cleaning, the purpose for which alone she was put there by her owners, she might have been finished and discharged by the evening of the 6th, whereas for the purposes of her repair, for which the underwriters were responsible, she required the whole time from the 4th to 11th of January, when in fact she was discharged. How a mode of thus calculating the particular average loss so as to satisfy the contract between the two parties to it can justify such a proposition as is here insisted on, I am unable either to understand or to agree to, and I think this judgment should be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I concur. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack that there is no principle of law which requires that a person should contribute to an outlay merely because he has derived a material benefit from it, nor is there, I think, any authority to be found for the application of such a proposition, unless it is to be found in the Vancouver case. The Vancouver case has been supposed to go some way in that direction in a question between shipowner and underwriter, where ship's repairs and underwriter's repairs are carried out simultaneously. But it must be borne in mind that the question for decision in that case was "whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondents exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty contained in a policy of assurance underwritten by the appellants," and that (as Lord Herschell was careful to point out) was the sole question for decision. It was not decided that the shipowner was liable for one-half the cost of the use of the dock, including dock charges, but that the underwriter in respect of his obligation was liable at least for one-half of the cost. That was enough in the particular case to give the victory to the shipowner, and in this House he could not have asked for more.

Lord MORRIS concurred.

Lord DAVEY.—I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Brampton. It expresses my opinion so much better than I could express it myself that I will not trouble your lordships with any observations of my own.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I entirely concur in the judgment which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I take the general rule to be correctly stated by Lord Herschell in the Vancouver case, "that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances, as the measure of his loss." I take it also as admitted that, but for the matter which I am about to mention, it would not be disputed that the respondents were liable under their policy to pay as an indemnity against the loss by perils of the sea which occurred, the full sum of £82 5s. claimed. This represents primâ facie their responsibility. The respondents seek to reduce this amount by the sum of £2 5s. by reason of a survey of the ship which the plaintiffs, the owners, caused to be made by Lloyd's surveyor, during the period in which the vessel was under repair on the pontoon, which, for this purpose, I may call a dry dock. If they are right in making a reduction on this account, no question being raised as to the amount, the respondents are entitled to retain the judgment pronounced in their favour by the majority of the Court of Appeal. Since the decision of the Vancouver case, by which, of course, we are bound, and which to me seems to be founded on good sense, it is not, in my opinion, open to question that where two operations are essentially necessary to be performed upon the hull of the ship in order to render her in a condition to justify a prudent owner in sending her again to sea—one of such operations being to effect repairs for the cost of which underwriters are responsible; the other to clean and scrape the ship necessitated by wear and tear, the cost of which must be borne by the owners themselves, neither of which operations could be performed unless the ship were dry-docked, and both of which operations the owners and underwriters, or owners acting for themselves and also for the underwriters, deem it expedient should be performed at one and the same time, or that one should immediately follow the other without any substantial interval under one continuous dry-docking, in such cases the cost of docking and all dock dues during the period in which the vessel is in dock must be shared in proportion, having regard to the period of joint or separate actual use of it. I do not, however, find anything in the Vancouver case which would justify such division of dock dues, unless in such cases as I have mentioned. The present is a very different case. The Ruabon was dry-docked solely to enable the underwriters to effect the repairs for which they were liable and with no other object, and no other repair was, in fact, done or required to be done on the ship; the survey of Lloyd's surveyor was in no way necessary for any purpose connected with the work performed on the vessel, but was only made to entitle the owners to reclassification at Lloyd's, and need not have been made at that moment, nor at any particular time, so long as it was made within the time limited by Lloyd's rules, which had then nine months to run. It is quite true that if it had not then been made it would have been necessary if she were afterwards surveyed to have incurred the expense of again dry-docking her at the owners' expense, and to that extent the owners might have been benefited. I say might, because the owners might have sold the vessel in the meantime, or some other thing might have occurred to render such survey unnecessary. Assuming, however, that the expense of another dry-docking was in this way saved, and that to that extent the owners were benefited, I think that circumstance immaterial, and it does not warrant a claim for contribution towards the dock dues imperatively incurred on the underwriters' account in the discharge of their obligations. I think that such contribution can only be insisted upon in those cases where work is done to the vessel itself by two or more persons, each separately and simultaneously engaged under different obligations in doing portions of it, dry-docking being necessary for each. If the respondents' claim for contribution were allowed, I see no reason why such a claim might not be made against an owner who, while his ship was in dry dock, sold her, subject to immediate inspection and survey by his purchaser. A variety of other cases similar in character might be suggested. I think that the owners, in causing the survey to be made in this case, were taking what Lord Herschell termed "an incidental advantage," from the fact that a damage arising from a risk within the policy had necessitated repairs at the expense of the underwriter; and he puts by way of illustration the case of a vessel in ordinary course requiring scraping and painting at intervals of five years, and before the time for such operation has arrived meeting with a disaster by perils of the sea and docked for repairs for which underwriters were responsible; and the shipowner taking the opportunity of scraping and painting his ship. In repudiating the notion that the entire time occupied in that operation should be borne by the shipowner, he adds, "if they were to be borne by him at all." This observation of that noble and learned Lord makes it clear to me that he did not contemplate his judgment covering such a case as this, where nothing was in fact done on the ship, and the survey did not in the smallest degree delay the completion or add one farthing to the expense of the repairs done for the underwriter. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, Collins, and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Dec. 16.

FRANCIS v. TURNER BROTHERS. (a.)

Master and servant—Accident—Compensation—"On or in or about a factory"—Factory of third person—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which provides that the Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers "on or in or about a . . . factory," applies only to a factory occupied by the employer where he carries on his business, and does not include a factory belonging to a third person to which the workman is sent on his employer's business.

Appeal from the decision of the Newtown County Court judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant, Francis, was a labourer in the employment of the respondents, Messrs. Turner Brothers, who were the owners and occupiers of a factory. On the 14th of November, 1897, the appellant was sent by the respondents with some other workmen to the cloth factory of the Severn Tweed Co. to remove an old disused steam engine which the respondents had purchased. While engaged in removing the engine from the place where it was fixed, a tank which was above the engine fell down and injured the appellant. It was admitted that the accident arose out of and in the course of the appellant's employment. The Severn Tweed Co.'s factory was about 850 yards from the respondents' factory by the footpath, and about one mile by the cart-road.

The county court judge held that section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, did not apply to employment on or in or about a factory not occupied by the respondents, and he accordingly made an award in their favour.

Ellis J. Griffith and H. C. Davenport, for the appellant.—By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the Act only applies to employment by the undertakers—that is, by sub-section 2, in the case of a factory the occupiers thereof within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895—"on or in or about a factory." The section does not say "the" factory. The Act applies to employment by the occupier of a factory at another factory. The accident having arisen out of and in the course of the appellant's employment, the respondents were liable though the accident happened at a factory not belonging to them to which they had sent the appellant on their work.

Ruegg, Q.C., and A. Powell, for the respondents, were not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This seems to me a clear case. The respondents were the occupiers of a factory, and they had in their employment a workman who, if this accident had happened in that factory, would have been entitled to compensation under the Act. The respondents having bought an old engine which was in a factory about half a mile away from their own factory by the footpath, and about double that distance by the cart-road, sent some of their workmen, among them the appellant, to that factory for the purpose of removing the engine and taking it to their own factory. While the men were removing the engine at the other factory a tank fell upon the appellant and injured him. The question is whether the appellant is entitled to compensation under the Act of 1897. By section 7, sub-section 1, the Act only applies to employment by the undertakers, inter alia, "on, in, or about a factory." It is said that those words include employment at a factory other than that occupied by the employer. In my opinion that is not the meaning of the section. The section means employment at the factory occupied by the employers, where the employers carry on their business. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

Judgment of Stirling, J. (47 W. R. 554, [1899] 1 Ch. 836), affirmed on the first point, and reversed on the second point.

This was an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J. (reported 47 W. R. 554, [1899] 1 Ch. 836).

The plaintiffs were proprietors of the copyright in the music of three songs, and they brought the action to restrain an alleged infringement of their copyright.

The acts complained of consisted in the sale by the defendants of perforated sheets of paper for use in an instrument called the Æolian.

The Æolian was a wind instrument worked mechanically, but furnished with stops, swells, and pedals, by means of which changes in time and expression were effected. It contained forty-six pipes or reeds, each of which sounded a particular note.

The sheets in question were made in the form of rolls, which were placed in the instrument and unrolled by its action. They were so prepared that whenever a perforation passed under a particular pipe the appropriate note was sounded. The perforations were made in straight lines parallel to the edges of the notes, so that all perforations in the same line gave the same note. The perforations were of different lengths so that if the same time were kept, as would be the case if the machine were left to itself, the length of the perforation would indicate the duration of the note.

At the beginning of each roll was printed a statement as to the key in which the particular piece of music was written. The rolls contained no indications of any change of key. There were, however, printed on some of them certain words which were found on the sheets of music published by the plaintiffs, such as piano, crescendo, &c.

The stops were used to alter the pace and expression at and with which the music was played, and the skill of the player mainly consisted in availing himself of these stops so as to produce the best effect.

The plaintiffs contended that these perforated rolls were copies of sheets of music within section 2 of the Copyright Act, 1842.

It was proved at the trial that it was possible to construct a key so as to enable anyone to copy down the ordinary notes from the perforation. But there was no evidence that anyone had ever acquired the art of reading these rolls, and in the opinion of the judge it was improbable that anyone would ever do so.

Stirling, J., held that the rolls, so far as they contained perforations, were part of the instrument and were not copies of sheets of music within the Copyright Act, 1842; but that the addition of the directions as to time and expression constituted an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright: see 47 W. R. 554, [1899] 1 Ch. 836.

The plaintiffs appealed from the first part of the judgment, and the defendants from the second.

Dec. 12.—LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment, in which JEUNE, P., concurred: The plaintiffs are entitled to copyright in three sheets of music. What does this mean. It means that they have the exclusive right of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of those sheets of music—i.e., of the bars, notes, and other printed words and signs on those sheets. But the plaintiffs have no exclusive right to the production of the sounds indicated by or on those sheets of music; nor to the performance in private of the music indicated by such sheets; nor to any mechanism for the production of such sounds or music.

The plaintiffs' rights are not infringed, except by an unauthorized copy of their sheets of music. We need not trouble ourselves about authority; no question turning on the meaning of that expression has to be considered in this case. The only question we have to consider is whether the defendants have copied the plaintiffs' sheets of music.

The defendants have taken those sheets of music and have prepared from them sheets of paper with perforations in them; and these perforated sheets, when put into and used with properly-constructed machines or instruments, will produce, or enable the machines or instruments to produce, the music indicated on the plaintiffs' sheets. In this sense the defendants' perforated rolls have been copied from the plaintiffs' sheets. But is this the kind of copying which is prohibited by the Copyright Act? or, rather, is the perforated sheet made as above mentioned a copy of the sheet of music from which it is made? Is it a copy at all? Is it a copy within the meaning of the Copyright Act?

A sheet of music is treated in the Copyright Act as if it were a book or sheet of letterpress. Any mode of copying such a thing, whether by printing, writing, photography, or by some other method not yet invented, would, no doubt, be copying. So, perhaps, might a perforated sheet of paper to be sung or played from in the same way as sheets of music are sung or played from. But to play an instrument from a sheet of music which appeals to the eye is one thing; to play an instrument with a perforated sheet which itself forms part of the mechanism which produces the music is quite another thing. I have consulted Johnson's, Richardson's, and Murray's Dictionaries to ascertain the meanings attributed to the word copy, and I do not myself think that the perforated sheet can be said to be a copy of the sheet of music unless the word copy is used in a very loose and inaccurate sense. Be this as it may, I cannot think, or bring myself to decide, that the perforated sheet is a copy of a sheet of music within the meaning of the Copyright Act. The fundamental ideas underlying them are different, and the uses to be made of them are fundamentally different. Music appeals to the ear, but a sheet of music appeals to the eye, and the observation of Bayley, J., in West v. Francis, 5 B. & Ald. 737, is applicable not only to engravings but to all kinds of books, and the Copyright Act treats a sheet of music as it treats a book. He said: "A copy is that which comes so near to the original as to give to every person seeing it the idea created by the original." I do not say that the defendants' perforated rolls cannot possibly be regarded as sheets of music. They may possibly be so regarded by specially skilled persons who have learned to read the perforations. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that a person might be trained to play or even to sing from the perforated sheets, it is clear that they are not made to be so used, nor are they ever so used in fact; and we ought, in my opinion, to deal with the case on broad business lines, and not on unpractical, although theoretically possible, assumptions.

If these perforated rolls were new it appears to me that their invention might be patented; and this could not, in my opinion, be said of any copy of any book.

It may be true that the manufacture and sale of the perforated sheets diminish the sale of the plaintiffs' sheets of music. But it does not follow that the plaintiffs' copyright has been infringed; and I am of opinion that it has not.

I regard the defendants' perforated sheets as part of a mechanical contrivance for producing musical notes, and I cannot think that manufacturers of musical instruments infringe any person's copyright by so constructing their instruments and appliances to be used with them as to produce musical notes indicated on a sheet of music.

On this broad and very important question, which, so far as I know, has never been raised before in this country, I am of opinion that the decision of Stirling, J., is correct.

There is, however, another, but comparatively subordinate, question on which I am unable to agree with him. He has restrained the defendants from copying the directions on the plaintiffs' sheets of music to the person using them.

The defendants' appeal from this part of the judgment ought, in my opinion, to succeed. The directions on the plaintiffs' sheets of music are no doubt protected by their copyright so long as they are used in connection with the plaintiffs' musical score. But apart from those scores the plaintiffs have no copyright in such directions. The directions are not themselves a sheet of music, nor are they a sheet of letterpress separately published. Even if they were they would be mere words, not sentences forming a literary composition in which copyright could be acquired. Upon this point the case is governed by Hollinrake v. Truswell, and the injunction granted by Stirling, J., to restrain the use of these directions must be discharged.

The net result is that the plaintiffs' action wholly fails. Their appeal must be dismissed and the defendants' appeal be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree in thinking that the appeal of the plaintiffs should be dismissed. As the question involved is one of some importance I desire to add a few remarks. The rights under the Copyright Act of an author of a piece of music are: (1) To prevent others from copying the published music regarded as a book; (2) to prevent the music itself being performed in public without the author's permission. But anyone may perform the music in private by voice, musical instrument in the ordinary sense, such as violins, piano, and so forth, or by any mechanical instrument. Seeing that mechanical instruments for producing musical sounds were well known at the date of the Act, I think that the Legislature never contemplated that the author's right to multiply copies of published music would entitle him to stop the use in private of such an instrument because it performed the published music. Of course I am now speaking of mechanical musical instruments known at the date of the Act. But those instruments were numerous and included, for instance, musical boxes. The Act, to my mind, never contemplated that the cylinder of a musical box, taking that as one of the best known mechanical instruments, could be regarded as a copy of the printed music, even though an accomplished musician might be able by inspection of the cylinder to gather from it the notes of the music. Now in the case before us, the sheets which are said to be copies of the plaintiffs' published sheets of music were issued only for the purpose of being used as parts of a mechanical musical instrument to produce musical sounds. And as a matter of substance the defendants' sheets have in fact only been used by those to whom they were issued for the sole purpose for which they were in fact issued. But it is said they could be used so as to answer the same purpose as copies of the plaintiffs' printed music, and that therefore they ought to be regarded as copies within the Act. To my mind it does not of necessity follow that because a thing might be so used as to answer the same purpose as the copy of a book, it must be regarded as a copy within the Act. But, passing that by, I deal with the question before us as one of substance, and I ask myself whether in substance and in any practical view the defendants' sheets could be used so as to answer the purpose of copies of the plaintiffs' musical sheets. On the evidence in the case I agree with Stirling, J., that this question must be answered in the negative. I think that that really disposes of the appeal. In no practical or substantial view, in my opinion, can the defendants' sheets be regarded as copies within the meaning of the Act of the plaintiffs' sheets of music regarded as books. And I may add, at the risk of repeating what I have already said, that the plaintiffs' sheets and the defendants' sheets are issued and used for substantially different objects. The plaintiffs' sheets are issued and used as books to be read. The defendants' sheets are issued and used, not as books to be read, but as parts of a mechanical musical instrument to produce the sounds of music.

On the defendants' appeal, which raises a question of comparatively little importance, although I have felt some doubt about it, especially having regard to the views of Stirling, J., I come, on the whole, to the same conclusion as the Master of the Rolls. I think that no substantial part of the plaintiffs' book—that is, of their printed musical sheets has been copied by the defendants'. So far as words have been taken from the plaintiffs' book and put in the defendants' sheets, they have no use or connected meaning by themselves, and are only of use as regards the defendants' sheets, in any practical point of view, as directions for working the defendants' mechanical instrument to produce musical sound. I therefore agree in thinking that the plaintiffs' action ought to stand dismissed with costs here and below.

A stevedore's labourer was injured by an accident in the course of his employment. At the time of the accident he was on board a ship lying in a dock, and was engaged in loading the ship from a lighter by means of a steam winch which was attached to the ship. No shore machinery was being used.

Held, that the steam winch was not constituted a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by virtue of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895; for it was not being used in the process of loading from a dock.

Appeal from an award of the judge of the Bow County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was a stevedore's labourer, and the employer was a master stevedore. The applicant sustained accidental injuries while he was in the course of his employment on board a vessel which was lying in Victoria Docks. At the time of the accident the applicant was engaged in loading the vessel with cargo from a lighter, which was lying alongside, by means of a steam winch, which was attached to the vessel. No shore machinery was being used.

The question was whether the employment in which the applicant was engaged was employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applied.

The county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant.

The employer appealed.

Ruegg, Q.C., and Roskill, for the employer.—This was not an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies. By section 7, sub-section 1, the Act applies to employment in a factory; and by sub-section 2, "factory" includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. By section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, certain specified provisions of the Factory Acts "shall have effect as if (a) every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process, and (b) any premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power, is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connection with a building, were included in the word factory, and the purpose for which the machinery is used were a manufacturing process, and as if the person who by himself, his agents or workmen, temporarily uses any such machinery for the before-mentioned purpose were the occupier of the said premises; and for the purpose of the enforcement of those sections the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or of any premises within the same or forming part thereof, and the person so using any such machinery shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory." The word "factory" therefore includes two classes of machinery — viz., machinery used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, and machinery worked by steam for the purpose of building. And the person using machinery of either of these two classes is to be deemed to be the occupier of a factory. McNicholas v. Dawson & Sons, 47 W. R. 500, [1899] 1 Q. B. 773, is an instance of the second class of machinery, but that case does not touch the present, for this is not a case of machinery used for building. The applicant, in order to make out his claim, must show that this steam winch was machinery used in the process of loading from a dock or unloading to a dock. The facts, however, show that the machinery was being used for loading from a lighter. The county court judge thought that Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Co., 47 W. R. 105, [1899] 1 Q. B. 15, governed this case. But in that case cargo was being unloaded by means of a crane on a quay, and the decision of the court was that the Act applied because the employment was on or about machinery used in the process of unloading to a quay.

They also referred to Flowers v. Chambers, 47 W. R. 513, [1899] 2 Q. B. 142; Hall v. Snowdon, Hubbard, & Co., 47 W. R. 486, [1899] 2 Q. B. 136; and Durrie v. Warren & Co., 15 Times L. R. 365.

Montague Lush, for the applicant.—This case comes within section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. The steam winch was used in the process of loading from the dock. The section contemplates loading to or unloading from a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. Some meaning must be given to the word "dock"; and the only way in which cargo can be loaded from a dock, in contradistinction to a wharf or quay, is by means of a lighter. The word "dock" in this section clearly means the water. The decision in Flowers v. Chambers, that a ship lying in a dock is not a dock, must be accepted. But loading from a lighter lying in a dock is loading from the dock. The lighter, though not part of the dock, is part of the plant used for the operation of loading from the dock. If cargo were taken on board a ship from a cart standing on a quay, although the cart would not be the quay, the cargo would be none the less loaded from the quay.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The point raised in this case is whether a steam winch on board a ship lying in a dock, which steam winch is used for taking in cargo from a lighter lying alongside, is a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. To determine this we have to consider the incorporation into the Workmen's Compensation Act of provisions in the Factory Acts defining what constitutes a factory. No case that we have yet decided covers this point. In Flowers v. Chambers we held that employment on a ship lying in a dock is not employment in a dock. In Durrie v. Warren & Co. we went a long way in the direction in which we are going to-day.

Section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act says that the Act shall apply to employment in, on, or about a factory. Then sub-section 2 says that "factory" shall include any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. That brings us to section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. This section deals with certain provisions of the Factory Acts, which it arranges in five groups, and numbers (i.), (ii.), (iii.), (iv.), and (v.). These provisions applied to factories, and to factories only. Section 23 extends their application and says that they are to have effect as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading and unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process were included in the word "factory." The point is whether the steam winch used in this case was machinery used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, within the meaning of that section. The cargo in this case was being loaded into a ship from a lighter. The winch was not used in the process of loading cargo from a wharf, quay, or warehouse, but in the process of loading cargo from one ship into another ship. It is said it was used in the process of loading from a dock. But I think it would be straining the section beyond reasonable bounds to hold that a steam winch on board a ship used for loading cargo from a lighter was machinery used in the process of loading from a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. In my opinion the case does not come within the Act.

COLLINS, L.J.—In this case I have felt some doubt as to whether we ought not to give weight to the argument of the learned counsel for the applicant, which appears to me to be logical. But I think we shall probably be right in interpreting "dock" in section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, in its ordinary sense—that is, as the place which embraces the land bounding the water as well as the water itself. When the Legislature speaks of loading to or from a dock, I think that it does not contemplate a loading from one ship lying in a dock to another, but that it contemplates a process which involves some use of a wharf or quay or other constituents of the dock. I agree that this construction renders certain words in the section nugatory; for the section speaks of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto—that is, from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, so that it seems to put wharf and quay in contradistinction to dock. But I think that the words "loading from a dock" mean what nine out of ten ordinary persons would say they mean—viz., a loading which involves some use of the boundaries or edges of the dock. The point is whether the machinery used in this case can be brought within the word "factory." The applicant has to find some section in the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, which makes it a factory by applying to it any of the provisions of the Factory Acts. He relies on section 23. But that section only applies to machinery in certain circumstances, which do not include the circumstances of this case, unless it can be shown that this machinery was used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse; and it seems to me that that cannot be shown.

JONES v. BIERNSTEIN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Distress—Goods impounded on premises—Possession—Pound breach—Abandonment—Distress for Rent Act, 1737 (11 Geo. 2, c. 19), s. 10 —Practice—Leave to appeal to Court of Appeal on one point—Argument limited.

Where a landlord, in distraining for rent, has, under section 10 of the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, impounded goods on the premises, it is not necessary that anyone on his behalf should remain in possession of the goods.

Where leave to appeal on one point has been given by the Divisional Court, the Court of Appeal will not allow appellant to argue other points which had been raised in the county court and in the Divisional Court.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Lawrence and Channel, JJ.) 47 W. R. 239, affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.), 47 W. R. 239, on an appeal from the Southwark County Court. The action was for pound breach. The plaintiff levied a distress for arrears of rent upon certain premises which he owned and which he had let at a yearly rent to one Morrisey.

A man, Kay, was put into possession of the goods upon the premises. A large quantity of the goods belonged to the defendant Biernstein, a furniture dealer on the hire system, who had let them to Morrisey. Kay went home every night, returning the following morning. On Saturday, the 16th of July, he left the premises at 8.30 p.m. and returned at 8 a.m. on the following Monday. Shortly after his departure the defendant removed the goods from the premises. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action in the county court for pound breach, claiming treble damages under 2 Will. & M. c. 5.

The county court judge found that Kay abandoned possession of the goods, there being no reasonable necessity for his absence, but that he did not abandon the distress, and upon these findings he gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that real possession was required, allowing for absences reasonable.

Upon appeal to the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) it was held that where goods have been impounded under section 10 of the Distress for Rent Act, 1737, it is not necessary that anyone on behalf of the landlord should be left in actual possession of them, and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

Leave to appeal was given on the point of pound breach, the court stating that their judgment proceeded on the facts as found by the county court judge, and that it must not be assumed that the case raised any question of general importance.

Defendant now appealed.

Schwabe, for the appellant.—Two points were raised in the county court—firstly, that there had been no pound breach; and, secondly, that there had been an abandonment of possession. There had been no actual impounding here. Nothing had been done to show that the goods were impounded. They had not been collected and locked up. All that was done was to make an inventory and put a man in possession. This man left the premises every evening, returning in the morning. When he left the premises the goods were then neither "impounded" nor "otherwise secured by the Act" (Distress for Rent Act, 1737, s. 10). The county court judge was wrong in holding that there was an impounding. The point was taken in the court below, and the learned judges there were wrong in not entertaining it, and the point was admissible in argument in this court. [A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Leave to appeal was given on one point only—namely, as to whether there had been a pound breach, and counsel can be heard on that point only.] When the impounding is done on the premises it is necessary that the man in possession remain on the premises. If he leaves he must show some real necessity to do so, otherwise there is an abandonment of possession: Bagshawes (Limited) v. Deacon, 46 W. R. 618, [1898] 2 Q. B. 173; Bannister v. Hyde, 2 E. & E. 627, 8 W. R.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. L. Dig. 26; Swann v. Falmouth (Earl), 8 B. & C. 456.

J. D. Crawford, for the respondent, was not called on.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The only point we have to determine is that which was determined by the judgment of the Divisional Court, and as to which leave to appeal was alone given. The county court judge found as a fact that an actual impounding of the goods had been made, and the judgment now appealed from proceeded on that basis. The only question before us, therefore, is whether in a case when the landlord has impounded goods on the premises it is necessary that a man should remain in possession of the goods. Where goods are in an actual pound it is admitted that it is not necessary that anyone should remain in possession. It seems perfectly clear to me that where, as in this case, the goods have been impounded, they are in custodia legis, and there is no necessity for anyone to remain in possession of them. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question before us is whether, the goods having been impounded—for both the learned judges in the court below gave their judgment on the basis that the county court judge had found as a fact that there had been an impounding—it is necessary that someone should always remain in possession. I clearly think that it is not necessary, and that the learned judges in the Divisional Court were quite right in so holding.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree that, if we are limited in this case to the point upon which the judges in the Divisional Court gave leave to appeal, there is really nothing to be argued. The very statement of the point excludes all argument upon it. Speaking for myself I cannot say that the consequent result is entirely satisfactory. If one looks at the notes of the county court judge in this case, it is quite clear that the point as to which leave to appeal to this court was given by the Divisional Court was not the real point raised. Force of circumstances prevent us from considering that point, and all I can say is that I am sorry that that is so.

Chan. Div. } Stirling, J. } Jan. 11, 17.

STEWART v. RHODES. (a.)

Practice—Charging order nisi under R. S. C., ord. 42, r. 23—Death of judgment debtor—Liability of estate.

A charging order nisi made under R. S. C., ord. 42, r. 23, against the interest of a deceased judgment debtor, is not valid as against his executor, and cannot be made absolute.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application arising upon a summons to cross-examine in an action transferred from the Queen's Bench Division, the summons having been adjourned by Stirling, J., into court on the preliminary point raised by the defendant that a charging order nisi could not be made absolute in the following circumstances.

The action was commenced in the Queen's Bench Division, and by the writ the plaintiffs, who were the assignees of the uncalled capital of and trustees for the debenture-holders of the Lands Trust Co. (Limited) claimed a sum of £959 11s. 9d. due in respect of 500 shares standing in the name of the defendant Rhodes.

On the 30th of January, 1899, the defendant having appeared, an order was obtained giving leave to sign judgment in accordance with order 14, and costs were taxed and allowed.

On the 27th of March the defendant died.

On the 9th of June his will was proved by his executor, one Wilford, who thus became his legal personal representative.

On the 16th of June an action in Chancery was begun by a secured creditor of Rhodes seeking to enforce his security, and to get general administration; on the same day an order was made in lunacy (the defendant Rhodes having been a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition) to the effect that enough of a fund in court of £743 8s. 7d. New Consols standing to the credit of the defendant in connection with certain lunacy proceedings against him in his lifetime should be realized to pay the costs when taxed, the residue to be transferred to Wilford.

On the 17th of June the charging order nisi was made in chambers, the validity of which was the subject of the present application; thereby it was ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to issue execution against Wilford, the executor of the defendant judgment debtor, under ord. 42, r. 23, and that unless sufficient cause were shown to the contrary on the 28th of June the defendant's interest in the said sum of New Consols should, and that it in the meantime did, stand charged with the payment of the sum due on the judgment.

On the 22nd of June judgment for the administration of Rhodes' estate was pronounced in the Chancery action.

On the 26th of June the present action was transferred from the Queen's Bench Division to Stirling, J. The preliminary objection was then taken that there was no power under the statutes to make an order after the death of the judgment debtor charging the interest of the debtor in property, with the debt.

Jenkins, Q.C. (Whinney with him), for the applicants, the plaintiffs in the action.—The executor ought to be treated as the judgment debtor as he takes all the rights and liabilities of the deceased, against whose estate the plaintiffs have leave to levy execution. The order here made is the same in substance as that in Haly v. Barry, 16 W. R. 654, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 452. Brereton v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 47, 21 Q. B. D. 226, 488, is also relied on. Finney v. Hinde, 27 W. R. 413, 4 Q. B. D. 102, is distinguishable and is not to be pushed to cover facts which do not exactly coincide.

Harman, for the executor.—The rule is that a charging order only operates as a charge by the debtor; here he was dead, and an order in lunacy had dealt the day before with the very fund: Dixon v. Wrench, 17 W. R. 591, L. R. 4 Ex. 154; Gill v. Continental Union Gas Co., 21 W. R. 111, L. R. 7 Ex. 332; Finney v. Hinde; In re Leavesley, 39 W. R. 276, [1891] 2 Ch. 1. Haly v. Barry is distinguishable. [STIRLING, J.—Cannot I amend the order?] No; for an administration has been decreed meanwhile. [STIRLING, J.—The question is whether ord. 42, r. 23, is equivalent to making the legal personal representative a defendant. Jenkins, Q.C., referred to form No. 20 in the Annual Practice, vol. 2, p. 1027 in the Appendix Tables.] That does not apply to a charging order: Brereton v. Edwards, per Lindley, L.J., at p. 497 of 21 Q. B. D.

E. S. Ford (Upjohn, Q.C., with him), for another respondent, the liquidator of the company above referred to.—This order has been wrongly made; as this court has not the jurisdiction to do what would be equitable here—viz., to amend the order, then the proceedings should be commenced de novo. This court will not assist one creditor over another: In re Cave, W. N. (1892), p. 142; Wallace v. McCann, [1842] 4 Ir. Eq. 522; Finney v. Hinde.

Jenkins, Q.C., in reply.—In Haly v. Barry the interest of the dead man was put in as description; Finney v. Hinde, when read with that case, has no application to the present case.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: The objection which is taken to the order is that there is no power under the statutes to make an order after the death of the defendant charging his interest with this debt. On this point I have to pay regard to previous decisions, and particularly to two cases, both of which are binding on me—viz., Haly v. Barry, a decision of the Court of Appeal, and Finney v. Hinde, a decision of the Divisional Court. I shall best deal with them in order of date. [His lordship having read the facts in Haly v. Barry and the material parts of the order made in that case, continued:] In order to appreciate the effect of that we must look at the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76). [His lordship referred to sections 129 and 130 and to Form 8 in Schedule A.] The result is that the plaintiff is to have execution against the defendant's legal personal representative as such. The question of the validity of the order nisi does not appear to have been much argued in Haly v. Barry, but certainly there are expressions of opinion in the judgments of the Lords Justices which seem to show that they regarded the order as valid. The other case to which I was referred is that of Finney v. Hinde. There at the date when the order nisi was obtained the judgment debtor was dead and cause was shown on behalf of his widow, the executrix of his will, but a caveat was entered against the proof of the will. It was objected that as in the case of an ordinary execution by fieri facias it would be necessary upon the death of the judgment debtor in order to obtain execution, to apply for leave to enter a suggestion on the roll according to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 129, and that a charging order could not be made absolute until such a suggestion had been entered in the action or until the plaintiff had applied under ord. 42, r. 19, for leave to issue execution against the defendant's representative; but Field, J., thought that as the defendant's representative had appeared to show cause, it was unnecessary to apply for leave to proceed against her, and he made the order absolute. On the appeal, it was argued for the executrix that the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, gave no power to make the order. The charging order was to be made absolute unless the judgment debtor showed cause to the contrary and after proof of notice of the order nisi to the judgment debtor. There was, it was said, no mention of executors or representatives of the judgment debtor, and the debtor being dead it was impossible that the requisite conditions should be fulfilled. In opposition to that various arguments were adduced, and the case of Haly v. Barry was cited. [His lordship read from the judgments delivered by Cockburn, C.J., and Pollock, B.] So that where a proceeding has not been taken equivalent to the application to enter a suggestion on the record as provided by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, the charging order cannot be made. I am bound by both these cases, and I must reconcile them if I can. The only view, as it seems to me, in which they can be reconciled is this: The effect of them is that there is no power after the death of the original judgment debtor to make a charging order on his interest, but that there is power to make a charging order on the interest of the executor after an order giving liberty to issue execution against the executor has been made. I take it that in the latter case the executor becomes the judgment debtor within the meaning of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14. In the present case what has been done? It is ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to issue execution against the executor of the defendant, but the order continues that the defendant's interest in the said sum of New Consols shall stand charged with the payment of the amount due under the judgment. The charge is created, not on the interest of the executor, as was the form in Haly v. Barry, but on the interest of the defendant. It seems to me plain upon the construction of the order that by the defendant is meant John Rhodes, and, indeed, he is treated in the order not only as defendant but as judgment debtor, because the recital is that there is standing to the credit of the said John Rhodes, the judgment debtor, a person of unsound mind, the sum, &c. Is that a valid order? It seems to me, upon the authority of Finney v. Hinde, that it is not. There is no authority to charge the interest of a defendant after his death, and in point of fact what was his interest at the time of his death had ceased to be such by the order of the preceding day. It is said that this charging order ought to be construed liberally, and that I ought to say that the interest of the defendant means such interest as is now vested in his legal personal representative. But the rules applicable to the construction of wills are not applicable to the construction of orders of the court, which are formal documents, and must be taken to have the legal meaning attributable to them, according to a well-known principle acted on in many cases. In particular I remember a case of Freke v. Carbery, which is not reported upon the point for which I am citing it. In that case the right of a tenant for life to cut timber was considered, and the matter came before Lord Selborne, who was sitting for the Master of the Rolls (Lord Romilly). He made a declaration that the tenant for life was not entitled to cut timber. Afterwards the question arose whether the tenant for life was entitled to cut timber for the purpose of repairs, which is the ordinary right of a tenant for life. The question came before Jessel, M.R., who held that he was bound by the form of the previous order, though there was plainly a slip, and that the tenant for life had no right to cut timber for any purpose. The matter was then taken to the Court of Appeal, and the decision of Jessel, M.R., was affirmed. Therefore I cannot hold on this order that by the interest of the defendant is meant the interest which has become vested in the executor. Then it is said that this is a slip which ought to be put right. It is very probable, or at least it is possible, that if the attention of the master who made this order had been drawn to the point, the order would have been made in the same form as the order in Haly v. Barry. But it was not. Now, the provision which is applicable is rule 11 of order 28, which empowers the court to correct "clerical mistakes in judgments or orders or errors arising therein from any accidental slip or omission" on motion of summons. The effect of that rule has been considered by the House of Lords in Hatton v. Harris, [1892] A. C. 547, 41 W. R. Dig. 162, where the power was exercised. Lord Watson states in a sentence the effect of it. He says, at p. 560: "Where an error has been committed it is always within the competency of the court, if nothing has intervened which would render it inexpedient or inequitable to do so, to correct the record in order to bring it into harmony with the order which the judge obviously meant to pronounce. The correction ought to be made upon motion to that effect and is not matter either for appeal or rehearing." No motion has been made to that effect here, but I think that I should express my opinion so far as I can upon the materials before me as to what would be the result of such an application. It seems to me that this case falls within the exception mentioned by Lord Watson and that something has happened which would render it inequitable to correct this order, because on the 22nd of June judgment for the administration of the debtor's estate was pronounced and the effect of that is to give the general creditors the right to have the property of the deceased applied in payment of their debts pari passu. I think, therefore, that this order is bad.

BARBER v. MEXICAN LAND AND COLONIZATION CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice — Jurisdiction — Private international law — Authority of American judgment creditor to sue in English court—Californian Code.

Where an American court had made an order authorizing a person who had recovered judgment in that court against an American company to bring actions against an English company "in any and all proper courts, in his own name, or in the name of the said American company,"

Held, that the jurisdiction of the American court was limited to the exact scope of the Californian Code conferring it, and that, in an action brought by the said person in an English court, he was not properly authorized to sue, and could not sue, in the name of the said American company.

This was a summons on behalf of the International Co. of Mexico, one of the plaintiffs, that the writ and subsequent proceedings in the action might be amended by striking out the name of that company as plaintiffs, on the ground that such name had been used without due authority. It raised a question as to the jurisdiction of an American court to make an order authorizing a person who had recovered judgment in that court against an American company to bring an action in the name of that company in this country against an English company.

The plaintiff company was incorporated under and in accordance with the laws of the State of Connecticut, U.S.A.

The defendant company was an English company registered under the Companies Act 1862.

By an agreement in writing dated the 4th of May, 1889, made between the plaintiff company of the one part and the defendant company of the other part, the plaintiff company agreed to sell and transfer all the property and undertaking of the plaintiff company to the defendant company; and the defendant company thereby undertook to pay and satisfy all the obligations, debts, engagements, and liabilities of the plaintiff company, and to indemnify the plaintiff company in respect thereof.

On the 10th of June, 1889, one F. E. Bates commenced an action in California against the plaintiff company, to which the plaintiff company duly appeared; and on the 29th of November, 1892, Bates recovered judgment in that action for a sum equivalent in English money to £24,751, which still remained unsatisfied.

On the 12th of December, 1892, Bates assigned to the plaintiff Barber his judgment and all sums to be recovered in respect thereof.

On the 16th of March, 1896, in certain proceedings in the Californian court, an order was made whereby Barber was "authorized and empowered to institute any and all necessary and proper action or actions against the said Mexican Land and Colonization Co. (Limited), in any and all proper courts, in his own name, or in the name of the said American company to his use, for enforcement of the said agreement of the 4th of May, 1889, and the recovery of the said judgment and the moneys due, and to become due on the said judgment and claim"; and the order further appointed Barber receiver of the International Company of Mexico, with full power to bring all actions and take all proceedings necessary and proper for the collection of the said judgment.

The writ in the present action was issued on the 15th of June, 1896, Barber and the International Company of Mexico being the plaintiffs, and the Mexican Land and Colonization Co. being the sole defendant.

The statement of claim was delivered on the 23rd of June, 1896, and thereby the plaintiffs claimed specific performance by the defendant company of the agreement of the 4th of May, 1889, so far as might be necessary to enforce payment by the defendant company to the plaintiff Barber of his judgment debt; payment of the debt with interest, and damages for breach of the agreement.

On the 12th of March, 1897, the plaintiff company gave notice of motion in the American action for an order vacating and setting aside the order of the 16th of March, 1896, on certain grounds, inter alia, that the court had no jurisdiction to make it.

On the 12th of January, 1898, the motion was refused and no further proceedings had been taken in the American action.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the plaintiff company.—The American court had no power under American law to allow an execution creditor to do acts to levy execution here; the order is no better than if a sheriff had come over here to enforce execution. We rely on the provisions of the Californian Code, ss. 564, 714, 717, 720, to which we say a strict construction should be given; an order of this kind, being ancillary to execution, can only be good in the jurisdiction in which it was granted. Also, it is an interlocutory order and is modifiable, whereas this court will only deal with foreign judgments when they are final: Nouvion v. Freeman, 38 W. R. 581, 15 App. Cas. 1. The conduct of Bates amounts to maintenance: Bradlaugh v. Newdegate, 31 W. R. 792, 11 Q. B. D. 1; Guy v. Churchill, 37 W. R. 504, 40 Ch. D. 481.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for Barber.—We rely on the words used in the order, which is quite general; the whole matter was before the American judge who had jurisdiction to make the unlimited order which he did. The case is not really one of execution here, but one in which the court here is asked to appoint a receiver for abroad: see Seton, vol. 1, p. 381.

STIRLING, J., in giving judgment, said that on the facts it must be taken that the order of the 16th of March, 1896, was properly made, and it was on that that the plaintiff Barber relied in opposition to the summons. The order, however, did not in terms empower the plaintiff Barber to bring an action in the name of the plaintiff company in an English court; and the contention of the plaintiff company was that if a construction were placed on the order which would so authorize the plaintiff Barber, then it was not within the powers of the court in California, and that a more limited meaning ought to be given to it. In support of that contention reliance was mainly placed on the reasons given by the learned judge who made the order in the judgment delivered by him on the application of the plaintiff company to set it aside. The learned judge then relied upon sections 714 and 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California as conferring on him authority to make the order of the 16th of March, 1896. Those sections fell under the Title IX. of the code, "On the Execution of the Judgment in Civil Actions." That title was divided into two chapters —(1) "The Execution," (2) "Proceedings Supplemental to Exection." Sections 714 and 720 were found in the second chapter. An examination of those two chapters showed that (as might be expected) they contained provisions as to the mode of obtaining execution of a civil judgment through courts and officers of courts whose proceedings were regulated by the code—that was to say, the courts of the State of California, the district courts of the United States of America having jurisdiction within the State of California, and possibly other courts of the United States or of the individual States. It seems to me that section 720, when carefully considered, applied only to such courts. The concuding sentence: "Such order may be modified or vacated by the judge granting the same or the court in which the action is brought, at any time, upon such terms as may be just," appeared to show that the section was to be read with such a limitation as I have indicated. If that were so, then the order of the 16th of March, 1896, would be perfectly valid and operative in all American courts whose proceedings were regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure of California; and it ought not to receive such a construction as would give it an effect beyond that authorized by the very enactment in pursuance of which it was made. I think, therefore, that the "proper courts" mentioned in the order ought to be read as meaning courts in respect of which the courts of California could properly make the order, and not as including the English courts. It was to be observed that the learned judge nowhere stated that he had power to authorize the plaintiff Barber to sue in the name of the plaintiff company in an English court; indeed, his language appeared to indicate that he at least entertained doubts on the subject. [His lordship then referred to the opinions of several American lawyers, and, continued.] It was not contended that the plaintiff Barber could, according to the practice of the English courts, maintain this action in his capacity as receiver. If effect were given to the contention on behalf of Barber remarkable results might follow. In my opinion an order ought to be made in accordance with the summons.

JOHN BROTHERS (ABERGARW, BREWERY) v. HOLMES. (a.)

Mortgage—Covenant—"Tied" public-house—Collateral security for mortgage—Omission of "successors"—Assign and sub-lessee—Superior title.

J. J., the owner of a public-house, mortgaged it, subject to a prior mortgage to J. T., to M. J. and W. J., trading together as "J. Brothers" as brewers and wine merchants. By an indenture of even date with this second mortgage, J. J. covenanted with the said M. J. and W. J., "trading in co-partnership as 'J. Brothers,'" and thereinafter "styled as 'J. Brothers,'" that he, the said J. J., his executors, administrators, and assigns, for so long as he or they should continue in possession of the said public-house, would purchase their beer and spirits from the said "J. Brothers." Subsequently J. J. and J. T. united in granting a sub-lease to H., who had at the time notice of the said covenant; and the business of "J. Brothers," together with the mortgage to them already mentioned, was transferred to the A. Brewery Co.

Held, that the covenant and the mortgage to "J. Brothers" must be read together, and that H. was bound to purchase his beer from the A. Brewery Co., notwithstanding the fact that "J. Brothers" had technically ceased to exist and that H. was not bound by the actual words of the covenant to purchase his beer from their "successors."

Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 44 Ch. D. 503, and similar cases, distinguished.

Held, that "assign" does not necessarily exclude "sub-lessee," and that the fact that H. was not the "assign," but the "sub-lessee," of J. J. did not relieve him from liability on the covenant, with notice of which he was affected.

Bryant v. Hancock, 46 W. R. 386, [1898] 1 Q. B. 716, [1899] A. C. 442, distinguished.

Held, that H. was bound to claim under his superior title; and that he must accordingly be considered, in the eye of the law, to derive his title, not from J. T., but from J. J.

Trial of action.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 24th of September, 1891, John Jenkins assigned to certain mortgagees therein mentioned certain leasehold premises called the Tondu Arms Hotel, at Tondu, in the county of Glamorgan, for the residue of a term of eighty years from the 30th of June, 1865 (less the last ten days thereof), in order to secure the repayment of the sum of £1,000 with interest thereon. By a second indenture of mortgage also dated the 24th of September, 1891 (but expressed to be made subject to the first indenture of mortgage abovementioned), the said John Jenkins assigned the Tondu Arms Hotel for the residue of the said term of eighty years (less the last ten days thereof) to Morgan John and William John (trading in co-partnership as John Brothers as brewers and wine merchants) in order to secure the repayment of the sum of £550 with interest thereon. The said sum of £550 was expressed in the said indenture to be advanced by the said John Brothers out of the partnership account. By a deed of covenant, also dated the 24th of September, 1891, the said John Jenkins in consideration of the advance to him of the said sum of £550 covenanted with the said Morgan John and William John, "trading in co-partnership as John Brothers," and thereinafter "styled as John Brothers," their executors, administrators, and assigns, that he, the said John Jenkins, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for so long as he or they should continue in possession of the Tondu Arms Hotel, did thereby bind the said hotel to the said John Brothers for an entire supply for consumption of certain beers at certain prices therein particularly mentioned.

Prior to the 22nd of September, 1896, the mortgage security for £1,000, above mentioned, became vested in a manner which did not appear at the hearing of the action in a certain John Thomas; and the leasehold interest in the Tondu Arms Hotel also became vested (subject to the two above-mentioned indentures of mortgage) in a certain Evan Thomas. By an indenture of underlease, dated the 22nd of September, 1896, the said John Thomas "demised," and the said Evan Thomas (therein described as the "lessor") "demised and confirmed" the Tondu Arms Hotel to the defendant for the term of nine years from the 22nd of September, 1896. It was not denied that the defendant had notice at the time of his taking his underlease of the deed of covenant of the 24th of September, 1891. The plaintiff company was incorporated on the 20th of June, 1895, and by an indenture of the same date the mortgage security for £550, already mentioned, was transferred to the plaintiff company. The defendant continued to purchase his beer from the plaintiff company till November, 1898, but subsequently ceased to do so. On the 22nd of March, 1899, due notice was given to the plaintiff company, on behalf of the defendant, of an intention to pay off the said mortgage debt of £550. On the 27th of April, 1899, the plaintiff company commenced the present action to restrain the defendant from selling beer at the Tondu Arms Hotel other than that supplied to him by the plaintiff company. By his defence, delivered on the 14th of July, 1899, the defendant pleaded (inter alia) that he was ready and willing to pay off the said mortgage debt of £550. On the 22nd of September, 1899, the sum of £550 was duly tendered by Evan Thomas to the plaintiff company on behalf of the defendant, and refused by them. No action for redemption had been commenced on behalf of the defendant.

Warrington, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the plaintiff company.—The benefit of the covenant of the 24th of September, 1891, passed to the plaintiff company on the transference to them of the mortgage for £550 on the 20th of June, 1895. The covenant is to subsist so long as Jenkins or his assigns shall continue in possession of the premises, and the defendant is an assign of Jenkins. The defendant had notice of the covenant, and is bound by the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phillips 774.

P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and S. T. Evans, for the defendant.—(1) The defendant is bound (if at all) to buy his beer from "John Brothers," not from their "successors"; and "John Brothers" have ceased to exist: Clegg v. Hands, 38 W. R. 433, 44 Ch. D. 503; White v. Southend Hotel Co., 45 W. R. 434, [1897] 1 Ch. 767; Doe d. Calvert v. Reid, 10 B. & C. 849. (2) The defendant is not an "assign" within the meaning of the covenant, because (a) he is a "sub-lessee," and "sub-lessee" is not included in "assign." He is not therefore bound, even though he take with notice: Bryant v. Hancock, 46 W. R. 386, [1898] 1 Q. B. 716, [1899] A. C. 442. (b) John Thomas is the prior mortgagee, and the mortgage to John Brothers is expressly subject to the mortgage to him. In the sub-lease of the 22nd of September, 1896, John Thomas is expressed to demise to the defendant; the defendant is therefore "in" by the prior estate, and his tenancy is not subject in any point to the mortgage for £550 or to the covenant of the 24th of September, 1891. The question is one of intention; and the intention that the defendant should be "in" by the prior estate is evidenced by the fact that John Thomas, the mortgagee, has been expressly made a party: Roache v. Wadham, 6 East 289. (3) The £550 was tendered to the plaintiff company on the 22nd of September, 1899. After their refusal to accept it they cannot now ask for an injunction.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—(1) As to the question of the omission of "successors," none of the cases cited are in point. In all those cases the question was one between lessor and lessee. Here the covenant must be read as part of the mortgage itself, and its benefit must be taken to pass to the persons who from time to time are entitled to the benefit of the mortgage. (2) (a) Hall v. Ewin, 36 W. R. 84, 37 Ch. D. 74, shows that a sub-lessee in possession with notice is bound, not less than an assign, by the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay; (b) Evan Thomas is called the lessor, and a mortgagee not in possession is incapable under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, of granting a valid lease. The defendant's title is derived accordingly, both nominally and really, through Evan Thomas.

KEKEWICH, J.—In this case I am asked to give relief by way of injunction, but it is impossible for me to do so, and it is impossible for this reason. The covenant here appears to me to be a good one as being attached to the mortgage for £550. The defendant, however, has offered in his defence to redeem that mortgage; and his sub-lessor has actually tendered the amount. The result is this: that although, as a matter of fact, owing to the plaintiff company's refusal of this tender, the mortgage has not yet been redeemed, and although the defendant has not yet taken any legal steps to enforce its redemption, yet the defendant could now be held to his offer, and it would be wrong for me simply to grant an injunction without further qualification. Possibly I might make a complicated order to the effect that, if the mortgage should not be redeemed within a fixed time, the injunction should then be granted. Why then, it may be asked, do I not at once dispose of the case on this ground alone? I do not so dispose of it because of the question of costs. As a matter of fact the mortgage has not been redeemed, and it is impossible for me to say that either the plaintiff or the defendant has been wrong all through the action. If, accordingly, I were to decide the action solely on the point above indicated, I should be obliged to make a sort of division of spoils, in the matter of costs, between the plaintiff and the defendant. It will be better, therefore, to decide the case on its other merits, and not on this one point alone.

Two real questions arise in the present action. Firstly, is the plaintiff company entitled to sue for breach of this covenant? Secondly, is the defendant liable to be sued on it? (1) The defendant says that the covenant is that he should buy his beer from "John Brothers," but that he is now being asked to buy his beer from the Abergarw Brewery and not from "John Brothers" at all. Now the covenant is contained in a separate deed; but it is contemporaneous, and must be read, with the mortgage. I altogether leave out of question the fact that the words "successors and assigns" are omitted. Cases, it is true, have been cited by the defendant to show that those words may be of importance. Standing by themselves, no doubt, they may point to a certain conclusion, but that is no reason why we should not, in their absence, come to precisely the same conclusion on quite different grounds. To my mind their absence is of no importance here. The covenant speaks of Morgan and William John "trading in co-partnership as John Brothers . . . hereinafter styled as John Brothers." Now, had conveyancing forms permitted it, the draftsman, I suppose, would have said something like this: "The firm of John Brothers, which firm now consists of," &c., &c. The draftsman, however, could not do that—it would have been an anachronism. What he does is to take the actual number of existing partners at the time of the covenant, and define them as "John Brothers." I find that characteristic running through both deeds—through the mortgage and the covenant alike. The reference in every case is invariably to "John Brothers." More than that, I find that the mortgage money is advanced out of the partnership account; that the property in question is "tied" to a firm of brewers; and that the covenant is intended to be for the benefit of that business. The benefit, therefore, must be taken to belong to whoever, from time to time, possesses the business in question. I lay no stress on the fact that in this case a private firm has been converted into a joint-stock company. There is just as much an assignment to them as there would have been to strangers. I hold, therefore, that the plaintiff company, since they are entitled to the business of "John Brothers," is entitled also to the benefit of the covenant made with them.

(2) Now as to the second point. It is contended—and it is contended from two different points of view—that the defendant is not an assign of John Jenkins. That is a more difficult point, especially in its second branch. (a) Why is not the defendant to be bound by an application of the ordinary doctrine, that anyone claiming through John Jenkins and having notice of John Jenkins' covenant is bound to perform that covenant? It is asserted, indeed, on the authority of Bryant v. Hancock, that "assign" does not include a sub-lessee. It is argued, accordingly, that a sub-lessee was never under any circumstances meant to be bound, and cannot, therefore, in this case be bound, under any doctrine of notice. But Bryant v. Hancock does not show that "assign" necessarily excludes "sub-lessee." It is a question of construction in each individual case. In this case, I think, on the true construction, there is a clear intention to bind the premises as far as possible in the hands of anyone claiming under a title derived from John Jenkins subsequently to the date of the second mortgage. But does the defendant claim under a title thus derived from John Jenkins? That is the most difficult question of all. The defendant says that he is the sub-lessee, not of Evan, but of John Thomas, because John Thomas, who has the legal estate, "demises," whereas Evan Thomas merely "demises and confirms." I have the sub-lease before me; and, under section 18, sub-section 1, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, it would have been a perfectly good lease had it been made by Evan Thomas alone. By sub-section 2 of the same section it would have been a good lease, if made by John Thomas alone, only if he had been in possession, not otherwise. Since, however, the two have joined together, whose lease does it actually purport to be? John Thomas is described as being the owner of the legal estate; Evan Thomas is described as the lessor. I do not think that those descriptions are of very great importance. In the witnessing part we find that John Thomas "demises," and that Evan Thomas "demises and confirms." It is very strange that John Thomas, the mortgagee, should be put first, and that the so-called "lessor" should be put second. That is certainly strange conveyancing. We learn, however, from Roach v. Wadham, that it is quite immaterial who is called the "lessor," though it is very material, on the other hand, to discover under what title the best is really made as a matter of law. The defendant, in short, is bound to claim under his superior title—the title which is best in point of law. As to that there can be no doubt. The better title is conferred by Evan Thomas, and it is therefore under that title that the defendant holds. As a result I am against the defendant on every point except the one I first mentioned. I cannot therefore give the defendant the costs of the action. In very strict justice I ought, perhaps, to give the plaintiff company the costs up to the tender of the redemption money in the statement of defence. I shall, however, make no order as to costs.

IND, COOPE, & CO. (LIMITED) v. HAMBLIN. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Covenant—Restrictive covenant — Vendor and purchaser — Construction — Windows —"Buildings adjoining."

Vendors sold and conveyed land, retaining adjacent land. The purchaser covenanted, "in the erection of buildings adjoining the hereditaments of the vendors," not to insert windows overlooking their land. He nevertheless built houses with windows which did so overlook. Between the houses and the land of the vendors were gardens belonging to the purchaser, several yards long, and a fence.

Held, that the houses "adjoined" the land of the vendors within the meaning of the covenant.

Action.

This was an action by vendors to enforce a covenant by the purchasers not to insert windows in houses overlooking land retained by the vendors.

The plaintiff company were the owners, subject to a lease, of the Bournbrook Hotel, in Bournbrook, near Birmingham, and of land around the hotel, principally at the rear, part of which had been laid out as a bowling green. The hotel fronted, on the south, upon the Bristol road, and the land connected with it was bounded upon the east by the Grange-road, and on the west or south-west and north or north-west by other land which, at the date of the conveyance next mentioned, also belonged to the plaintiff company, and which contained about 22,000 square yards. The plaintiff company also owned at the date of the conveyance, land on the opposite side of the Grange-road of about 3,000 square yards.

In June, 1897, the company conveyed these two pieces of land, containing respectively 22,000 square yards and 3,000 square yards, which in the plan in the conveyance were edged round with pink, to the defendant in fee simple. The hotel and land connected with it retained by the vendors were in the plan edged round with blue. The conveyance contained covenants on the part of the purchaser that he would not permit the land sold to be used for a public-house, &c., that he would pay for certain repairs to the roads, "and also from time to time, and at all times hereafter, in the erection of any buildings adjoining the hereditaments of the vendors edged blue on the said plan shall not nor will insert or permit to be inserted any lights overlooking such other hereditaments as aforesaid." The defendant, having entered into possession of the land sold, erected a row of small dwelling-houses on it in a line more or less parallel to the west (or north-west) boundary of the land at the rear of the hotel retained by the vendors. The rear of these houses was towards the land of the company, and the windows at the back of several of these houses overlooked the bowling-green. The houses were not built so that the backs touched the boundary of the company's land, but between the backs of the houses and the land of the company there were gardens belonging to the houses of a length of from twenty-five to thirty feet. These gardens were separated from the company's land in the case of the first one by a wall, in the case of the others by a wooden fence or barrier. The plaintiffs alleged that the existence of these windows lessened the value of the hotel and bowling-green, and gave evidence to that effect. In these circumstances they asked that the defendant might be ordered to build up the windows overlooking their property, and pay damages.

Astbury, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the plaintiffs.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Edward Clayton, for the defendant.—The houses of the defendant may be adjacent to the land of the plaintiffs, they are not adjoining to it, as the gardens of the houses lie between. The case of Rex v. Hodges, 1 Moo. & M. 341, decides this.

They also cited Vale & Sons v. Moorgate-street, &c., Buildings (Limited), 80 L. T. Rep. 487, 47 W. R. Dig. 96; they also relied on standing by, waiver, and acquiescence.

BUCKLEY, J.—The case of Rex v. Hodges turned on the construction of a statute of criminal law, which is construed more strictly than other instruments. I am of opinion that what the defendant has done here is a breach of the covenant in his conveyance. I shall grant an inquiry as to damages, but not a mandatory injunction in the circumstances of the case.

Q. B. Div.
(Darling and Channell, JJ.) } Dec. 7.

DUCKHAM (Appellant) v. GIBBS (Respondent). (a.)

Ship—Docks — Dock-master, duty of — Requisition to remove vessel—Obstruction—West India Dock Act (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. lii.), s. 101.

Section 101 of the West India Dock Act provides that every master or other person in charge or command of a vessel, having placed such vessel within 200 yards of the entrance to any of the docks to which the Act applies, "who shall not immediately remove such vessel from within such distance on being therewith required by the dock-master," shall incur a penalty "for every hour that such obstruction shall remain after such requisition."

Held, that a notice or requisition, signed by a dock-master, with the name of the vessel left blank, and handed by him to his deputy, with instructions to serve it upon any master who should place his vessel within the prescribed limit, and which was afterwards served by such deputy upon the respondent, was a sufficient requisition within the Act.

Held, also, that it is not necessary that the vessel should be proved to have actually obstructed navigation to constitute the offence.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was laid by the appellant, on behalf of the London and India Docks Joint Committee, against the respondent for that, being a person having the charge or command of a certain lighter or barge known as The Sapphire, he did unlawfully on the 8th of May, 1899, place or permit or suffer it to remain in the River Thames within 200 yards of the old entrance of the East India Docks, and refused and did not immediately remove, such lighter or barge from within such distance on being thereunto required by the dock-master, and did remain, after such requisition was made, a long and unreasonable time—to wit, one hour and upwards, contrary to the West India Dock Act, s. 101.

The section enacts as follows: "And for the better making and preserving of a free and clear entrance, navigation, and passage into and out of the said docks, basins, locks, and cuts, be it further enacted that every master or other person having charge or command of any ship, lighter, barge, or boat, or other vessel of any description whatsoever who shall place or permit or suffer the same to remain in the River Thames within 200 yards of any of the entrances to the said docks, basins, locks, or cuts, except at the said Limehouse entrance into the said south docks as aforesaid, unless for the purpose of coming into or going out of the same, shall forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum not exceeding £10, and every master or other person having the charge or command of any ship, lighter, barge, boat, or other vessel of any description whatsoever so placed within such distance as aforesaid (whether for the purpose aforesaid or not) who shall not immediately remove such ship, lighter, barge, boat, or other vessel from within such distance on being thereunto required by the dock-master or dock-masters shall, for every such offence, forfeit or pay any sum not exceeding £5 for every hour that such obstruction shall remain after such requisition . . ."

On the upper pier-head of the entrance to the East India Docks, which is one of the docks to which the Act applies, there is a notice painted up in the following terms: "No ship, lighter, barge, tug, or craft shall be made fast to or shall lie alongside of any part of this pier-head unless so ordered by the dock-master, and any person or vessel thus offending will be proceeded against as the Act of Parliament provides.—J. H. DUCKHAM, Dock-master."

On the 8th of May, 1899, at 4.30 p.m., at which time the tide was ebbing and would so continue for about two hours, the barge Sapphire in the charge of the respondent arrived at the pier-head. She came there for the purpose of going into the dock, but according to the ordinary practice would not be able to enter the dock, nor would the dock-gates be opened to permit the exit or entrance of any traffic until the tide had turned and had been running up for between two and three hours.

The respondent on his arrival at the pier-head was told by the appellant's lockman on duty that the barge could not remain there and must be removed. He, however, made the barge fast to the upper pier-head, within 60 feet of the dock entrance, but so that when the tide turned she would swing round away from the entrance. The respondent then came ashore. On landing he was served by the lockman with a notice, which was as follows: "You are required to unmoor and remove your vessel from the pier-head and from within the distance of 200 yards from the entrance.—J. H. DUCKHAM, Dock-master." The respondent did not comply with the notice or remove the barge, and it was still there at 6.30 p.m.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared from the evidence of the lockman that until the 1st of May, 1899, it had for years been the practice of barges to make fast to the pier-heads in a similar position to that occupied by The Sapphire. On that day the dock-master gave general instructions to the lockman to prevent barges from making fast to the pierheads. No specific orders were given to the lockman with regard to the respondent's barge, but he acted under his general instructions. The notice handed by the lockman to the respondent was one of several blank notices signed by the dock-master which had been supplied to him. The lockman filled up the date and name of the barge, and if the person in charge refused to move, he served him with the notice without consulting the dock-master.

The magistrate dismissed the information, holding that before an offence under the section could be held to have been committed, special instructions applicable to each particular vessel must be given by the appellant. He also found that there was no evidence that any particular vessel entering or leaving the dock had in fact been obstructed by The Sapphire, but held that such obstruction was not necessary to the proof of an offence under the section.

George Wallace, for the appellant.—There is nothing in the section to show that it was necessary for the dock-master to give special instructions. The notice served by the lockman is therefore in accordance with the Act and the offence is complete.

J. A. Hamilton, for the respondent.—The notice was not a sufficient notice within the section for the reason stated by the magistrate. The section does not apply unless the barge in question constitutes an actual obstruction. There was no navigation or passage of vessels at the time, so that the barge could not have been an obstruction.

DARLING, J.—In this case the magistrate has decided one of the points raised in favour of the respondent, and the other in favour of the appellant. The first question, which he decided in favour of the respondent, arose upon section 101 of the West India Dock Act.

Now, it is first of all said that this offence was not committed, and the fine did not become due because the dock-master, after the barge had been moored within 200 yards of the dock gate, did not himself come and—with regard to that particular barge—give to the master of it a direction to take it away. What he did was this: He filled up and signed a lot of "requisitions" directed to masters of barges which might commit this offence, and he gave those documents so signed and filled up to a deputy of some kind. When the barge came within the proscribed distance and attempted to remain there the dock-master's deputy simply took one of these documents, filled in the name of the barge and of the master of it, and served him with it. It was said by the appellant that that was a requisition to remove the obstruction. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that it was not a requisition at all, that it was made before the barge became an obstruction, if it ever became one, and that it was therefore not within what the Act allowed the dock-master to do. The magistrate found that the requisition was not a good one, and in that I think he was wrong. I think that what was done did amount to a requisition by the dock-master. I do not see anything in this section or in any other part of the Act which satisfies me that the requirement must be made by the dock-master personally to the master of the barge. The barge, having brought itself within the proscribed limit—200 yards—became, I think, a thing which the dock-master had a right to order away, and I cannot see that he had not a right to order it away because the document by means of which he ordered it away had been filled up by him before it came there, except that he had not put in its name.

With regard to the other point, Mr. Hamilton contended that if no particular vessel had in fact been obstructed by the lighter, then there was no obstruction within the meaning of section 101, and no offence was or could be committed. I do not agree with that. I think that section 101 means this: It first of all says that you shall not moor a lighter within 200 yards of a certain place. It then goes on to say if you moor it within such a distance you may be required by the dock-master to remove it, and, if you do not then remove it, for every such offence you shall have to pay a sum for every hour that such obstruction shall remain after the requisition is made.

I do not think that the words "such obstruction" there require that it should be proved that any particular vessel was obstructed, nor that the traffic was obstructed or might have been obstructed. I think that the meaning of the words "such obstruction" is this, that directly you have a lighter moored within 200 yards of the forbidden spot it becomes an obstruction. True, it is still a lighter, but I think it is something else, it is a lighter in a forbidden place. It is a lighter remaining in the forbidden place after its master has been required to remove it, and I think that then such a lighter, in such a place, after such a requisition directed to its master, becomes an obstruction within the meaning of the statute, and that it is so because of the place where it is and because of its being there in defiance of notice given to it to leave, and that independently of the question whether it actually does obstruct or is in imminent danger of obstructing any particular ship or traffic at large. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion upon both points. As regards the second point I think the construction of the statute is made quite clear by the words "such obstruction." It first of all declares that no person shall moor a barge within a certain distance of the dock gates, and then talks, not having used the word "obstruction" before, about the period when such obstruction continues. That amounts to saying that mooring a barge within 200 yards from the dock gates is an obstruction. Assuming that to be an obstruction, the section says that no vessel that is going into the docks shall moor within this 200 yards. The mere mooring of a vessel within that distance, if it is going into the docks, gives rise to one penalty. Then the next part of the section provides a continuing penalty, and it provides such a continuing penalty both for vessels going into the dock and for those that are not going in, and says that after a certain requisition has been made, if the vessel remains there, there shall be a continuing penalty for every hour.

That being so, what is the requisition to be made? The words are "on being required by the dock-master or dock-masters to move." It is suggested that the dock-master must come and see whether or not it is necessary for the vessel to move. You cannot possibly put that interpretation upon the section with respect to the vessels which are not going in and which are already subject to one penalty for being moored there at all. Yet the requirement must mean just the same in one case as in the other. I think it is quite clear that if the dock-master personally authorizes his assistants to say, "This vessel shall move," that is quite enough. Whether the assistant can do it himself is a totally different question which we have not got before us; but in cases in which, as in the present case, the dock-master authorized the assistant to serve the notice, it is quite clear that there is a requirement by the dock-master within the mean- of the section.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lindley, M.R., Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ.) — Jan 24.

In re JOSEPH HARGREAVES (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Discovery of documents—Income tax returns—Misfeasance summons—Public department—Discretion of judge—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 115.

Section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, gives a discretion to the judge which will not be interfered with primâ facie by the Court of Appeal.

Accordingly the judge of first instance having in his discretion refused an application by the liquidator of a company for production of certain balance-sheets of the company, which had been deposited with the district surveyor of taxes for the purpose of income tax returns, on an affidavit by the secretary of the Board of Inland Revenue that in the opinion of the board such production was injurious to the public interest:

Held, that this decision would not be reviewed by the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal from a decision of Wright, J.

The liquidator of the above-named company, which was in liquidation, issued a misfeasance summons against the directors and the auditor on the ground that dividends had been paid out of capital. While the company was a going concern the auditor had signed three balance-sheets, which had been delivered to and left with the district surveyor of taxes for income tax assessment purposes. There were no other balance-sheets of the company in existence. To prove the complicity of the auditor the liquidator took out a summons under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, to compel the district surveyor to produce these balance-sheets. The surveyor declined to do so, and was supported in his refusal by the Board of Inland Revenue, who passed the following resolution: "In the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, who have duly considered the question, the production of the documents referred to in the summons . . . would be prejudicial and injurious to the public interest and service." A minute of this resolution was proved by the secretary to the board.

Wright, J., held that though there might be cases in which the court would require the principal officers of a public department to come into court and prove that the production of documents would be injurious to public policy, yet in the present case the objection had been sufficiently taken in point of form, and no ground had been shown for overruling it. Accordingly, in the exercise of his discretion, he dismissed the application.

The liquidator appealed.

P. F. Wheeler, for the appellant.—There is nothing in the affidavit which the board have had filed to enable the court to see whether it is right or not to order the production of these documents. The reasons given by Wright, J., for refusing production are inapplicable. The liquidator is not a stranger trying to inspect some other person's returns, but the company wishes to see documents which it has itself furnished. This application might be made by the directors, and it therefore can be made by the liquidator in whom all the powers of the directors are vested. It is no disclosure to tell a man what he already knows. The objection should be overruled—first, because the affidavit states no grounds which would enable the court to see how the board arrived at their conclusions; secondly, because the proper course is for the head of the department to appear and explain why the production of the documents required is injurious to the public interest. There is no section of the Income Tax Act which prevents the surveyor producing the documents, but only his oath.

He referred to Lee v. Birrell, 3 Camp. 337; Mitchell v. Koecker, 11 Beav. 380, 12 Beav. 44; Rex v. Clarke, 8 T. R. 220; Kain v. Farrer, 37 L. T. Rep. 469, 26 W. R. Dig. 79.

Danckwerts, Q.C., and Rowlatt, for the respondent, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, M.R.—It appears to me it is quite unnecessary for us, and it would not be in accordance with the usual practice of the court to decide a speculative case which is not before us. What we have to consider is whether Wright, J., ought to be overruled as wrong in coming to the conclusion that it was not necessary, or proper, or expedient (whichever word you choose to use) to order the production of these documents upon an application made to him under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862. That section says: "The court may, after it has made an order for winding up the company"—I understand there has been a winding-up order here—"summon before it" among other persons "any person whom the court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company," and the court may require any such person "to produce any books, papers, deeds, writings, or other documents in his custody or power relating to the company."

The language in which that section is expressed shows that the person who applies under it has no abstract right to an order; and it has been decided over and over again, in accordance with the language, that the judge has a discretion in the matter, and that, if he exercises his discretion, the Court of Appeal will not interfere with it. I do not say it has not jurisdiction; that is going perhaps too far, because there might be cases in which there has been such an obvious miscarriage of justice and wrongful exercise of discretion that the Court of Appeal can interfere; but primâ facie this court does not interfere in these cases.

Now let us see what the facts are. Here there is a misfeasance summons, which has been taken out by the liquidator against the auditor of the company, amongst others, and the liquidator, very naturally, wants to get information in support of that proceeding. Therefore he is applying to the court to make an order upon the surveyor of taxes, who has in his possession or physical custody some returns made by the company for income tax purposes, for production of those documents. The surveyor, I suppose, acting under general instructions, objects, and the matter is considered by the Board of Inland Revenue, and we have a certificate that in the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, who have duly considered the question, the production of the documents referred to in the summons would be prejudicial and injurious to the public interests and service. Therefore, Wright, J., says: No; in the face of that, as far as I have a discretion in the matter, I shall not make any order. Now we are asked to reverse that. I decline to do anything of the sort. I do not say, and I do not intend to say, what is the limit of the power of the court (if there is a limit) to order the production of such documents as these; but I do say that if the learned judge below has come to the conclusion that under section 115 they should not be produced—that it is not expedient to do so—this court ought not to interfere. In my opinion this appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. I do not understand it to be denied that communications made to the Inland Revenue are communications which are documents coming within the rule that enables the heads of departments to object on their own responsibility to their production, but, at all events, if it were disputed, it seems to me that there is ample authority to show that such a contention would be ill-founded. Under these circumstances it is said here that the discretion was wrongly exercised, because Wright, J., had not got before him the head of the department. It seems to me that we ought not to review the discretion exercised by Wright, J., upon any such ground, especially in a case where the production is asked upon the examination of a witness under this section 115 of the Companies Act, which expressly puts the matter in the discretion of the judge.

I only wish to make one observation with regard to the case of Kain v. Farrer, which was cited. There the Board of Trade had put forward the defendant, the secretary of the Board of Trade, as the person to represent the Board of Trade, and service had been accepted of the writ by the secretary as representing the Board of Trade; and in the course of that litigation the production of documents in the ordinary form of discovery was asked for. It is quite plain that the rules which would guide the court as to what affidavit was necessary from a party to the action representing a department of the State are entirely different from the rules which would be applied in a case where the officer of a department was merely subpœnaed as a witness. The officer of the department is merely the custodian of the documents as the servant of the department, and the department here have not put forward their servant in the sense of representing the department.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I will only add that in my opinion the question before us is not necessarily the same as that which may possibly come before the judge upon the hearing of this summons when he has to consider any application for a subpœna that may be made for the production of these documents.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY v. WILD & SON. (a.)

Crown — Prerogative — Right to remove proceedings to the Revenue side—Right to apply to stay proceedings.

It is part of the prerogative of the Crown to have an action between its subjects in which the title or interests of the Crown is concerned, in whatever stage such action may be, removed from the county court into the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division; and, where an information is filed by the Attorney-General raising the same question as that to be decided in such an action, the Crown has the right to apply to have the action stayed until the information is determined, and such application may be made after judgment has been delivered in the action.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Darling and Channell, JJ.).

Lord Stanley of Alderley was the owner of the surface of land on a mountain called Holyhead Mountain, in Anglesey, under a grant in fee in 1840 from the Crown, by which the mines, minerals, and quarries within, upon, or under the land were reserved to the Crown, with full power to the Crown and its assigns to enter upon, work, use, and enjoy the same as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if the grant had not been made.

The Crown granted a lease of the minerals to Messrs. Wild, who erected on the surface of the land a building for storing dynamite for the purpose of working the quarries of china stone.

Lord Stanley of Alderley brought an action in the county court against Messrs. Wild claiming £1 damages for trespass and also an injunction.

On the 11th of July, 1899, the county court judge gave judgment in favour Lord Stanley for £1 damages for trespass and granted an injunction restraining Messrs. Wild from using the land as they had previously done.

Notice of appeal was given by Messrs. Wild to the Queen's Bench Division.

On the 12th of August, 1899, the Attorney-General filed an information against Lord Stanley asking for a declaration that the Crown, its lessees, agents, and servants, were entitled to work the minerals under the land, and for that purpose to do and exercise all such acts, powers, and privileges upon or affecting the surface of the land as might have been done or exercised by the Crown's authority if the surface had not been granted by the deed, and for an injunction to restrain Lord Stanley from interfering, by legal proceedings or otherwise, with the exercise by the lessee or licensee of the Crown of the surface powers or privileges reserved by the deed, and that all proceedings for enforcing the order of the county court should be stayed. Upon application by the Crown, the Divisional Court made an order directing the appeal in the county court action to be transferred to the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, and that all further proceedings in the appeal should be stayed until after the hearing of the information.

This was the order appealed from.

Haldane, Q.C., and Bryn Roberts, for the appellants.—The Crown is not entitled by virtue of its prerogative right to have proceedings in which it is interested stayed after final judgment. Such right only applies to proceedings in which final judgment has not yet been given, and does not apply to an appeal.

Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

The following cases were referred to in the course of the arguments: Cawthorne v. Campbell, 1 Anstr. 205; Attorney-General v. Barker, 20 W. R. 509, L. R. 7 Ex. 177; Attorney-General v. Constable, 27 W. R. 661, 4 Ex. D. 172; Attorney-General v. St. Aubyn, Wightw. 167; Leonard v. Rogers, cited in Wightw. at p. 204; Yates v. Dryden, Cro. Car. 589; Attorney-General v. Hallett, 15 M. & W. 97.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., after stating the facts: The first question is whether it is within the prerogative of the Crown to have a cause in the county court, whatever its position in that court may be, removed to the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division, formerly the Revenue side of the Court of Exchequer. That question was not seriously contested. The first part of the order of the Divisional Court is therefore right. The order goes on to direct that all further proceedings on the appeal from the county court shall be stayed until after the hearing of the information. It is said that it is too late for the Crown to make such an application now, and that it should have been made before the county court judge delivered judgment. I can find no authority for that contention. The case of Yates v. Dryden seems to me to be directly adverse to such a view, for in that case, after a writ of error was brought—that is, after judgment had been delivered, the Attorney-General intervened and the court stayed the proceedings on the writ of error. That is a direct authority upon the second part of the order of the Divisional Court staying the appeal in the county court action pending the hearing of the information. In Attorney-General v. Barker, Kelly, L.C.B., says: "I feel bound to hold that the Crown has at any time a right to insist upon its claim to land, or upon its right to the establishing of any customs belonging to a manor, by means of a suit instituted by the Crown itself, and is not bound to abide the event of any action or suit in which the Crown, through a subject, is made the real defendant and can only appear as defendant."

That is direct authority that it is part of the prerogative of the Crown not only to have the action removed and stayed, but also to become the actor in the litigation involving its rights, and that this can be done after judgment. It seems to me, therefore, that the Divisional Court had jurisdiction to order a stay in this county court action until after the hearing of the information.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that when there is an action between subjects which raises a question of title, or any other question in which the Crown is interested, the Crown has two rights. The two rights are not necessarily connected. The one right is the right to have the cause, in whatever court it is, removed into the Revenue side of the Exchequer. That removal does not by itself put an end to the action, but the parties to the action are brought into the Exchequer, and such modifications of the action are then made as may be necessary to the conduct of the trial of the action there. It appears from the case of the Attorney-General v. Hallett that if the action was in such a form that the Crown could not take part in it, or intervene in it, without doing something or permitting something to be done which was impossible for the Crown, then in the Exchequer they moulded the action, they changed the action of trespass into a petition of right. Then the action went on to be tried, and I take it that here in the present case if the Crown had chosen immediately to get an order for its removal, the Crown might have done so, and if the proceedings had then been moulded by changing the action of trespass into a petition of right, there is no reason, so far as I can make out, why the rights of the Crown against Lord Stanley should not have been disposed of. The Crown preferred to exercise the right of having the proceedings, whether removed or not, stayed until the information was tried in which the same question of the Crown's rights was intended to be tried. It appears from the case of Yates v. Dryden that a stay might have been obtained without any removal at all. The removal was not essential to the stay. The case of Leonard v. Rogers shows that there is no objection to the Crown adopting both proceedings at the same time if it chooses. There is ample authority for making the order. I do not wish to say whether the Crown is entitled as of right to an order to stay the action. So far as the removal order is concerned, I think it is plain that the Crown is entitled to that as of right.

"THE BRUNEL." (a.)

The meaning of the words "not exceeding fifteen tons burden" in section 3, sub-section 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is not exceeding a net register tonnage of fifteen tons.

Appeal from a judgment of Barnes, J. (47 W. R. 288).

The owners of The Glanmire having commenced an action against the owners of The Brunel for damage by collision, the owners of The Brunel commenced an action against the owners of The Glanmire for limitation of liability under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

The question was whether The Brunel was exempted from registry under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, by virtue of section 3, sub-section 1, of that Act, which exempts "ships not exceeding fifteen tons burden employed solely in navigation on the rivers or coasts of the United Kingdom."

The Brunel was an unregistered steam-tug solely employed in navigation on the River Avon and such part of the Bristol Channel as is situate within the port of Bristol. Her gross tonnage, ascertained by measurement in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, was 35·99 tons. Her propelling-power space amounted to 31·15 tons, and her crew space to 6·73 tons.

The plaintiffs, the owners of The Brunel, contended that The Brunel was a ship not exceeding fifteen tons burden within the meaning of section 3, sub-section 1; for a ship's tonnage within the meaning of that sub-section was the net register tonnage, for the purpose of calculating which the tonnage of the propelling-power space and the crew space ought to be deducted from the gross tonnage.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants, the owners of The Glanmire, contended that The Brunel was a ship exceeding fifteen tons burden within the meaning of the sub-section; for the words "tons burden" meant the tonnage capacity of the vessel under the tonnage deck without deductions.

Barnes, J., held that The Brunel was a ship not exceeding fifteen tons burden, and was, therefore, exempted from registry, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability under section 503 to £8 per ton of her gross tonnage.

The defendants appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Aspinall, Q.C., for the defendants.

Robson, Q.C., and Lauriston Batton, for the plaintiffs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The question is whether the words "not exceeding fifteen tons burden" in section 3, sub-section 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, mean not exceeding a gross tonnage of fifteen tons burden, or not exceeding a registered tonnage of fifteen tons burden. In the court below counsel for the defendants argued that "tons burden" meant the carrying capacity of the ship. Here they have abandoned that argument, and their contention is, in effect, that it means gross tonnage. They do not admit that that is the proper way of putting their argument, but that is what it comes to, for they say that "tons burden" is the tonnage capacity of the vessel without deductions for engine-room space, &c. In support of their contention they rely on the rules for measurement of tonnage in the second schedule to the Act. But the words "tons burden" which we have to construe are in a group of sections which relate to the registration of ships, and it may well be that the same words "tons burden" and "tonnage" are to be found in other parts of the Act which deal with other matters, bearing a different meaning from that which they bear in this group of sections. In my opinion the meaning of "tons burden" in this section which deals with the registration of ships is not gross tonnage but net register tonnage—that is, the gross tonnage after allowing for the authorized deductions. There was therefore no necessity for registry, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

STAMFORD, SPALDING, AND BOSTON BANKING CO. v. KNIGHT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale of leaseholds—Title—Assignment of lease recited, but not abstracted in chief—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3, sub-section 6—Expense of verification of abstract.

A vendor contracted to sell two leasehold houses held under separate leases. An assignment of one of the leases to an intermediate assignee was not abstracted in chief in the abstract of title, though it was recited in the abstract of a subsequent assignment in the same abstract of title.

Held, that the assignment must be abstracted in chief and verified at the vendor's expense.

Summons under Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874.

Thomas Knight entered into a contract on the 16th of May, 1899, for the purchase of two leasehold villas, known as "Burgoyne" and "East Dean," held for a term of ninety-nine years from the 24th of June, 1890, under two distinct indentures of lease, each dated the 8th of May, 1890. The contract provided that "the vendors will deliver to each purchaser or his solicitor an abstract of their title to the property purchased by him, such title to commence with the leases, whether original or derivative, mentioned in the particulars under which the premises are respectively and immediately held."

The solicitors for the vendors, the Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Co., delivered an abstract of title from which it appeared that by two indentures of assignment, each made on the 26th of November, 1890, the leasehold premises were respectively assigned to G. J. Phillips and J. Pugh for all the unexpired terms of years granted by the leases of the 8th of May, 1890.

The abstract of title comprised an indenture dated the 17th of November, 1891, made between A. C. Palmer, the trustee in bankruptcy of the said John Pugh, of the one part and the present vendors of the other part, whereby A. C. Palmer as trustee assigned to the vendors the said leasehold villas for the residue of the term.

The abstract of this indenture of the 17th of November, 1891, contained a recital in the words following, "and reciting that by an indenture bearing date the 2nd of December, 1890, and made between G. J. Phillips of the one part and J. Pugh of the other part, the said G. J. Phillips did convey all the estate and interest of the said G. J. Phillips in all property pertaining to the partnership lately subsisting between him and the said J. Pugh, of which the said leasehold hereditaments formed part, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said J. Pugh in fee simple or otherwise according to the respective estates or tenure applicable to the said properties thereby assured."

No abstract in chief of the indenture of the 2nd of December, 1890, was contained in the abstract of title or was ever furnished to the purchaser.

The purchaser claimed that he was entitled to a proper abstract of the vendor's title to the subject-matter of the contract, and in particular of the indenture alleged to bear date the 2nd of December, 1890, at the vendor's expense.

R. Wright Taylor, for the plaintiff.—The document should have been abstracted in chief, not merely recited in another abstracted instrument: Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, vol. 1, p. 341 (6th ed.).

J. M. Gover, for defendant, referred to Oakden v. Pike, 13 W. R. 673, 34 L. J. Ch. 620; In re Ebsworth and Tidy's Contract, 37 W. R. 657, 42 Ch. D. 23; In re Johnson and Tustin, 33 W. R. 43, 28 Ch. D. 84; In re Stuart and Olivant and Seadon's Contract, 44 W. R. 610, [1896] 2 Ch. 328.

NORTH, J.—The objection is well founded. The contract provides that the vendors shall deliver an abstract of their title to commence with the original leases. The abstract was delivered, but it did not contain an abstract in chief of the indenture of the 2nd of December, 1890, though there was a recital of this document. Is that a compliance with the obligation imposed on the vendor by the condition to deliver an abstract commencing with the original lease? The rule with respect to the obligation to abstract deeds is correctly stated in Dart, p. 341: "All documents forming part of the title should be abstracted in chief; the introduction of them merely as recitals in other abstracted documents is, it is apprehended, clearly improper; were it not so, a copy of the conveyance to the vendor might in many cases take the place of an abstract; besides which, the omission to abstract a document in chief may proceed from a desire to avoid noticing matters of a suspicious character occurring in such document, but which are not noticed in the recital." This, I apprehend, is the well-known practice. This document must be abstracted in chief. It is said my own decision in In re Etsworth and Tidy's Contract conflicts with this. I do not find any such expression there. When the matter came before me the purchaser might have obtained all the information which he would have got if the will had been abstracted. I thought the objection technically right, but there was no substance in it. That decision shows that it is the vendor's duty to abstract the document in chief, though in that case the contents of the will were unimportant. In the present case the document is a deed which it is important to abstract. My opinion is that it ought to have been abstracted in chief, and verified in the usual way. Then it was said that I was precluded by sub-section 6 of section 3 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), and by the decision in In re Johnson and Tustin from causing the expense of procuring and making an abstract of the deed to be borne by the vendor. But sub-section 6 assumes that a perfect abstract has been delivered, and deals with the matters subsequent to that. Here a perfect abstract has not been delivered, and the vendor is bound to make the abstract and verify it at his own expense.

Anne Hartley died on the 24th of February, 1886, and Griffith Williams died on the 10th of June, 1860.

The action Williams v. Williams was instituted on the 15th of February, 1898, within twelve years of the death of Anne Hartley, the object being to raise these two several sums of £2,000. It was admitted in the action that the £2,000 over which Anne Hartley had a power of appointment must be raised, but it was now contended that the other £2,000, to be raised on the death of Griffith Williams, was barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874.

Theobald, Q.C., and A. R. Ingpen, for the plaintiff, argued that as the £2,000 raiseable on the death of G. Williams was secured by a term of years, it was not secured by an express trust within section 10 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), and that the Act did not apply; and secondly, that the trustees could raise this £2,000, as they were entitled to have possession of the land to perform the trust as to the £2,000 due on the death of Anne Hartley. It was only the right of action to get the money which was barred by the statute, not the right to the money.

They referred to the following cases: Cox v. Dolman, 1 W. R. 93, 2 De G. M. & G. 592; Lawton v. Ford, 14 W. R. 575, L. R. 2 Eq. 97; Hughes v. Coles, 33 W. R. 27, 27 Ch. D. 231.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Cann, for the first defendant, L. N. Williams, argued that the right to the £2,000 due on the death of G. Williams was barred, as the action was not brought for thirty-eight years after his death.

Arnold Herbert and J. G. Wood, for other defendants.

NORTH, J.—I think that the statute is a bar as regards the second two thousand pounds and I think it comes within the tenth section of the Act, which says, "After the commencement of this Act no action, suit, or other proceeding shall be brought to recover any sum of money or legacy charged upon or payable out of any land or rent at law or in equity, and secured by an express trust." There seems to me to be a phrase introduced there for the purpose of altering the law as it is shown to have existed previously to the statute by the cases which have been referred to. Therefore this is a case in which the right to bring an action to recover this £2,000 is expressly prohibited, and that being so, the only point remaining is whether if the action was properly commenced in respect of the first £2,000, that mere fact authorizes me to treat the action as sufficient to make the second £2,000 raiseable, although if the first sum had not been recoverable the action could not have been brought now for the second. I do not think it does. I think I must look at the substance of the matter. The action is to recover two separate sums of £2,000 each. Suppose that two separate actions had been brought. Could it be said that if an action had been brought to recover one £2,000, and had succeeded, another action altogether, to raise the other £2,000 could not fail under the statute? If the first action had been originally decided in that way, as it might have been, the second action would without doubt have failed, and I do not think it can succeed because it is coupled with the suit to recover the first £2,000. The right of the trustees to enter and take possession and raise the money only extends to raising money which is lawfully raiseable and payable, and I do not think that the money is lawfully raiseable and payable although it is secured on land by express trust, having regard to the fact that it became raiseable nine and thirty years ago and nothing has been raised on account of it since that time.

Another question arose upon further consideration under the will of Anne Hartley. By her last will the testatrix Anne Hartley devised her real estates to trustees for a term of 1,000 years without impeachment of waste upon trust by sale or mortgage of the premises comprised in the said term or any part thereof for all or any part of the same term, or out of the rents and profits of the same premises, or by any other reasonable ways and means to raise such sum or sums of money as should be required in aid of her personal estate for payment of her debts, legacies, funeral and testamentary expenses. The testatrix, after bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies, bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to Margaret Williams (now Jones), L. A. Williams, and M. M. Williams. Testatrix had not exercised her power of appointment unless it was exercised by her in the residuary bequest in her will under section 27 of the Wills Act (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26). The personal estate was insolvent.

Theobald, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the plaintiff, contended that the residuary bequest under the will operated as an appointment under section 27 of the Wills Act, and that the £2,000 was not available for the payment of Anne Hartley's debts until the real estate bequeathed for the term of years under the will for the payment of debts, had been exhausted.

Arnold Herbert and J. G. Wood, for defendants.

NORTH, J., stated the facts and continued: Now, there is no exercise by the will in terms of the power of appointment which she had over the £2,000. The £2,000 was absolutely her own unless she appointed it away, and she had not done so; therefore, being her own, it would pass under these words. Then it is said that the Wills Act alters the whole state of things, and provided for her an appointment which she did not make by her will, and which would be at variance altogether with what she has said in the will, because if the £2,000 is technically appointed by her will to the persons named, they will take in such a way that the appointed fund cannot be applied in payment of debts and legacies till all the rest of the estate is applied. I do not follow the argument at all. I do not think, fortunately, in this case that the constructive introduction into the testatrix's mind of the provisions of the Act of Parliament ought to have the effect of altering or perverting the plain meaning of the will itself. Before I read the section I will mention again what the position of the personalty is. There are certain pecuniary legacies and certain annuities. I have not looked through the will to see whether there are any specific legacies or anything of that sort. It does not seem to me that they will be material at all, and I assume for this purpose that the words I have referred to contain all that deals with the personal estate. That being so, I will refer to the Wills Act (7 Will 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26). Section 27 says: "A bequest of the personal estate of the testator shall be construed to include any personal estate which he may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will."

Now, in this will there is the bequest of the personal property of the testatrix contained in the passage I have referred to. The personal estate is given to pay legacies, and then the residue of it is to be given to the persons who are named. I leave out of consideration the question whether there is a direction to pay debts. Probably a direction to pay debts would be implied from the other directions which I have read. But the words I have referred to, the gift of annuities, the gift of legacies, and the gift of residue, coupled with the implied direction to pay debts from the same sources, contain the whole and the only bequests of personal estate found in the will. Why should it be said that any particular part of that bequest is to be treated differently from any other part? If this bequest of the personal estate is to be read by the statute, it is to be read as a bequest of personal estate over which she had a general power of appointment. I will not say that the power is excluded because the exercise of it is unnecessary inasmuch as the £2,000 would pass as residue. I do not say that, but the exercise of the power is included in the disposition made of personal estate by the will. In other words, in dealing with the personal estate disposed of by the will you are to treat the subject of the power just as if she had added the words "that in thus disposing of my personal estate, I include any personal estate over which I have had a general power of appointment." The effect of the statute is to treat the will just as if it contained those words, and to make it unnecessary to put them in, because although in such circumstances similar words were very often put into the will, wills were very often made wihout any such words and the result was that the powers were left unexecuted. It was notorious that that was contrary to the general intention of testators, and this section was therefore passed with reference to both real and personal estate. Now, the statute makes the £2,000 part of the testatrix's personal estate, and it must pass by the only series of gifts which are found in the will of that personal estate. It forms part of the personal estate, and therefore it goes in exactly the same way as her other personal estate, because the statute and the will together include that part of her personal estate. There is not a trace of any intention that the £2,000 was to be left out of the will. On the contrary, she says she is dealing with it. She gives all her personal estate. That passes it. The bequest includes and comprehends any personal estate she had power to appoint. Therefore the £2,000 will be applicable in the same way as the other personal estate for the payment of debts and legacies.

R.* 460, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 369, applied); and that the defendant was entitled to distrain.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant Pink from distraining on eight houses in Wearside-road, Lewisham, and it arose in the following circumstances:

By eight indentures of lease dated the 30th of July, 1897, the eight houses in question were respectively demised to a Mrs. Cole for the term of 99 years from the 29th of September, 1896.

By an indenture dated the 31st of July, 1897, Mrs. Cole demised the eight houses to the plaintiffs for the term of 99 years granted by the respective leases thereof, except the last three days thereof, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of £1,800 and interest; and she entered into a covenant with the plaintiffs for the payment of the rents and performance of the covenants reserved by and contained in the leases.

By an indenture also dated the 31st of July, 1897, the eight houses were conveyed to the defendant in fee simple, subject to and with the benefit of the eight leases to Mrs. Cole.

At Christmas, 1898, two quarters' rent were due under each of the leases, from Mrs. Cole, and the defendant brought an action against her in the Queen's Bench Division for these arrears, and on the 9th of February, 1899, recovered judgment for £20 and £5 5s. costs. On the same day the defendant issued a writ of elegit against Mrs. Cole under the judgment. On the 17th of February, 1899, an inquisition was held under the writ, and by an instrument under the seals of the sheriff and the jurors it was stated that the jurors found that Mrs. Cole was possessed, as of her own lands and tenements, of the eight houses, which the jurors found to be of the annual value of £200; and that the sheriff on the day of taking the inquisition had caused these lands and tenements to be delivered to the defendant at reasonable price and extent in accordance with the writ. The writ and instrument were handed by the sheriff to the defendant's solicitors, but had not been filed in court, nor had the defendant proceeded further under the writ. At the date of the inquisition Mrs. Cole was in receipt of the rents and profits of the property; but on the 28th of March, 1899, the plaintiffs appointed a receiver of these rents and profits, who duly entered into receipt thereof. On the 24th of June, 1899, a further half-year's rent became due, and on the 28th of June the defendant levied a distress on all the eight houses for the recovery thereof. The present action was then brought and notice of motion given. It was agreed that the hearing of the motion should be treated as the trial of the action.

The questions of law arising upon the facts above stated appear from his lordship's judgment.

Upjohn, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the defendant.

STIRLING, J., said that the grounds on which the plaintiffs' case was rested were—(1) that the defendant had become an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, and was, as between her and himself, bound to indemnify her against the rent, while she was, by express contract contained in her mortgage deed, bound to indemnify the plaintiffs, and that the court, to avoid circuity of action, would enforce directly against the defendant at the instance of the plaintiffs the right which Mrs. Cole herself had; (2) that the defendant, being an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, would be liable to the reversioner for the rent, and being himself reversioner could not enforce by distress the payment of the rent which he was himself liable to pay as assign of the lease. As regarded the first of these points, assuming that the defendant had become an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, his lordship was unable to see that under the circumstances of the case the defendant had as between himself and Mrs. Cole become liable to indemnify her against the rent due to the judgment creditor. The primary relation between Mrs. Cole and himself was that of debtor and creditor, and not of assignor and assignee. He might have made himself liable to the lessor for the rent, and he might be unable to satisfy his judgment debt without payment of that rent, and, if so, the payment would be allowed upon a proper account being taken between himself and the judgment debtor; but if he could escape without paying the rent his lordship saw no reason as between him and the judgment debtor why he should not. The case relied on for the plaintiff was Moule v. Garrett. 18 W. R. 697, L. R. 5 Ex. 132, 20 W. R. 416, L. R. 7 Ex. 101, where it was held that an assignee of a lease is under an obligation to indemnify the original lessee, who has parted with all his interest, against the rent and covenants. The ground of the decision was thus stated by Channell, B.: "It is only reasonable to hold . . . that the liability of the lessee is as a surety for the assignee, and that there is an implied promise on the part of the assignee to indemnify the lessee against liability for breaches of covenant while he is assignee"; and by Willes, J.: "Where a party is liable at law by immediate privity of contract, which contract also confers a benefit, and the obligation of the contract is common to him and the defendant, but the whole benefit of the contract is taken by the defendant, the former is entitled to be indemnified by the latter in respect of the performance of the obligation." In this case the whole interest of the lessee was not taken by the judgment creditor; it was only taken by him for a limited purpose and for a limited time—viz., until he could, and in order that he might, obtain satisfaction of his debt. There was no authority for treating the judgment creditor under such circumstances as a surety for the lessee, and it did not seem to his lordship to be reasonable. The second point raised a much more difficult question—viz., what was the nature of the interest of a tenant by elegit in a term delivered to him in execution of the writ? Where the land delivered was of freehold tenure it seemed clear that the judgment creditor had only a chattel interest, whose duration was measured by the satisfaction of the debt (see Burton's Compendium, p. 868), and the judgment debtor had remaining vested in him an interest which, in the case of Dighton v. Greenvil, 2 Vent. 321, was held to be a reversion. It was contended for the defendant that this doctrine ought to apply equally to the respective interests of the judgment creditor and debtor, where the land delivered was of leasehold tenure. The answer given on behalf of the plaintiffs was that there were authorities which showed this not to be so. In Spencer's case, 5 Rep. 16a, see p. 17*a*, the law was thus laid down: "If a man demises or grants land to a woman for years, and the lessor covenants with the lessee to repair the houses during the term, the woman marries and dies, the husband shall have an action of covenant as well on the covenant in law on these words (demise or grant) as on the express covenant. The same law is of tenant by statute merchant or statute staple or elegit of a term." That implied that the tenant by elegit had the whole term vested in him: see Platt on Leases 419. Again in Carter v. Hughes, 6 W. R. 212, 2 H. & N. 714, Martin, B., said: "In this case the execution debtor had only a term in the land, and upon the transfer of that the whole is spent, and what remains in him is not a reversion, but a right to the possession of the term after satisfaction of the first writ." Remembering that upon an alienation of a term by will or deed successive interests took effect, not by way of particular estate and remainder, but by way of executory interest (see Manning's case, 8 Rep. 94b; Lampet's case, 10 Rep. 46b; and Wright v. Cartwright, 1 Burr. 282), his lordship thought it might well be that the whole term was taken by a judgment creditor, but subject to a legal title in the nature of an executory interest in the judgment debtor which, like other such interests, could not be defeated by the act of the first taker. This would explain, on the one hand, the authorities cited, and, on the other, why (as was admitted to be the law) the term did not merge in a reversion vested in the judgment creditor. Assuming that to be so, his lordship had to consider, after all, what was delivered to the defendant. By the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 11, the sheriff was authorized to deliver execution of lands of which the judgment debtor "is seised or possessed." An estate in remainder or reversion expectant on an estate of freehold could not be delivered in execution: In re South, 22 W. R. 460, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 369; In re Harrison and Bottomley, 47 W. R. 307, [1899] 1 Ch. 465. Under the law as it stood prior to the passing of the Act 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, a moiety of the lands of the judgment debtor only could be extended; and it was held that if two writs were issued at the suit of different creditors, and a moiety of the freehold land of the debtor was extended under the first writ, the sheriff could not deliver a moiety of the entirety under the second writ, but only a moiety of the remaining moiety: Huit v. Coyan, Cro. Eliz. 483. It thus appeared that what was called in Dighton v. Greenvil the reversion of the judgment debtor in the first moiety could not be delivered. Since 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, it had been held in Carter v. Hughes that where a judgment creditor issued three writs of elegit on successive judgments, and the sheriff delivered to him possession of land under the first writ, he had no power to extend the same land under the second and third writs. In the present case the inquisition found that Mrs. Cole was "possessed" of certain land of the annual value of £200. In point of fact she was so possessed; for though she had made a mortgage of the lands by way of sub-demise, the mortgagees had not taken possession at the date of the inquisition, and she was in receipt of the rents and profits, and was in that way entitled to the land for an interest which was valuable so long as it lasted, but which might be determined at any moment by the mortgagees. It appeared to his lordship that the land must be taken to have been delivered to the defendant to the extent of that interest, and not in respect of the mere dry reversion expectant on the determination of the sub-demise, as to which the doctrine of In re South appeared to apply. The mortgagees had afterwards entered into possession; the determinable interest had been put an end to, and the right of the defendant as tenant by elegit had either been extinguished or was suspended. In either case it seemed to his lordship that any liability on the part of the defendant to pay the rent reserved by the original lease had come to an end, and consequently he was entitled to distrain. The motion, therefore, failed, and the action would be dismissed with costs.

Having taken that view on the merits of the case, it was unnecessary for his lordship to enter upon the consideration of a question which had been much argued—namely, whether or not the interest vested in the defendant until the inquisition had been filed in court. But having regard to what had happened, his lordship thought it right, having made some inquiries, to say a few words about it. The writ was expressly directed to the sheriff in these words: "And in what manner you shall have executed this our writ make appear to us in our court aforesaid immediately after the execution thereof under your seal and the seals of those by whose oath you shall make the said extent and appraisement, and have there then this writ." The proper and regular practice was that the sheriff should return the writ and have the inquisition and writ filed in the central office, and the only way in which the possession of the writ and inquisition by the solicitor to the defendant could be explained was, so far as his lordship could see, that he received it as agent for the sheriff with a view to filing. That practice had, his lordship understood, sprung up very recently, and the explanation of it appeared to be that upon filing a charge or stamp duty of 2s. 6d. became payable, which as the law stood was thrown upon the sheriff. With a view of escaping that obligation, and in the hope that the plaintiff would see his way to discharge the duty to the Exchequer, it had become the practice of the sheriff to hand over the writ to the plaintiff. It was very essential that the document which his lordship had before him should be filed in court, and if the solicitors to the defendant were willing to undertake to discharge the duty of the sheriff and file it, his lordship had nothing more to say. But, if not, he thought it must remain in the custody of the court, and he proposed to call upon the sheriff to show why the document, which ought to be in his custody, was not either in his possession or on the file of the court.

MILDMAY v. MILDMAY. (a.)

Will—Name and arms clause—Use of surname.

A devisee was directed to assume and use a prescribed surname "alone or together with" his own family name.

Held, that the use by the devisee of the prescribed surname before his own family name was a sufficient compliance with the direction.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons raising a question of construction of a "name and arms" clause in the will of the late Lord Eversley, who died in 1888.

By his will the testator devised his Heckfield Place Estate to the use of his daughter the Hon. Emma Laura Shaw-Lefevre and her assigns during her life, and after her death to the use of his daughter the Hon. Helena Lady St. John Mildmay and her assigns during her life, and after her death to the use of his grandson Gerald Anthony St. John Mildmay and his assigns during his life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Gerald Anthony Mildmay as tenants in tail male, with divers remainders over.

The will contained a declaration that any person who should become entitled as tenant for life to the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the said estate and who should not then use and bear the name and arms of Shaw-Lefevre should, within one year after he should so become entitled, take upon himself and use upon all occasions the surname of Shaw-Lefevre alone or together with his own family surname, and quarter the arms of Shaw-Lefevre with his own family arms, and should within the said one year take such steps as were requisite to authorize him to take, use, and bear the said surname and arms of Shaw-Lefevre. The testator further declared that in case any such person should refuse or neglect within the said one year to take, use, and bear such surname and arms, then the limitations thereinbefore contained to the use of such persons should absolutely determine.

Helena Lady St. John Mildmay died in September, 1897.

The Hon. Emma Laura Shaw-Lefevre died in April, 1899, when the present applicant, Mr. Gerald Anthony St. John Mildmay became tenant in possession, and the question now raised by him was whether according to the true construction of the said will, if within one year from April, 1899, he took and used the surname of Shaw-Lefevre immediately before his own, so as to call himself Shaw-Lefevre St. John Mildmay, that would be a sufficient compliance with the testator's directions, to prevent the limitations over from taking effect.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the tenant for life.—It is not here expressly provided whether the prescribed name shall be the last or only name; an option is given to the devisee, and it will be sufficient compliance with the terms of the gift if the tenant for life takes the name of Shaw-Lefevre immediately before his own name Mildmay.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts and reading the name and arms clause as above set out, continued:

The plaintiff now asks the opinion of the court whether it will be a sufficient compliance with this condition if he takes the name of "Shaw-Lefevre" and uses it before the name of "St. John Mildmay." The will which is before me is an artificially drawn will and uses terms of art. It is obviously the work of a lawyer, or of someone familiar with conveyancing who has made use of one of the regular forms. It is not the will of a man using inartificial or untechnical expressions—what has sometimes been referred to as a home-made will.

These clauses have been known for many years and occur in text-books covering a considerable period of time. In Butler's Note to 2 Co. Litt. 327*a*, published in 1787, a form is given in which provision is made that the party is to take "the surname of Browne only, and take and use no other surname, and quarter the arms of Browne with their own respective family arms," and so forth. As drawn it is a form to be used where it is desired that the surname required to be taken shall be taken in substitution for the surname which may then be used. I find also in Appendix I. to the first volume of Sanders on Uses (5th ed.), which was published in 1844, at p. 447, a precedent entitled "Proviso shifting the use upon neglect or refusal to take a name and bear certain arms." There the form runs, "take and use the surname of L. only and no other surname, and to quarter the arms of L. with his own family arms." Mr. Bythewood in the third edition of his collection of precedents of wills, published in 1849, includes as a common form a clause which runs, "apply for and obtain an Act of Parliament or Her Majesty's licence authorizing him or her to use the surname of [testator's surname] either alone or in addition to his or her own surname." And then in brackets, obviously intended as an alternative form, occur these words, "but so, nevertheless, that the surname of —— shall be the last or principal name."

The last text-book to which I need refer is Davidson, and the particular volume is that containing the introductory observations on settlements published in 1873. These were the work of the late Mr. Waley, an eminent conveyancer. I find on p. 355 of this volume this passage: "The form in this collection requires the use of the prescribed surname, together with the former family surname; but the clause may give the option of assuming the prescribed surname by way of substitution or of addition, and in the latter case may require that it shall be the last and principal name." I think I am justified in looking at the text-books to which I have referred for the purpose of ascertaining what is and has been the practice of conveyancers in the matter of drawing clauses of this description. In the absence of any direct authority I look at these precedents and bear in mind the fact that the clause is a penal clause which has to be construed strictly, but fairly, of course, in the sense that the court ought not to strain the words if it is satisfied that the testator has given a legitimate expression of his intention to impose this obligation on the objects of his bounty. Bearing this in mind I am of opinion that this clause does not impose the obligation on the applicant to take and use the name of "Shaw-Lefevre" after the family surname of "St. John Mildmay."

It is, I think, an illustration of the option referred to in the passage which I have read from Davidson, and leaves the applicant at liberty to assume the surname of "Shaw-Lefevre" instead of his family surname, or to use the surname of "Shaw-Lefevre" in addition to his family surname, but without imposing on him the obligation that that addition is to be an addition at the end of or after his name of St. John Mildmay.

(a.) Reported by RALEGH B. PHILLPOTTS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Now, the only thing that has caused me any difficulty is the case of D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, before the late Master of the Rolls, but the name and arms clause in that case is of a different description and makes use of different language from that used in the clause before me; the material words are: "Assume and take upon himself . . . and use . . . the surname of 'Gregory,' and assume and take and use the arms of 'Gregory' either alone or quartered with his, her, or their own family arms," and in that case the Master of the Rolls said he was clearly of opinion that the use of the surname of "Gregory" before that of "Welby" was not a sufficient compliance with the conditions contained in the will. Now, in the present case there is this clear distinction—namely, that the testator gives an option to the applicant to use the prescribed name "alone or together with his or her family surname." That by itself would distinguish this case from D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, but as a matter of fact I do not think that the clause in D'Eyncourt v. Gregory can be regarded as a clause equivalent to the clause used in the present will; and upon the construction of the present will I have come to the conclusion that I am justified in making a declaration to the effect that the taking by the tenant for life of the name of "Shaw-Lefevre" before his family name of "St. John Mildmay" will be a sufficient compliance with the terms of this clause so as to prevent the gift over from taking effect.

FARINA v. FICKERS. (a.)

Contract—Consideration of marriage—Representation—Testamentary intentions—"Share"—Performance.

Testator wrote to the plaintiff, his intending son-in-law: "You are, of course, aware that, with my large family, E. (his daughter) will have little fortune. She will have a share of what I leave after the death of her mother, who I wish to leave in a comfortable independence if I leave her a widow." The plaintiff married the daughter, relying upon the letter. The testator, dying subsequently, leaving eight children, left E. a legacy much less than one-eighth of his estate.

Held, that, if the letter was an offer, the court would presume it to be accepted; and Held, also, that the letter was not an offer resulting in a contract, but a mere statement of intention as to the future, and which, although relied on, gave no right either to specific performance or damages.

Held, also, that, if the letter imposed an obligation upon the testator, it was satisfied by the bequest of the legacy.

This was an action to enforce the statements made in a letter written by the father of a lady about to be married to his intending son-in-law as to his testamentary intentions in her favour.

In September, 1873, the plaintiff Johan Marie Farina, a German subject resident at Cologne, made a proposal of marriage to Miss Eliza Fickers, which she accepted, subject to the approval and consent of her father, the testator, William Fickers. Mr. Farina wrote to the testator a letter which was not forthcoming at the trial, and the testator, on the 21st of September, 1873, replied by a letter which contained the following passage:

"You are, of course, aware that, with my large family, Eliza will have little fortune. She will have a share of what I leave after the death of her mother, who I wish to leave in comfortable independence if I should leave her a widow. I hear your business is an excellent one, and that you have considerable property independent of your business. I should wish you to make such settlement on Eliza as will befit your position and, in case of death, leave her provided for. All this I will leave until I see you, feeling assured you will agree with me that if possible the contingencies of life should be guarded against. I mention these matters, not in any mercenary spirit, but believing you will wish to do what is right and just, and that we should have everything explained in an open and candid manner." The rest of this letter did not deal with or allude to questions of money or property.

This letter was kept by Mr. Farina, and was the one upon which the action was based.

In February, 1874, a marriage contract or settlement in German, drawn up as a notarial act, was executed in London by Mr. Farina, Mrs. Farina (then Miss Fickers), and the testator, in the presence of a notary public, providing among other things that there should not be community of goods between the future married couple. The testator was expressed to appear for the purpose, and was found by his lordship to appear only for the purpose of giving his full consent to the intended marriage. The marriage took place the following day.

The testator died in 1898, having made his will giving his daughter, Mrs. Farina, a legacy of £2,000 only, and giving the residue of his estate and effects equally between six other children in equal shares.

The testator's wife died before him.

He left, including Mrs. Farina, eight children.

The statement of claim alleged the estate to be of the net value of upwards of £100,000.

The plaintiff claimed for a declaration that the letter of the 21st of September, 1873, constituted a binding contract for valuable consideration by the testator to give or leave to his daughter, Mrs. Farina, in the events which had happened, one equal eighth part of his property, after payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and for consequential relief on that footing.

Warmington, Q.C., and P. F. Stokes, for plaintiff.—The letter of Mr. Fickers before the marriage was an offer which was accepted by the plaintiff, who married upon the faith of it. It thus became a contract binding upon the writer: Hammersley v. De Biel, 12 Cl. & Fin. 45; Synge v. Synge, 42 W. R. 309, [1894] 1 Q. B. 466; Coverdale v. Eastwood, 21 W. R. 216, L. R. 15 Eq. 121; Laver v. Fielder, 11 W. R. 245, 32 Beav. 1. There is no need of express acceptance of the offer; it will be presumed: Luders v. Anstey, 4 Ves. 501. The word "share" here means equal share, which is its ordinary meaning. It is like the words "her share" in Laver v. Fielder, and "participate" in Robertson v. Fraser, 19 W. R. 989, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 696, where the shares were treated as equal ones.

Astbury, Q.C., and Methold, for defendants.—The letter of the 21st of September, 1873, was not intended to be an offer, but a mere statement of intention. It cannot give rise to an action for representations, as intentions do not act by way of estoppel or create any legal obligation, but only those as to existing facts: Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 466; Loxley v. Heath, 8 W. R. 314, 1 De G. F. & J.; Fry on Specific Performance, 1892, p. 143, s. 316. If the plaintiff succeeds he must prove a contract, but the testator never intended to enter into a contract. Moreover all previous negotiations were concluded by the notarial contract. A share means any share.

Dec. 20.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—Questions of this nature have often come before the courts, and although it is not reasonable to construe the letter of the 21st of September, 1893, by reference to the construction put upon somewhat similar documents in other cases, it is important to have regard to certain principles which have been laid down as applicable to cases of this nature. A mere representation that the writer intends to do something in the future is not, though the person to whom it is made relies upon it, sufficient to entitle that person to obtain specific performance or damages. There must be a contract in order to entitle the party to any relief. This seems to me to result from the judgments in Hammersley v. De Biel, Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. C. 185, and Maddison v. Alderson. In the next place, I think that if the letter amounted to an offer by the testator which would become a contract if and when accepted by Mr. Farina, I must presume that it was accepted, and that the marriage took place on the faith of it: Luders v. Anstey. I do not think that the mere fact that a settlement was executed by the husband, but not by the lady's father, the writer of the letter, suffices to rebut this inference. Moreover, I have seen Mr. Farina in the box, and I feel no doubt that he jealously kept the testator's letter, and relied upon it as giving himself some rights. It remains, however, to consider whether there was a contract; and if so, whether there was a breach. The material words in the letter are these: "You are, of course, aware that, with my large family, Eliza will have little fortune. She will have a share of what I leave after the death of her mother, who I wish to leave in comfortable independence if I should leave her a widow." The plaintiff's contention is that the true meaning and effect of the letter is this: If you, Mr. Farina, will make a settlement on my daughter before her marriage I will give my assent, and, subject only to the rights of my widow, as to which I reserve to myself a free hand, I will bind myself to leave her by my will an equal share with all my other surviving children in my property, subject only to debts and testamentary expenses. Upon consideration I cannot bring myself to believe that this is the true effect of the letter. It is not, as in Hammersley v. De Biel, an "arrangement" proposed by the father and stated by him "to be sufficient" for the husband "to act upon." It is not, as in Laver v. Fielder, a statement that the writer would adhere to a "proposition" previously made. I regard it as in no sense a proposal or offer, but rather as a representation that the testator was not in a position to meet any proposal or to give his daughter anything at the time, but that he intended to give her something at his death. I do not regard it as an offer resulting in a contract by the testator. If, however, I am wrong in this view, it remains to consider whether there has been a breach. It has been argued that the words "my large family" mean "my children," and that the words "a share" means an equal share with my surviving children. If, for instance, at the testator's death there had been living Mrs. Farina and one other child of the testator, but there had been grandchildren, the issue of the six deceased children, it would follow that Mrs. Farina would be entitled to a sum equal to half the estate, and the other descendants could only get the remaining half between them. I cannot think that such a result was in the contemplation of the parties. The words are not "her share" as in Laver v. Fielder. I think "share" means "some part." The testator has given Mrs. Farina £2,000, and has satisfied the obligation, if any, imposed by the letter.

Hackney carriage—Definition of—Driver—Standing or plying for hire—Street—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 89), ss. 3, 38, 45.

The respondent stood for hire with an unlicensed carriage upon a cab-rank situated in a road adjoining a railway station. The road was the property of the railway company, subject to a public right of footway over and along it. An information against the respondent for standing for hire with an unlicensed carriage having been dismissed by the justices,

Held (affirming the decision of the justices), that the road was not a street within section 3 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847.

Held, also, that, in order to constitute an offence under section 45 of the same Act against the driver of a carriage, it must be proved that such carriage was a hackney carriage within the definition of hackney carriage in section 38.

Case stated by justices of Gloucestershire.

An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent, charging that on the 17th of July, 1899, at the parish of Cheltenham, he was found unlawfully standing for hire with a certain carriage within the prescribed distance in that behalf of the borough of Cheltenham, for which carriage a licence to ply for hire had not then previously been obtained, as required by the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, contrary to section 45 of the same Act.

It was proved or admitted that on the day in question the respondent was standing for hire within the prescribed distance in that behalf in the borough of Cheltenham with an unlicensed carriage on a cab-stand provided by the Great Western Railway on a piece of ground formerly a private road, and now metalled and paved like an ordinary road or street. The piece of ground adjoined and ran parallel with the arrival platform of the Great Western Railway passenger station at Cheltenham, and was the side approach to the station.

The piece of ground belonged to the railway company, having been acquired by them under the compulsory powers of the Great Western Railway (General Powers) Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. clxxix.). By section 51 of that Act all rights of way over the piece of ground were extinguished except a public right of footway over and along the same which the railway company were, by section 41, restricted from stopping up or interfering with.

Section 38 of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, defines a hackney carriage as "every wheeled carriage, whatever may be its form or construction, used in standing or plying for hire in any street within the prescribed distance," and by section 3 of the same Act, "street" is "to extend to and include any road, square, court, alley, and thoroughfare or public passage within the limits of the special Act."

Section 45 provides as follows: "If the proprietor or part proprietor of any carriage, or anyone so concerned as aforesaid, permits the same to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the prescribed distance without having obtained a licence as aforesaid for such carriage . . . or if any person be found driving, standing, or plying for hire with any carriage within the prescribed distance, for which such licence as aforesaid has not been previously obtained . . . every such person so offending" shall be liable to a penalty.

The justices dismissed the information, being of opinion that the place in question was not a street within the meaning of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, and that it was no offence to be found plying for hire with an unlicensed carriage on property other than a street, such carriage not being a hackney carriage within the definition of a hackney carriage in the Act.

Roskill, for the appellant.—In section 45 the cases of the proprietor of a carriage and the driver are separately dealt with. In the case of the driver it is not necessary to show that the carriage was used as a hackney carriage, because the words of the Act are "any carriage," not any hackney carriage. Assuming that is necessary to show that the carriage was a hackney carriage, this is proved in the present case, because the place where the respondent was standing for hire was a street within the Act. There was a right of footway over the whole of the ground and that made it a street. The case is therefore distinguishable from Curtis v. Embery, 21 W. R. 143, L. R. 7 Ex. 369.

Danckwerts, Q.C., for the respondent.—The ground on which the cab-stand was is not a street, there being no right of carriageway over it. It is not enough to make it a street that there should be a right of footway. On the other point the argument for the appellant amounts to this, that a private coachman would be within the section and liable to a penalty as a person plying for hire with a carriage.

Roskill replied.

CHANNELL, J.—The appeal must be dismissed. The case is covered by Curtis v. Embery, in which it was held that the term "street" as used in the Act meant a public street, not a private one. It has been suggested that the place here was within the term street because a public footway went along it. It is possible that had the vehicle been standing in the footway it might have been held to be standing in a street, but, standing where it was, I do not think that it could be said to be standing in a street.

The other point that was argued is that, whereas in Curtis v. Embery the summons was against the proprietor of the carriage, the fact here is that the summons has been taken out against the driver, and that the offence is different in the case of a driver, inasmuch as it is not necessary to prove that the carriage was a hackney carriage. In Curtis v. Embery it was held that it was necessary in the case of the proprietor to prove that the standing or plying for hire should have been in a street. I think that the same proof is necessary in the case of the driver. It is difficult to put a construction on the words "driving, standing, or plying for hire with any carriage," except as meaning using a hackney carriage.

BUCKNILL, J., concurred.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. EAST LONDON WATERWORKS CO. (a.)

Water—Waterworks—Metropolis—Fire hydrants—Right of company to use—User for extinguishing fire—User for other purposes—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 3, 37-43—Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 90), s. 32—Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), s. 34—London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxii.), s. 4.

A waterworks company which, under statutory obligation, has provided hydrants at the request, and maintained and repaired them at the expense, of the London County Council, and which, by the various statutes above referred to, is bound to provide a supply of water for extinguishing fire and for certain other specified purposes, and to allow all persons to use the water for extinguishing fire without making compensation, may use the hydrants for other purposes in addition to the supply of water for extinguishing fires, and such additional user may take place without the consent of the London County Council, and the right may, with the permission of the water company, be exercised by other persons.

Special case stated, in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants asking for a declaration that hydrants, fire-plugs, and apparatus provided, or to be provided, by the defendants pursuant to section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 90), and section 34 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), or pursuant to either of those sections, ought not, in the absence of any agreement under section 4 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict c. cxxii.); or, alternatively, ought not, without the consent of the London County Council, to be used for any purpose other than the supply of water for extinguishing fires; or, alternatively, for any purpose other than the supply of water for extinguishing fires and the purposes specified in section 37 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847; and for an injunction.

The action more particularly related to six hydrants, situated in five different roads. In and between the months of July and September, 1897, the streets in question were respectively in course of being paved with wood and channelled, and the defendants, from time to time during those months, without having obtained or asked the consent of the plaintiffs, used and allowed those engaged in the operations of so paving and channelling such streets to use the hydrants for the purpose of obtaining from the defendants' water-mains by means of such hydrants a supply of water for these operations.

The hydrants in question were provided by the defendants at the request in writing, dated the 14th of March, 1888, of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the plaintiffs' predecessors, such request being made under section 2 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, and section 34 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871. The costs of the defendants for providing the hydrants were paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works, or by the plaintiffs as their successors.

The Acts of Parliament under which the undertaking of the defendant company is carried on incorporate all material provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Acts, which provide, inter alia, that the defendants shall allow all persons at all times to take and use water for extinguishing fire without making compensation for the same, and further provide that the defendants and their undertaking shall be subject to the provisions of the Metropolis Water Acts.

Section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, enacts that every water company "shall provide at the expense of the board in any mains or pipes within the metropolis, plugs for the supply of water in case of fire, at such places, of such dimensions and in such form as the board may require, and the fire brigade shall be at liberty to make such use thereof as they may deem necessary for the purpose of extinguishing any fire."

Section 37 of the Waterworks Clauses Acts, 1847, provides that the waterworks company shall provide and keep constantly laid on, unless prevented by frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable accident, or during necessary repairs, a sufficient supply of water for the following purposes (that is to say), for cleansing the sewers and drains, for cleansing and watering the streets, and for supplying any public pumps, baths, or washhouses.

Section 38 provides that the waterworks company shall, at the request of the town commissioners (in the present case, the plaintiffs), fix proper plugs in the main and other pipes belonging to them.

Section 40 provides that the cost of such plugs and the expense of fixing, placing, and maintaining the same in repair are to be defrayed by the town commissioners.

Section 34 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, provides that section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, shall operate subject and according to certain provisions. One of these is that in that section the term "fire-plug" and the term "plug" is to include hydrant and all other apparatus necessary or proper in connection with the company's pipes for a supply of water in case of fire.

By section 40 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), the powers and duties and liabilities of the Metropolitan Board of Works were transferred to the plaintiffs.

By section 4 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894, it was enacted "That it shall be lawful for the council to enter into and carry into effect any agreement with the companies supplying water in London and the vestries and district boards of works in London, or any of them, respectively with respect to the use of fire hydrants for flushing and other purposes. . . . Provided that no agreement under this section with respect to any hydrant shall be valid unless the company owning the main or pipe with which the hydrant is connected, and the local authority (if any) to whom the hydrant belongs shall be a party thereto."

The questions of law for the court were:

(1) Whether hydrants, fire-plugs, and apparatus provided by the defendants pursuant to section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, and section 34 of the Metropolis Water Act, 1871, or pursuant to either of those sections, may (in the absence of any agreement under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894) lawfully be used for any purpose or purposes in addition to the supply of water for extinguishing fires.

And if the court shall as to any of such hydrants answer the preceding question in the affirmative, then:

(2) Whether such additional user is limited to the purposes specified in section 37 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, or to any and what purposes.

(3) Whether such additional user may take place without the consent of the London County Council thereto.

(4) Whether such right of user is confined to the defendants themselves, or may, with the permission of the defendants, be exercised by persons other than the defendants.

English Harrison, Q.C. (Daldy with him), for the plaintiffs.—The Acts of Parliament indicate a general intention that the water passing through the hydrants should be used for no purpose but extinguishing fires. These indications are found in sections 37-43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and also in section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865.

Cripps, Q.C., and Acland, for the defendants.—The sections referred to impose special obligations on the waterworks company, but are not a limitation of their user of the hydrants for other purposes than extinguishing fires. There is no statutory limitation of such user. They referred to Moore v. Lambeth Waterworks Co., 34 W. R. 559, 17 Q. B. D. 462, at p. 465.

BRUCE, J., said: In this case the question for the opinion of the court is whether the hydrants or fire-plugs provided by the defendants may, in the absence of any agreement under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894, be used for any other purpose than for extinguishing fires. I am of opinion that that question should be answered in the affirmative. There is no provision in any clause of the Acts which limits the water company's rights to use the water from the hydrants. There are many obligations imposed on the water company with reference to the necessity of providing water for public purposes, but I see nothing to limit their rights of drawing water for any purpose required. Having answered that question in the affirmative, I answer the second question put by the case in the negative, the third in the affirmative, and the fourth in the negative.

PHILLIMORE, J., said: Various burdens are imposed by Act of Parliament on water companies, and one of these obligations is to provide at the expense of certain public authorities fire-plugs or hydrants for the purpose of being used for extinguishing fires They are bound to supply these, and to permit them to be inspected and repaired, and they are bound to allow water to be drawn from them, not only by the authorities of the city or town, but by every person who requires water for the purpose of extinguishing fires, and they are bound to allow the water to be drawn without making a charge for it. All these are obligations imposed on the water company, and the only inference to be drawn from their existence is that there are no other obligations than those imposed. The whole matter is the creation of statute and the statutes have stated what the obligations are.

It is said that the water company are not to be allowed to use the water from the hydrants for other purposes. If facts had been laid before us from which we were empowered to draw inferences, and we had drawn the inference that the use of the hydrants by the water company would prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining a supply of water, it might be different; but there is nothing in the case which suggests that any mischief would occur by the water being used by the company for the purposes for which they wish to use it. The hydrants are put up by the waterworks company at the expense of the London County Council, and their predecessors; they work in the company's pipes and are used for the purpose of conveying the water of the company.

I think, therefore, that the hydrants belong to the water company, though for certain purposes access and user and interference with the hydrants must be permitted to other persons.

Therefore I agree that there should be judgment for the defendants with costs.

The power given by ord. 65, r. 1, to the judge at the trial of an action to deprive a successful party of costs is not taken away or affected by section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893; and, therefore, if in an action brought against a public authority for any act done in pursuance of any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority, judgment is obtained by the defendants after a trial with a jury, the judge has, for good cause, a discretion to deprive the successful defendants of costs; and in determining what is good cause the judge may take into consideration the antecedent conduct of the party which led to the litigation.

Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry, [1899] 1 Q. B. 693, not followed.

Further consideration by Lord Russell, C.J., in an action tried with a jury.

The facts were thus stated in the judgment of the learned judge.

The action was for malicious prosecution and was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, the local authority for the district, charging the authority with maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause causing the plaintiff to be prosecuted. The result of that prosecution was favourable to the plaintiff, the learned judge having directed the jury to find a verdict of acquittal.

The charge against the plaintiff, which was the subject of that prosecution, arose as follows: The plaintiff was the part proprietor of a travelling circus, and when the circus visited the town of Ramsey the representative of the plaintiff placed his vehicles in a part of a public thoroughfare where the local authority thought that such placing would cause an obstruction of the highway. The local authority took no steps to have the carriages removed from the public highway and the circus was held, as it had been held on previous occasions in the same place apparently without any objection on the part of the local authority.

The plaintiff himself was not present on the occasion, but after allowing the circus to be held without any notice to the plaintiff, the local authority preferred an indictment against him at the Huntingdonshire assizes for obstructing the highway. The plaintiff was tried upon this indictment, and when the case had proceeded a little way the judge—Wills, J.—decided that there was no evidence on which he could properly be convicted, and he was consequently acquitted.

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action for malicious prosecution, and at the trial of the action Lord Russell, C.J., at the end of the case arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff had failed to prove his case as he failed to show either that he had been prosecuted maliciously, or that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause. The learned judge ruled that the plaintiff having failed to establish these two things, had made out no case against the defendants, and he gave judgment for the defendants, but in considering the question of costs he came to the conclusion that there was good cause for depriving the defendants of their costs upon the ground that the defendants had, in the circumstances of the case, acted unreasonably in preferring an indictment against the plaintiff instead of taking some other means, such as requesting policemen to remove the obstruction.

No question was raised at the trial as to the power of the learned judge to deprive the successful defendants of their costs, but it was afterwards arranged between the parties that the point should be argued on further consideration.

The question now argued was whether the learned judge had jurisdiction to deprive the successful defendants of their costs.

The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), provides—section 1: "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect: (b) Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client."

Ord. 65, r. 1, provides that the costs of an action shall be in the discretion of the court or judge, provided that where the action is tried with a jury the costs shall follow the event unless the judge by whom the action is tried, or the court, shall for good cause otherwise order.

Blake Odgers, Q.C. (P. Rose-Innes with him), for the plaintiff.—Ord. 65, r. 1, gives the judge a discretion, when the action is tried with a jury, to deprive, for good cause, the successful party of his costs. Section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, does not affect or take away that discretion. When that section says that a judgment for the defendants shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, it does not mean that in all cases where a judgment is obtained by the defendants it shall carry costs, but it merely means that in a case in which costs ought to be given, then those costs ought to be costs as between solicitor and client. It in no way interferes with the discretion of the judge for good cause to deprive the successful defendants of costs. There was a similar provision in the Public Health Act, 1848, and also in section 264 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and notwithstanding the imperative words in section 264 that the action should "be tried in the county or place where the cause of action occurred, and not elsewhere," it was held in Itchin Bridge Co. v. Southampton Local Board, 6 W. R. 223, 8 E. & B. 801*n*, that these words did not take away the discretion of the court to change the venue; and it was also held in Avery v. Wood, 39 W. R. 577, [1891] 3 Ch. 115, that "full costs" in an Act meant merely costs as between party and party. This Act of 1893, although it repeals many Acts, does not repeal this rule, which is therefore applicable to this case. In Robinson v. Workington Corporation, 45 W. R. 453, [1897] 1 Q. B. 619, Cave, J., deprived the successful defendants of their costs, but the point was not raised or argued before him or the Court of Appeal. The question came before Stirling, J., in Holford v. Acton Urban District Council, [1898] 2 Ch. 240, 46 W. R. Dig. 169, and before Romer, J., in Harrop v. Ossett Corporation, 46 W. R. 391, [1898] 1 Ch. 525, and in North Metropolitan Tramways Co. v. London County Council, 46 W. R. 554, [1898] 2 Ch. 145; but it was not expressly decided in those cases. Bruce, J., expressly decided the point in Cree v. St.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Pancras Vestry, [1899] 1 Q. B. 693, 47 W. R. Dig. 166, where he held that the discretion of the judge to deprive the successful defendants of costs was entirely taken away by section 1 (b) of the Act. That was a decision of a judge sitting at nisi prius, and is not binding on this court.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (J. W. Cooper with him), for the defendants.—The question is expressly decided in favour of the defendants by the judgment of Bruce, J., in Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry. That is the decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, and is binding on this court. That decision is express on the point that the discretionary power which the judge has under the rule is expressly taken away by section 1 (b). This Act of 1893 came after the rule, which came into operation in 1883, and if the Legislature had intended that the discretionary power of the judge should still exist then it would have been easy to have inserted words in section 1 (b) to show that intention, but they have not done so. The decision, therefore, in Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry is right. There is a second point—namely, that in determining whether there is good cause or not the judge is confined to the actual litigation and cannot take into consideration matters which were antecedent to the litigation, such as the conduct of the defendants in this case in the criminal prosecution.

Lord RUSSELL, C.J.—The question that is raised in this case is undoubtedly one of general importance, as to which it is desirable to have the authoritative opinion of the Court of Appeal. There are two points raised—first, whether in the circumstances of this case there was in fact good cause to justify me in exercising the power to deprive the defendants of costs, if I had the power to do so; and in the next place, whether, looking at the character of this action, and the public authority against which it was brought, I have in fact any authority or discretion in the matter. I have, therefore, to deal with both these points. [His lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:] At the trial before me the plaintiff was bound to establish two things—that he had been prosecuted maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause. I came to the conclusion at the end of the case that neither of those two things had been made out, and I accordingly ruled that the plaintiff had made out no case against the defendants, and I gave judgment for the defendants, but without costs, as I then considered—assuming I had the power to deprive of costs—that the conduct of the defendants in not taking some simple steps, such as removing the obstruction or calling in a policeman to do so, was in itself good cause for depriving the defendants of costs. That question has now been argued, and it has been very properly urged for the defendants that although the conduct of the defendants may have been unreasonable in not taking the simple steps I have suggested to remove the obstruction instead of preferring an indictment against the plaintiff, yet that is not a cause which ought to operate in the mind of a judge in considering the question whether there is good cause for depriving of costs. It seems to me that the antecedent conduct of the parties does properly enter into the consideration of the question whether there was good cause or not. If the antecedent conduct of the party led in the first instance to the prosecution and brought about the necessity of the plaintiff to endeavour to vindicate himself against this charge, and if it was, in fact, such conduct which brought the litigation about, then, although it was not in fact conduct in the litigation, I think it was conduct which the judge, having to dispose of the question of costs, might properly take into consideration. I therefore made the order that the defendants should be deprived of their costs; but I agree that the point is well worthy of consideration whether the judge is to be confined to considering the question of the conduct of the defendant in the actual litigation, and whether he is precluded from extending his consideration to the antecedent events which led up to and were the occasion of that litigation. The view I take is that he is not so precluded.

Then the second question, which was the one mainly argued, is—assuming that there was good cause—had I the authority to deal with the question? The Legislature have for a considerable time afforded protection to local authorities, and they have done so because they are public authorities and not private persons. That protection has taken various forms, such as limitation, special provisions as to notice, and as to costs; and the main question in this case is whether the special provisions as to costs are intended by the Legislature, and are effective for the purpose of depriving the court of the discretionary power as to costs which in other cases it possesses. To begin with the power of the court to deal with costs as given by the rules of court, it is not necessary to go back further than ord. 65, r. 1, of the rules of 1883, which with a slight variation is the same as the corresponding order in the rules of 1875. The provision in ord. 65, r. 1, is that, "Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge." It cannot be doubted that these words apply to all the proceedings in the Supreme Court and to proceedings against all classes of persons or bodies in the Supreme Court. But there is a limitation upon that: "Provided, also, that where any action, cause, matter, or issue is tried with a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless the judge by whom such action, cause, matter, or issue is tried, or the court, shall for good cause otherwise order." That is a rule having the force of a statutory enactment, which in all cases gives the court discretion over the costs, but with a stipulation that in the case of a trial with a jury the costs are to follow the event unless the judge shall for good cause otherwise order. Then we come to the legislation in favour of public authorities. Previous to the Public Health Act, 1848, there were provisions in the same direction, if not to the same effect, but it is enough to begin with the Act of 1848. That Act contained a provision which in substance is repeated in the Public Health Act, 1875. As there is no material difference between these two I refer to the Act of 1875, and section 264 of that Act contains the provision I refer to. [His lordship read the section.] The section goes on to enact that: "Every such action . . . shall be tried in the county or place where the cause of action occurred and not elsewhere." That is a very emphatic provision. It says that the action "shall be tried"—not that the venue shall be laid—but that it shall be tried "in the county or place where the cause of action occurred," and then it adds with further emphasis "and not elsewhere." Then the section goes on—"and if . . . the jury find generally for the defendant . . . then the defendant shall be entitled to full costs of suit, and have judgment accordingly." This language as to costs is certainly not more emphatic than the clause as to where the action shall be tried. The construction of this part of the section came before the court in banc so far back as the year 1858 in the Itchin Bridge Co. v. Southampton Local Board, and the court came to the conclusion that those words, emphatic as they were, did not take away the discretion of the court where the convenience of the case and the needs of justice required the discretion of the court to change the venue. That is a decision which has lasted for forty-one years, and which, so far as I know, has never been questioned, but has since been acted upon. Those words are not the words we have now to deal with, as the existing provision is contained in section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. The question is, Do the words in that section take away the discretion of the court, where there is good cause, to deprive the successful defendant authority of their costs? The language is not more emphatic, perhaps not so emphatic, as the language in the Act of 1875 as to the venue, where it was held that the discretion was not taken away. It is quite right that where the public authority succeeds and is not in any way to blame for the proceedings in the litigation, the authority should be indemnified by getting costs as between solicitor and client and not merely as between party and party. But if the public authority has brought the litigation upon itself by its unreasonable course of conduct, why, any more than in the case of a private individual, should the discretion of the court not be exercisable in regard to that public authority. I fail to see any reason in principle why the Legislature should have had any such idea in its mind, and I do not know that there is any reason of public policy or good sense which suggests any difference. Then how does authority deal with this matter? While there are expressions unquestionably, in some of the cases cited, which would seem to indicate that—in the mind of Bruce, J., particularly—there was some fetter upon the discretion of the court, there is no decision in the cases cited before me, with one exception, which is to the effect that the discretion of the court has been taken away if good cause exists for exercising the discretion. The one case which is an authority, and a clear and distinct authority for the defendants, is the decision of Bruce, J., in Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry. Perhaps a stronger case of the unreasonableness of this legislation, if the view of that legislation put forward for the defendants is correct, could not be cited than the facts of that case, and the fact that Bruce, J., having formed the opinion that the discretion of the court was taken away, came to the decision much against his will that he was obliged to give the defendants their costs. Am I bound by that decision? I have unfeigned respect for the opinion of Bruce, J., and if that were a judgment of long standing and acquiesced in, I should feel that I ought to conform to it; but it is neither one nor the other, and, moreover, I do not find from the report of the case that this question was argued before him at all. I therefore do not feel bound to conform to that decision. I think it is not straining the language of the statute to say that it means no more than this, that wherever in such an action a judgment is obtained by the defendants, in such cases as they are entitled to costs those costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client—that is to say, that it leaves untouched the discretion of the judge in order to enable him in such cases as that before Bruce, J., to deal with the question of costs. I wish to guard myself against one possible suggestion. I am not by any means clear that even where the defendants get their costs, and the judge designed that they should get their costs, it would not be equally in the discretion of the judge to say that the scale might not be as between solicitor and client. I am not at all sure that the discretion does not override both the question of their getting costs and the question what those costs should be, but it is not necessary to discuss or decide that point. I therefore think that I have jurisdiction to deprive the defendants of their costs for good cause, and that there was good cause in this case, and I give judgment for the defendants, but without costs.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Channell, JJ.) Nov. 21.

In re WILTSHIRE.
Ex parte EYNON. (a.)

Bill of sale—True statement of consideration—Money "now paid"—Promissory note not yet due—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 8.

A bill of sale stated the consideration therefor to be a sum of money "now paid" by the grantee to the grantor. Of the money paid by the grantee to the grantor a part was, in pursuance of a previous agreement between them, applied by the grantor to the retirement of a promissory note then current upon which the grantor and grantee were jointly and severally liable to a third party.

Held, that as the liability, to the satisfaction of which the money was agreed to be applied, was a liability to a third person and not to the grantee, the fact that the liability was not a debt already due did not render it obligatory to set out in the bill of sale the agreement as to the application of the money, and that the consideration of the bill was not untruly stated.

Appeal from the county court of Glamorganshire.

On the 18th of September, 1897, the appellant Eynon signed as surety a joint and several promissory note with the debtor Wiltshire in favour of Lloyd's Bank for £100 payable three months after date. This note, not being met at maturity, was renewed for a further three months from the 22nd of December, 1897. In February, 1898, the debtor borrowed £100 from Eynon, and in March of the same year applied to him for a further loan of £200. Eynon granted this further loan upon the debtor agreeing to devote £100 to retiring the promissory note above mentioned, and to give a bill of sale to secure the whole of the sums advanced. The consideration for the bill of sale was stated therein as "£300 now paid."

The debtor became bankrupt in April, 1898, and the trustee in the bankruptcy moved in the county court of Glamorganshire for an order declaring the bill of sale void upon the ground that the consideration for the same was not truly stated.

The county court judge held, upon the authority of Richardson v. Harris, 37 W. R. 426, 22 Q. B. D. 268, that the consideration was not truly stated, and declared the bill of sale void.

Eynon appealed.

H. Reed, Q.C., and Bailhache, for the appellant.—The case of Richardson v. Harris is clearly distinguishable; there the acceptances paid off were held by the grantee himself, but in this case the promissory note was in favour of a third party. A collateral agreement as to the application of the money lent does not form any part of the consideration for the bill of sale, and there is no need to set it forth: Ex parte National Mercantile Bank, In re Haynes, 28 W. R. 848, 15 Ch. D. 42; In re Davies, Ex parte Equitable Investment Co., 4 Mans. 358, 46 W. R. Dig. 18; Ex parte Challinor, In re Rogers, 29 W. R. 205, 16 Ch. D. 260.

Muir Mackenzie and Ivor Bowen, for the respondent.—The consideration for the granting of the bill of sale was not truly stated therein. It should be stated in such terms that anyone who searched at the office where bills of sale are filed would be able to ascertain the amount paid to the grantor: Richardson v. Harris. Further, in this case the promissory note in favour of Lloyd's Bank was not due at the date of the execution of the bill of sale, and its retirement was part of the consideration for the bill of sale and should have been stated. Only £100 was received by the debtor; the other cheque for £100 was payable to the order of Lloyd's Bank, and that cannot be regarded as payment to the debtor at all.

They referred to Mayer v. Mindlewitch, 59 L. T. Rep. 400, 37 W. R. Dig. 24; Darlow v. Bland, 45 W. R. 177, [1897] 1 Q. B. 125.

WRIGHT, J.—I think the learned county court judge mistook the effect of Richardson v. Harris. In my opinion it does not govern this case. There the liability on the bills of exchange was a liability to the grantee himself, and as the bills were current and the money was not then due, the retention by the grantee of the amount of the bills could not be treated as a payment to the grantor. Here the liability on the note was to a third person—namely, the bank; and if the money was in fact paid to the grantee to discharge the liability, it is immaterial whether that liability was a debt due or only one accruing. As to the point that the cheque drawn in favour of Lloyd's Bank was not a payment to the debtor at all, it is a sufficient answer that, as the debtor had an account at that bank both the cheques ought to be treated as paid to him. If he had not had an account then I might have felt compelled to decide otherwise.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think that the case upon which the learned county court judge acted does not apply. The facts are that Eynon at the date of the bill of sale lent the debtor a further sum of £200 upon the condition that £100 of that sum should be applied in a particular way. But the agreement as to the application does not affect the loan. It is no part of the consideration. The effect of the cases seems to be this: that if, by the agreement, the money is to be applied in paying someone else, it does not matter whether the debt is due at the date of the bill of sale or not; but if it is to be retained by the grantee, then in order to justify the description of the consideration as money now paid, the debt must be already due. If the agreement had been that Eynon should pay the bank, then I think that the consideration would not have been truly stated.

HENSEY v. WHITE.

Appeal from the decision of the Bedford County Court judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant was the widow of Charles Hensey, who was at the time of his death in the respondent's employment. It appeared that the respondent's workmen had to begin their work in the morning by starting a gas engine. Upon the first working day after the Christmas holidays, 1898, Hensey and three other men proceeded to light the gas in the engine, and in order to start it it was necessary to turn a large wheel. Hensey tried to hoist the wheel, while the three other men tried to pull it down on the other side. Owing to the lapse of time since the engine had been last used air had got into it, and caused a difficulty in starting the wheel. The men made one unsuccessful attempt to move it, and upon the second attempt they succeeded in doing so, when Hensey suddenly put his hand to his stomach and left the place where the engine was. He was found immediately afterwards vomiting blood, and he died. The deceased man had been employed on the work for several years. According to the medical evidence death was caused by rupture of the small blood-vessels of the stomach and intestines. A post-mortem examination was made, and the medical evidence showed that the deceased man had been suffering from chronic indigestion, which had weakened the blood-vessels of the stomach and intestines, and that there were symptoms of congestion and inflammation. The only question in the case was whether the death was caused by an accident. Medical evidence was given on both sides as to the cause of death. The county court judge held that to make it an accident there must be something beyond the mere fact of a disease suddenly taking a fatal turn; for instance, some break in the machinery, some fall of the workman, or something else out of the ordinary and normal course of the workman's employment. It was not enough that ordinary hard work, carried on by the workman in the manner intended, had, as he worked, suddenly caused his disease to take a fatal form. He found as a fact that the death was caused by exudation of blood from the stomach, the result of congestion and chronic inflammation of the internal coat of the stomach caused or accompanied by congestion of the numerous small blood-vessels there. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondent.

Dec. 2.—Montague Shearman, for the appellant.—The actual immediate cause which produces the effect is the only cause the law will look to. The predisposing cause cannot be looked at. The county court judge did not distinguish between the two. The actual immediate cause of death was the strain; the predisposing cause was the disease of the stomach. The county court judge had in effect only found that without the disease the strain would not have caused death. That was not enough. The strain was the proximate cause of death, and therefore the death was caused by an accident.

He referred to Winspear v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 116, 6 Q. B. D. 42; Lawrence v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 802, 7 Q. B. E. Morten, for the respondent, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The sole question we have to consider is whether upon the findings of the county court judge the death of the workman was caused by accident. The man was at his ordinary work, his duty being to assist in starting the gas engine, and this was done by setting the wheel in motion. The engine not having been used during the Christmas holidays, the wheel had become stiff, and there was some difficulty in setting it in motion. The deceased man was attempting to hoist the wheel, when he suddenly put his hand to his stomach and immediately afterwards he died. The post-mortem examination showed that his stomach was not in a sound condition. Medical evidence was given on both sides as to the man's condition, and the county court judge upon the evidence found that the death was caused by the disease, owing to the bursting of the blood vessels in the stomach, the result of the man's ordinary work, though on this occasion the work was a little more arduous than usual. The judge came to the conclusion that the man died from the disease and not from an accident. We cannot disturb that finding of fact. Cases on accident policies have been cited to us. We do not in any way infringe upon any of those decisions, the judge here having found that disease and not accident was the cause of death. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear upon the findings of the county court judge that the element of accident is entirely wanting. The injury arose in the ordinary course of the deceased man's work, though there may have been more exertion than usual used by him in that work on the occasion in question. In Hamilton v. Pandorf, 36 W. R. 369, at p. 370, 12 App. Cas. 518, at p. 524, Lord Halsbury said: "I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words, 'peril' or 'accident.'" That element is wanting in the present case. In the cases which have been cited a fortuitous and unexpected element existed which was the proximate and ultimate cause of death.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., concurred.

LLOYD v. SUGG & CO. (LIMITED).

Appeal from the decision of the Westminster County Court judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The respondent, George Lloyd, was a smith in the employment of the appellants at their engineering works at Westminster. The respondent was at the time of the accident holding a flatter on an anvil for another workman, called a hammerer, to strike the flat end of the flatter, when the hammerer by accident struck the rod or round part of the flatter and jarred the respondent's hand. In consequence the hand became swollen, and gout in the hand was brought on. The doctor who attended the respondent, and who was called as a witness by the appellants, said that he had attended the respondent previously to the accident for gout in the hand and elbow, that the respondent had gouty diathesis, and that he thought the swollen hand was caused by gout brought on by the jar. The doctor's certificate stated that the respondent was suffering from a weak hand caused partially by the injury. At the end of his notes of the evidence the county court judge reported that he awarded the respondent 15s. a week, stating that the respondent came within the Act.

Dec. 2.—Spencer Bower, for the appellants.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—As these appeals can only be brought upon some question of law, I desire to say that it would be a great convenience to this court if county court judges would certify as particularly as they can what are their findings of fact in each case. In the present case the judge has only reported at the end of his notes that he awarded the respondent 15s. a week, and we have been told that the judge said that the respondent came within the Act. The point now taken is that there is no evidence that the injury to the respondent was occasioned solely by the accident. It seems, also, to have been argued before the county court judge that there was no accident. That point seems to me to be a bad one. It was the respondent's duty to hold the flatter on the anvil for another man, called a hammerer, to strike the flat end of it, but the hammerer struck the rod or round part of the flatter, and thereby jarred the respondent's hand. That mis-hit was an accident, and if it had broken the respondent's hand or arm the case would have been admittedly within the Act. That point was not argued here, but it was argued that the injury to the hand was caused by gout and not by the accident. The doctor's certificate, however, stated that the respondent was suffering from a weak hand caused partially by the injury. Anyone may have a weak hand. Is it to be said that only workmen with strong hands come within the Act? No such proposition is tenable. The injury to the hand was caused by an accident. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case seems to me to be a perfectly clear one. The jar to the hand was occasioned by the hammerer hitting the rod of the flatter instead of the flat end. The essential element of an accident causing injury exists. We must assume that the county court judge found all the facts necessary to support his decision in favour of the workman. It is argued that the injury supervening upon the jar would not have been nearly so great if it had not been for the gout. To my mind that is quite immaterial. There is the accident and the consequent injury. The extent of the injury must always depend upon the constitution or condition of the injured person at the time of the accident. The principle which is always followed in cases where compensation for personal injuries caused by negligence has to be assessed, so far as regards the causes which contribute to the disability, applies to cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Take the case of a delicate lady receiving a shock in a railway accident. The injury to her is much greater than in the case of a lady in perfect health. In each case the court has to deal with the then existing condition of the injured person, and has to award compensation for the ultimate result.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

WALKER v. LILLESHALL CO. (LIMITED).

Appeal from the decision of the Bow County Court judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The appellant was an engine-fitter in the employment of the respondents, who were engineers and ironfounders. The appellant on the 17th of April 1899, was engaged in fixing some machinery. He was working at steampipe joints, it being the duty of a labourer to put red lead on the joints, the appellant having then to screw the pipes into position. The appellant had in the previous week blistered one of the fingers of his right hand while chipping steel plates for a large engine at the same works. On the day of the accident the appellant showed the blister to the foreman, and said that he thought it was hardly fit for him to do the job. The foreman replied that he must do it, as the engine had to work that afternoon. The appellant accordingly did the work. The next night the finger became inflamed from the red lead and oil.

The county court judge said that the appellant had received a serious injury whilst working in the respondents' employment in the ordinary way with the usual materials and appliances, and that there was no accident within the meaning of the Act of 1897. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents.

Dec. 16.—Bassett Hopkins, for the appellant.

T. W. Chitty, for the respondents, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., said that to bring it within the Act there must be, by section 1, sub-section 1, personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the workman's employment. The sole question is whether there has been an accident. The personal injury is beyond all question. The appellant's finger had been blistered, and upon the occasion in question his finger came in contact with red lead and oil while he was working in the ordinary way and with the usual materials, and was seriously injured. There are two cases, decided a fortnight ago, in which a similar question arose. In Hensey v. White, ante, p. 257, the workman was suffering from congestion and chronic inflammation of the stomach, which caused the blood-vessels to become congested, and the man died through the bursting of the blood-vessels while at his ordinary work, though at the time of his death the work was more arduous than usual. The county court judge found as a fact that the man died of inherent weakness of the blood-vessels and not from an accident, and this court dismissed the appeal. Collins, L.J., in that case said that "it was clear on the findings of the county court judge that the element of accident was entirely wanting. The injury arose in the ordinary course of the deceased man's work, though there might have been a little more exertion used by him in that work on the occasion in question than was usual. In Hamilton v. Pandorf, 12 App. Cas. 518, at p. 524, Lord Halsbury said that he thought that the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected was involved in the word 'accident.' That element was wanting in the present case. In the cases which had been cited a fortuitous and unexpected element existed which was the proximate and ultimate cause of death." I entirely adopt that proposition. The other case is Lloyd v. Sugg & Co., ante, p. 258, where the workman was holding a flatter on an anvil for another man to hammer. The duty of the latter man was to hit the flat end of the flatter, but he struck the rod or round part and jarred the other workman's hand. That was an injury caused by a mis-hit, it was entirely fortuitous, and was therefore an accident. In the present case there was no accident.

COLLINS, L.J., agreed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not at all mean to decide that if such a point as I am going to suggest had been made at the trial there might not have been an accident within the meaning of the rule stated by my brother Collins. The appellant had got his hand in such a state that it was advisable to avoid bringing it in contact with the poisonous lead. If he had thought that he could do his ordinary work, and at the same time avoid bringing his hand in contact with the poison, and yet from want of care he brought his hand in contact with it and injury ensued therefrom, I do not say that that would not have been an accident. The point, however, was not taken, and does not now arise.

Appeal dismissed.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF BIRKENHEAD UNION. (a.)

Poor law—Rating—Lairages—Profit-earning capacity—Evidence of receipts and expenditure—Structural value—Ordinary method of ascertaining rental value unavailable—Principle of assessment.

The appellants were the owners and occupiers of certain lairages, consisting of lands and buildings situated on the side of the River Mersey. These hereditaments were assessed to the poor rate. In ascertaining the rental value of these premises for the purpose of assessing the rate it was not possible to compare them with other similar hereditaments, as no other lairages existed in the neighbourhood; nor by merely considering the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land on which they stood was it possible to ascertain the rent a hypothetical tenant from year to year would give. The profit-earning capacity of the hereditaments, together with the structural value, were therefore taken into consideration, and evidence of the receipts and expenditure of the appellants in the conduct of the business of the lairages was admitted.

Held, that such evidence was admissible, and that the proper principle of assessment had been adopted.

This was an appeal by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) on a case stated by the quarter sessions at Birkenhead.

The case is as follows:

1. Upon an appeal by the above-named appellants against a certain rate and assessments made for the relief of the poor of the township of Birkenhead, in the county of Chester, on the 16th of May, 1896, which said appeal came on for hearing at the general quarter sessions of the peace in and for the borough of Birkenhead on the 5th and 6th of January, 1898, and the 25th of March, 1898, when upon hearing counsel for both parties the court allowed the said appeal by ordering the said assessments appealed against to be reduced by reducing the rateable values stated therein from £17,400 and £4,251 to £12,622 and £3,414 respectively, subject to the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of her Majesty's High Court of Justice upon the following case.

2. The appellants are a corporation incorporated and regulated under various Acts of Parliament, under which they hold and manage docks and other property on both sides of the River Mersey. The Acts relevant to this appeal are the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act, 1857, the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, and the Mersey Docks Harbour (Works) Act, 1858, which are taken as part of this case.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3. The appellants are the owners and occupiers of certain lairages situate on the Birkenhead side of the River Mersey, a portion of which lairages is known as the Woodside lairages, and is entirely within the township of Birkenhead, and the other portion of such lairages is known as the Wallasey lairages, and only a part thereof is within the township of Birkenhead.

4. On the 16th of May, 1896, a rate of 1s. 4d. in the £ for the relief of the poor in the town of Birkenhead was duly made and allowed, and in the part of the rate relating to the lairages of the appellants in the Birkenhead township the appellants are named as owners and occupiers thereof, and the property is rated separately as follows: (1) Woodside lairages, £19,333 gross, and £17,400 rateable value; (2) quay space, roadway for cattle, &c., from landing stages to township boundary and sheds connected with Wallasey lairages, £5,223 gross, and £4,700 rateable value.

5. The appellants gave notice of objection to the assessment committee of the Birkenhead Union, who made no reduction in the assessment of the Woodside lairages, but reduced the assessment of the part of the Wallasey lairages in the Birkenhead township to the figures following: Gross estimated rental, £4,723; rateable value, £4,251. The appellants thereupon gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions of the borough of Birkenhead, who adopted the figures of the gross estimated rental appearing in the rate-book, but reduced the rateable values in respect of the Woodside and Wallasey lairages as stated in the first paragraph hereof, and the present case is stated by such court.

6. The lairages are buildings of brick and wood, roofed partly with felt and partly with slate, used for the reception and slaughter of cattle and sheep brought from abroad, and for the cooling and preservation of the carcases. Two of the buildings now used as lairages were originally warehouses—one a warehouse of several storeys and another a warehouse of two storeys, erected and formerly used for the storage of general produce. Certain sloping galleries were constructed outside the warehouses with entrances thereto to enable the cattle to walk up to the various storeys, and the warehouses are fitted with pens and other fittings necessary for lairages, slaughter-houses, cooling-rooms, and stores. The other buildings are designed and constructed for the purpose of lairages, slaughter-houses, cooling-rooms, and stores, and are fitted with pens and other fittings necessary for the above purposes, and are for the most part of one storey. The cattle are landed at Woodside and Wallasey landing-stages, and are driven direct from the ship into the lairages, and, after a shorter or longer interval, never exceeding ten days, are slaughtered, and the meat is subsequently removed by the respective consignees. The lairages and premises comprised in the assessments, including the buildings formerly used as warehouses, and the parts of the Woodside and Wallasey landing-stages used for the landing of cattle, are separated by a continuous fence from the rest of the dock estate, and the premises within the fence are defined as mentioned in paragraph 7. The said premises are the only place in the neighbourhood at which foreign animals can be landed except under penalties as provided by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 but there are lairages for foreign animals at Deptford, Manchester, Hull, Cardiff, Bristol, Glasgow, and other places.

7. The premises of the said Woodside and Wallasey lairages are the part of the Port of Liverpool defined as a foreign animals wharf by an order of the Board of Agriculture made the 4th of January, 1896, in pursuance of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. Such order forms part of this case.

8. The said lairages were erected and are worked and carried on by the appellants under the provisions of their statutory powers, and not as a local authority under the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. No local authority has been appointed under such Act in respect of the Port of Liverpool. Only the part of the lairages which is within the township of Birkenhead is within the municipal area of Birkenhead. The lairages are carried on subject to the provisions of the Foreign Animals Order of 1896, which order is referred to and taken as part of this case.

10. In pursuance of the appellants' statutory powers certain bye-laws have been duly passed for regulating, governing, and managing the stages, wharves, and landing-places at which foreign animals are from time to time permitted to be landed on the estate of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and in further pursuance of such statutory powers the appellants have prescribed a schedule of charges in respect of such animals. Such bye-laws and schedule of charges form part of this case.

10A. In the course of the hearing of the appeal the respondents tendered in evidence certain accounts made up from the books of the appellants showing the receipts and expenditure of the appellants in the conduct of the business of the lairages for the three years ending the 1st of July, 1896, and the averages thereof. The appellants objected to the admission of any evidence as to the amount of the receipts and expenditure, but I held such evidence admissible, and admitted the evidence tendered by the respondents accordingly.

11. The court (the Recorder of Birkenhead) delivered the following judgment, in which the contentions of the appellants and respondents are stated:

"This is an appeal from the rate made on the 16th of May, 1896, in respect of the lairages at Woodside and Wallasey, which involves the determination of the amount at which those tenements ought to be assessed. The chief controversy between the parties in the appeal turns upon the principle applicable to the assessment of a tenement used for carrying on the business of a lairage, the valuations given in evidence with one or two exceptions not being made the subject of cross-examination by either side. The contention of the appellants is that the assessment should be based upon the structural value of the buildings, plus the value of the land, as in the case, for instance, of an ordinary warehouse; whereas the respondents maintain that the assessment should be based upon the actual average receipts and expenditure in the conduct of the business of a lairage. I am of opinion that in the exceptional circumstances of this case it is not possible to ascertain what a tenant would give for the occupation of these tenements by merely considering the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land, or otherwise than by investigation of the actual average annual receipts and expenditure involved in carrying on the business of a lairage. (I did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but I used them together with other evidence to test the values given by the appellants and respondents respectively. Having taken into consideration all the evidence before me as to the actual receipts and expenditure of the occupiers who carried on the business, the nature of the business, and the chances of its permanence, the structural value of the buildings, the value of the land, and all the surrounding circumstances, I came to the conclusion that the gross values given by the respondents were too low, but I felt that I had no power in this appeal to put them up. I therefore accepted these values as the nearest to the true gross values I could arrive at, and proceeded to determine the amount of the deductions to be made therefrom in order to arrive at the net annual values by a consideration of the evidence before me, most of which was given by the appellants.) As both parties desire to obtain the opinion of the High Court upon the true principle of assessment applicable, and for the purpose of stating a case, I find the following facts: (1) The tenements subject to assessment are capable of separate beneficial occupation apart from their connection with the rest of the appellants' property. (2) Their value is enhanced by their proximity to and connection with the docks and rails belonging to the appellants. (3) There are tenants other than the appellants available for the occupation of the tenements for the purpose of carrying on the business of a lairage. (4) There are no similar tenements in this neighbourhood with which a comparison can be made.

"If the assessment ought to be made on the mere structural value of the buildings, plus the value of the land, and without reference to receipts and expenditure, I find as follows: Lairage in Woodside, gross estimated rental, £13,381; lairage in Woodside, net annual value, £8,964; lairage in Wallasey, gross estimated rental, £3,728; lairage in Wallasey, net annual value, £2,419.

"The appellants admit that if the principle of assessment contended for by the respondents is correct, the gross estimated rentals of the two hereditaments in question appearing upon the rate book are not too high, and the respondents admit that in this appeal they cannot be increased. Consequently I adopt these figures and find the true rateable value as follows: Lairage in Woodside, gross estimated rental, £19,333; lairage in Woodside, net annual value, £12,622; lairage in Wallasey, gross estimated rental, £4,723; lairage in Wallasey, net annual value, £3,414. The result is that as the net values are reduced the appeal is allowed, and the rate must be made upon the aforesaid net values of £12,622 and £3,414 instead of the figures £17,400 and £4,251. As each party to the appeal has succeeded in part there will be no order as to costs."

12. The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether the assessments referred to in 10*a* were properly admitted; (2) whether the principle adopted in the aforesaid judgment is correct. If the answers to both questions are in the affirmative, then the gross and rateable values as found by the court of quarter sessions are to stand. If the answer to either question is in the negative, and the appellants' contention is correct, then the assessments are to be as follows: Lairage at Woodside, gross estimated rental, £13,381; lairage at Woodside, rateable value, £8,964; lairage at Wallasey, gross estimated rental, £3,728; lairage at Wallasey, rateable value, £2,419.

The Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.) affirmed the decision of the recorder.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—When the facts found in this case by the learned Recorder of Birkenhead are understood, in my opinion the answers to be given to the questions asked of us involve no real difficulty. The first question is whether the published accounts of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in relation to their receipts and expenditure in conducting the lairages of which they are occupiers were rightly received in evidence upon the hearing of the appeal at quarter sessions brought by the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, against an assessment of their lairages to the poor rate; and the second is whether the principle adopted by the recorder in arriving at the rateable value of the lairages as appears upon the special case is correct. The learned recorder states that he did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but that he used them, together with other evidence, to test the value given by the appellants and respondents respectively. The material facts found by the recorder are these: First, that the lairages consist of lands and buildings in the occupation of the appellants within the ambit of the rating authority; secondly, that the lairages are the only places in the neighbourhood at which foreign cattle can be landed except under penalties, as provided by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894; thirdly, that the lairages were erected and are worked by the appellants under statutory powers which enable them to exact charges for the lairages they provide for imported animals; fourthly, that there are no similar hereditaments in the neighbourhood with which the lairages can be compared in order to ascertain what rent a tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the lairages, and that they fall within the category of cases which in rating law are known as exceptional cases; fifthly, that it is not possible to ascertain what rent a tenant from year to year would give for the occupation of the lairages by merely considering the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land upon which the buildings stand; and lastly, that to ascertain what rent such a tenant would give the actual average annual receipts and expenditure obtained and incurred in carrying on the work of the lairages must be investigated.

Now, first of all, it is manifest that the rental value of these lairages cannot be ascertained by adopting the ordinary method of ascertaining what rent the hypothetical tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the hereditament about to be assessed—viz., by comparing that hereditament with similar hereditaments in the neighbourhood, and ascertaining what rent the other hereditaments command, and thus arriving by comparison at an approximation as to what rent a tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the hereditament in question. As this method, which is, as I have said, the ordinary method for ascertaining rateable value, cannot be adopted, some other method has to be resorted to. What, then, in such a case, is the next method usually brought into play? It is to take the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land on which they stand, and to calculate what would be the interest upon the capital sum which would have to be expended if the occupier had become the purchaser and not the tenant. For instance, if the cost of the buildings, plus the value of the land, was, say, £10,000, the interest thereon, say, at 4 per cent., being £400 a year, the assumption is made that the hypothetical tenant, being desirous of occupying the premises, not purchasing, but becoming a yearly tenant, might be willing to pay as rent a sum in some degree represented by the interest upon the money he would have had to expend had he become a purchaser instead of a tenant. This is a method which is adopted when the comparison of the hereditament with other similar hereditaments is impracticable. But suppose, as in the present case, in addition to the rent which a tenant might ordinarily be likely to give there is a capacity in the hereditament itself of making a profit not personal to the tenant, but which is attached to the hereditament, why is not this capacity to be considered as an element when seeking to ascertain what the hypothetical tenant would be likely to give by way of rent? Surely a proposing tenant would take this additional element into consideration when calculating what rent he could give for the hereditament he was about to take; and why, then, is this not also to be taken into consideration by the tribunal which has to ascertain, as best it can, what rent the tenant, as a tenant from year to year, would be likely to give? There is, as it seems to me, no reason whatever why this capacity attached to the hereditament itself should not form an element in the consideration, and there is good authority, as I will show in a moment, that this can be taken into consideration. I will take two of the cases to which Mr. Pickford has called our attention, which sufficiently show when a capacity of making profit cannot and when it can be taken into account. In the case of Rex v. Trustees of the Duke of Bridgewater the trustees were by statute empowered to take tolls upon the tonnage of goods passing along the Bridgewater Canal, and they in addition carried on the trade of carriers thereon, receiving freight for the goods so carried. The court held that the tolls were to be taken into consideration when arriving at the amount at which the occupation of the trustees was to be assessed, but not the profits made by them in the carrying business, because as Bailey, J., in delivering the judgment of the court said: "I lay out of consideration the fact of the trustees being carriers, because the occupation only is to be considered. The profits of carrying goods are the profits of their trade. The tonnage is the profit of the land occupied by them." And, therefore, this tonnage profit, being attached to the land, had to be considered when arriving at the rateable value of the hereditaments—i.e., the canal. Again, in the year 1842, in the case of Reg. v. London and South-Western Railway Co., it was held that the defendant company was liable to be rated for its land improved in value by the profits accruing from the railway, which in this case was held to include both the tolls and the carrying trade, because, as Lord Denman, C.J., pointed out when delivering the judgment of the court, the defendants were "occupying buildings and lands on an entire line of railway and carrying on a trade, not merely therein and thereon, but thereby." This, as it appears to me, applies to the present case upon this ground. I think the recorder was right. I now come to two cases which fall within the definition of exceptional cases, of which the present case is one. In the year 1875 Reg. v. Verrall was decided. It was a case of rating a racecourse, an undoubted exceptional case, and it was held by Sir Alexander Cockburn, C.J., and Field, J., that in ascertaining its rateable value the accounts showing the receipts and expenditure in respect of the racecourse were legitimate evidence, and were clearly elements for the consideration of the justices when arriving at the value of the occupation of the racecourse. So, again, in the case in 1880 of Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Angar Field and Bowen, JJ., held that, in ascertaining the rateable value of refreshment rooms upon a railway station, there being no means for a comparison, the receipts and expenditure during the past year ought to be received in evidence as an element in ascertaining the rateable value. In the case of Dodd v. Assessment Committee of South Shields Union this court approved of the last two cases, and it is clear from the report that Lord Esher must have been alluding to a case other than Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Angar when he said he did not understand it. This court in Cartwright v. Sulcoates Union said nothing as to the accounts of receipt and expenditure not being received in evidence in a case like the present, and in my opinion that case has no application to a case where a profit is attached to the hereditament itself. For the reasons above I am of opinion that in this case the accounts of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board were rightly received in evidence by the learned recorder, and that he was right when he took evidence of the structural value of the buildings and land, and also admitted in evidence the receipts and expenditure of the lairages for the past year, each, in my judgment, being elements fit for his consideration when ascertaining as best he could what rent the hypothetical tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the lairages. He did not take the profits as the basis whereon to assess the rateable value, and then add thereto the structural value, but he took evidence of the profits merely to test the values given by the appellants and respondents respectively. The point made by Mr. Horridge upon a passage in Lord Herschell's judgment in the case of London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith, in my opinion, has no applicability here, because the recorder has found that there were tenants other than the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board available for the occupation of the lairages. For these reasons I think that the judgment of my brothers Lawrance and Channell must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the learned recorder has regarded both structural value and the profit-earning capacity of the hereditament in arriving at his conclusion, and I think both these elements were legitimate, and indeed necessary factors in determining in this case what rent the hypothetical tenant would give for it. The profit-earning capacity of the hereditament, if it exists, must always be an important factor in the annual value, and it is just as much present in a value based on a comparison of rents fetched in the open market by similar hereditaments when the materials for such a comparison exist as though it could be isolated and quantified. (See the observations of Lord Watson in Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Lord Provost of Edinburgh, [1894] A. C. 456.) When there is a market rent for similar hereditaments there is no need to look for any other standard. Every element of beneficial occupation is embraced in such a rent, and therefore it would be a useless and probably misleading inquiry to examine into the profits actually made by the occupier. Such profits would depend possibly as much on the skill of the occupier as on the special facilities inherent in the hereditament itself, and a just appreciation of each element would therefore have to be made in order to make the proper deductions, and so to arrive at an estimate of the rateable value, a result which has already been much more accurately ascertained by the market rent. Hence the rule that in ordinary cases when the standard of rent is applicable evidence of actual profits made cannot be received. But it is equally true that when no such standard of comparison exists it is legitimate to inquire into the profits actually earned; a series of cases which were referred to in argument have established this. When due allowance is made for all elements peculiar to the occupier this is the best available means of appraising the profit-earning facilities of the hereditament itself. It is clear, therefore, that it cannot be laid down as a matter of law that the profits cannot be looked at in ascertaining rateable value. The rule which excludes them in ordinary cases rests not on the fact that the object of the inquiry is illegitimate, but that the end sought has already been reached and measured in the market rent. In the case before us are certain profit-earning advantages linked with the occupation of the hereditament itself, and no assessment which did not embrace them would be just. It is obvious that structural value might be no measure at all, or a very imperfect measure, of the value of such advantages. The buildings and appliances might be just as costly whether the special advantages existed or not. The test of structural value, therefore, though frequently useful when the beneficial occupation does not embrace profit-earning facilities is incomplete when such facilities are the most important factor in the annual value. If a complete and satisfactory estimate of rent which the hypothetical tenant would give could be made from an examination of the profits actually earned, there would be no need to look further or consider structural value, as ex hypothesi the rent would include all elements of value. But it is because, as already pointed out, an examination of such profits is not a complete test, but only a means, and an imperfect one, of arriving at a conclusion as to the true rent which the hypothetical tenant would pay, that it may be useful to apply the standard of structural value also. It is itself an element which such tenant might properly take into consideration, and it also furnishes a parallel and independent mode of checking the conclusions arrived at from an examination of profits. There is no incompatibility between them, and I think it would not be safe to omit either in the present case. I understand the learned recorder to have done no more than this, and I am of opinion, therefore, that his decision, and that of the Divisional Court, was right.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree that this is an exceptional case, in which you cannot apply the ordinary test consisting of comparison with the values or rentals of similar hereditaments in the district, or by the mere test of structural value. I agree with the judgments just delivered on the assumption that the finding of the recorder does not mean that, having the actual receipts and expenditure of the occupiers as the basis or measure of the rent which the hypothetical tenant would be willing to pay, he then added to the sum thus arrived at something for the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land, but means only that, having arrived at the structural value, plus the value of the land, he then took into consideration the facilities which land improved by the structures would afford for the lairage business conducted by the appellants, for if once you make the balance of receipts over expenditure—i.e., the net profits—the basis of the rent which the hypothetical tenant would be willing to pay, you can add nothing to the rent after applying this exhaustive measure. It is as if having to value a man's labour, and having taken evidence of the piece-rate and the time-rate (evidence of both of which rates would clearly be admissible for the purpose of arriving at the value), you then applied the piece-rate as the measure of the value of his work, and proceeded to add something to the sum thus arrived at by taking into consideration the value as based on time-rate. Thus in the present case it seems to me that you cannot measure the rent which the hypothetical tenant would pay by the standards of the net profits which he would make and then add something for structural value. You must in such a case, I think, exclude structural value from consideration altogether as an item going to make up the sum of the rent which the hypothetical tenant would be ready to pay. The contention of the respondents as set forth in the case was that the assessment should be based upon the actual average receipts and expenditure in the conduct of the business of a lairage, and the recorder goes on to state that in his opinion in the exceptional circumstances of this case it is not possible to estimate what a tenant would give for the occupation of these tenements by merely considering the structural value of the buildings or otherwise than by investigation of the actual annual average receipts and expenditure involved in carrying on the business of a lairage. He then says, I did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but I used them (the profits) together with other evidence (inter alia, the structural value of the buildings) to test the values given by the appellants and the respondents respectively (i.e., the value arrived at by the appellants based upon the structural value of the buildings plus the value of the land and the value arrived at by the respondents based upon the actual average receipts and expenditure of a lairage). The court is asked by question 2 to say whether the principle thus adopted by the recorder is correct. We have not seen the figures of the items by which the recorder arrived at the net annual value on the principle of assessment which he states was applied by him; if, however, he took as an item in the sum the balance of receipts over expenditure and then added something for structural value, I think he was wrong. It may be, however, that he arrived at a minimum rental value which the tenant would certainly be willing to pay, having regard to the structural value, and then added something on the ground that the evidence of the receipts and expenditure showed that the lairages occupied by the appellants were likely to command a good business. The case we have to consider is, in my judgment, an exceptional case, in which it is not possible to get at the rateable value in the ordinary way by calling an expert and comparing the hereditaments proposed to be rated with some hereditaments in the neighbourhood, so that it is legitimate to get at the rateable value by getting at what trade is being done and calculating what the hypothetical tenant would be likely to give for the opportunity of carrying on business there; but when you have made that calculation you have arrived at the rateable value and there is an end of the matter, you can add nothing to it. In the case of Reg. v. Verrall, and in Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Angar, there was a rent from which the calculation started; in the former case the rent was said to be too low, and the fact that large profits were made was relied upon as proof that the rent was too low to represent the value. The sessions held that the books could not be called for, but the court held the books to be admissible evidence, not as an absolute test, but as a material element in determining the value, material that is, as I understand, as negativing the primâ facie assumption that the rent was a fair test of the value. When the case got back to sessions it might be that the rent test being displaced some other test might be found, and if not, the case being an exceptional one, the net profit test would be applicable as a sole test. So in Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Angar the books were put in to show that the rent was too high, being above the value. These cases show that receipts and expenditure may be given in evidence to show that the value by the ordinary test applied was not satisfactory, and that the value must be enhanced or reduced as the case might be, but to my mind show nothing more. Both cases relate rather to the admissibility of the evidence than to the ultimate measure to be applied. As to the first question I have no doubt but that the evidence of the receipts and expenditure was admissible.

ASHTON v. ROSS. (a.)

Administration — Insufficient estate — Abatement of annuities—Married woman—Restraint on anticipation —Capital value of annuity—Legal personal representative.

Where a married woman was entitled restrained from anticipation, to an annuity, from an insufficient estate, and agreed to an abatement thereof, the capital value of the annuity abated by an order of the court being laid out in the purchase of an annuity; and where she died before the purchase of the annuity,

Held, that the capital of the abated annuity should be paid to her legal personal representative, and formed part of her estate.

By his will dated the 29th of April, 1885, Thomas Ross bequeathed several legacies and annuities, including an annuity of £200 to Farlow Sergeant and his wife Margaret during their joint lives, and from and after the decease of either of them an annuity of £100 to the survivor during his or her life, and if Margaret Sergeant should survive then for her sole and separate use free from marital control and without power to anticipate the growing payments thereof.

In November, 1885, an administration action was commenced, as the testator's estate was insufficient for payment in full of the legacies and annuities.

Judgment in the administration action was obtained on the 23rd of January, 1886. As the result of an arrangement between the legatees and annuitants (with the exception of a few to whom legacies and annuities were fully paid) an order was made in the action on the 14th of August, 1899, to abate pro rata the amounts which they were respectively entitled to, and it was ordered that T. N. Ashton (the sole surviving trustee and executor of the will) should join with Margaret Sergeant in a contract with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to purchase two separate annuities on the life of the said M. Sergeant.

The annuities would together have amounted to £95, but before the purchases had been made Margaret Sergeant died on the 28th of August, 1899.

By her last will M. Sergeant appointed Farlow Sergeant her sole executor, and the will was duly proved by him on the 25th of October, 1899.

The sum of £1,049 1s. 3d. was the capital value of the annuities to be bought, and this amount was, pursuant to an order of the 27th of September, 1899, carried over to a separate account called "the account of annuity bequeathed to Margaret Sergeant (since deceased)." Farlow Sergeant presented a petition praying for a declaration that he was entitled, as legal personal representative of his wife, to have the sum in court paid out to him.

Jason Smith, for the trustee.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and said: I think in this case the husband is entitled to take the money carried over. If an estate is not sufficient to pay an annuitant in full, he is entitled to have the proportionate value of his annuity paid in cash. If the estate is ample to pay the annuity in full that is another matter. In the case of the petitioner's wife a difficulty arose as to paying over the capital value of the annuity because she was restrained from anticipation, and I could not see my way clear to allow the money to be paid over to her. There was no restraint on anticipation affecting the fund after her husband's death, had she survived him, and in that event she could have taken the capital. In Long v. Hughes, where an annuity abated owing to an insufficiency of assets, the amount of the abated valuation was ordered to be paid to the legal personal representatives of the deceased annuitant. That case was much the same as the present, except for the temporary inability of the lady to take the capital.

Action.

The defendant company were assignees of a public-house known as the "Denmark" with a garden comprised in and demised by an indenture of lease of the 10th of October, 1868, for the term of ninety-nine years from the 29th of September, 1868.

The said lease contained the following covenants on the part of the lessee: (1) On or before the 13th of November, 1868, to complete and finish the messuage or tenement and buildings thereby demised with suitable offices, sewers, drains, gardens, and fences to the satisfaction of the lessor. (2) During the said term to well and substantially repair, maintain, and keep the said demised premises with the appurtenances in such good and substantial repair as should be necessary for the occupation of a tenant at a rack-rent, and to so yield up the same at the end of the said term. (3) To paint the outside wood and iron work once in every four years of the said term with two coats of good oil colour. (4) To effectually repair and amend the demised premises within three calendar months after the lessor should have given to the lessee notice in writing to repair and amend the same. (5) Not to make any alteration in the plan and elevation of the demised messuage or erect any additional building on any part of the ground demised without the previous consent in writing of the lessor. (6) Not to use for any other purpose than as a tavern.

The said lease contained a proviso that if the lessee or his assigns should fail in the observance and performance of any of the covenants therein contained it should be lawful for the lessor and his assigns into and upon the demised premises to re-enter and the same to have again, repossess, and enjoy as if the said demise had not been made.

On the 31st of January, 1899, the plaintiff caused to be served upon the defendant company a notice addressed to them specifying divers breaches of covenant alleged to have been committed by them, and requiring them to remedy the said breaches and to make compensation therefor.

The terms of the said notice were as follows: "As solicitor and agent for and on behalf of E. Pannell, (the plaintiff) being the person entitled to the reversion of the above-mentioned premises (the 'Denmark' Tavern) expectant on the said lease, I hereby give you notice that you have committed breaches of the covenants contained in the said lease: First, that you have not kept the said premises in good and substantial repair; secondly, that you have not painted the outside wood and iron work of the said premises with two coats of good oil colour once in every four years; thirdly, that you have not kept the gardens and fences to the said premises in good and substantial repair, and have permitted the fences and party-walls thereto to be cut or broken or pulled down; fourthly, that, without the licence of the freeholder, a brick-built and roofed erection used for the purpose of a dung-shoot has been built in the garden to the said premises; and, lastly, that the manner in which the said garden is used has become a nuisance and annoyance and detrimental to the business of the licensed premises. And I hereby require you to remedy the said breaches by executing and doing the repairs and things specified in the schedule hereto within three calendar months from this date. And I also require you to pay to the said E. Pannell the sum of £10 10s., being the costs and expenses incurred by her for surveyors' fees and solicitors' charges in respect of the said breaches of covenant above mentioned. And I hereby further give you notice that if you make default in remedying the aforesaid breaches of covenant in manner above mentioned or in making the compensation hereby required, the said E. Pannell will enter and take possession of the said premises," dated the 31st of January, 1899, and duly signed. Then followed a schedule giving the particulars of the repairs and things required to be done by the notice, which were thirteen in number. The plaintiff having failed to establish some of the breaches alleged in the said notice, the question arose whether the whole notice was thereby rendered bad, and the following judgment was given on this part of the case which does not otherwise call for a report.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Gilks, for the plaintiff.

Astbury, Q.C., and G. F. Mortimer, for the company.

G. Cave and R. Edmondson, for other defendants.

BUCKLEY, J.—There is no question that reasonable time was given to comply with this notice. But it is said that the notice is bad, because the plaintiff has failed to establish all the breaches alleged in the notice. The argument is that if a lessor gives notice of three breaches, as to one of which he is right and as to the others wrong, he must wholly fail in his case. If that be the law, a lessor would, in order to protect himself, be obliged to serve a separate notice in respect of each breach alleged. That would be a very inconvenient state of things, but the question is whether on the authorities I must hold that a lessor is placed in this unfortunate position. Under the old law a tenant would be entitled to particulars of alleged breaches, but if the lessor were wrong in respect of one or more, he would not on that account alone be disentitled to succeed in ejectment. Why should the notice as a whole be defeated in such a case? There seems to be no reason for it primâ facie. Then the 14th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enacts that a lessor's right of re-entry for breach of covenant shall not be enforceable unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of, and requiring the lessee to remedy and make compensation for the breach, and the lessee fails within a reasonable time to remedy the breach and make reasonable compensation. The lessor here has done everything necessary to bring himself within the words, and I think within the reason of the section. It is true that he was not entitled to claim the surveyor's charges and solicitor's costs under this section: see Skinners Co. v. Knight, 40 W. R. 57, [1891] 2 Q. B. 542, but that was altered and the right given by the Conveyancing Act, 1892, s. 2 (1). In Lock v. Pearce, 41 W. R. 369, [1893] 2 Ch. 271, the notice required payment of £2 2s. for surveyor's fees and solicitor's charges, and as the law then stood that was wrong. It was, therefore, too large a notice. It was admitted in argument that the claim so made was illegal, but no point was made that the notice was bad on that account, and Lindley, L.J., adopted that view, saying: "It is true that he asked for £2 2s. for the surveyor's fees, and there is a case which decides that he could not recover them, but in fact he told them what compensation he wanted. The notices are as good as any notices could possibly be." That is a decision of the Court of Appeal that a notice may be good when it calls for something to be done that is not authorized. But it is said that is inconsistent with the later decision of the Court of Appeal in Horsey Estate v. Steiger, 47 W. R. 644, [1899] 2 Q. B. 79, where the judgment was delivered by Lord Russell, C.J. He says (47 W. R., at p. 646, [1899] 2 Q. B., at p. 92): "It is now admitted that the plaintiffs were not in a position to rely upon the alleged breach for non-repair. In these circumstances can this be said to be a proper notice within the Act? On the whole I think not. In the first place, if the entering upon liquidation had alone been put forward, the defendants would have had the opportunity of considering whether they had any answer," and so on. That passage is addressed to the contents of the notice. Then he says: "Further, the statute clearly contemplates that a reasonable interval shall elapse after service of notice and before action. Can two days' notice be said in all the circumstances to be a reasonable notice? I think not." That is addressed to the validity of the proceedings based on the notice. Then he concludes: "On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the notice was bad." I understand this to refer to the proceedings on the notice and not to its contents, and do not read it as conflicting with Lock v. Pearce, which was not cited in the case. The decision, then, amounts to this, having regard to the shortness of the time between service of notice and the writ, the proceedings were bad, but not the notice. The only other case I need mention is In re Serle, Gregory v. Serle, 46 W. R. 440, [1898] 1 Ch. 652, which is not a decision on the point before me, but on insufficient particulars, and is therefore inapplicable. I therefore hold that the notice is a good notice.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Bigham and Darling, JJ.)

Nov. 17, 18; Dec. 21.

LOGSDON (Appellant) v. BOOTH (Respondent). (a.)

Common lodging-house—Charitable institution—Salvation Army shelter—Non-registration—Penalty for keeping—Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 28)—Common Lodging Houses Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 41), s. 3.

The respondent had opened and kept a lodging-house for men of the poorest class, known as a Salvation Army shelter, which, though not kept for the purpose of gain, was conducted upon business principles. The house was not registered, nor had it been inspected and approved by the local authority in accordance with section 3 of the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1853.

The facts as found in the case were substantially the same as those in Booth v. Ferret, 38 W. R. 718, 25 Q. B. D. 87, and the magistrate held himself bound by that decision, and dismissed the summons against the respondent charging him with the offence of keeping an unregistered common lodging-house.

Held that Booth v. Ferrett was wrongly decided, and that these shelters, being of a class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer sort were received for short periods, and, although strangers to one another, were allowed to inhabit one common room, were common lodging-houses; and therefore the magistrate should have convicted the respondent.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by Sir F. Lushington, chief metropolitan magistrate.

The respondent was charged by the appellant, an official of the London County Council, with keeping a shelter known as the "Harbour," Stanhope-street, St. Clement Danes, belonging to the Salvation Army, without having been registered as the keeper of a common lodging-house. The place in question was kept by the respondent for the reception and lodging of men only admitted by the officials in charge under certain regulations in connection with certain social work under a general scheme. Persons were admitted at 4d. a night, or 2s. a week, for a bed, and the use, in common with other occupants, of the rooms of the shelter. The officials in charge had a discretionary power to admit persons without payment or at a less payment. The respondent was not entered on the register of common lodging-houses kept under the Common Lodging Houses Acts. On the 16th of May last there were in the house 157 beds or bunks. Occupants had to provide their own food, but were entitled to cook it at the fire provided in the kitchen. Only men were admitted to this shelter, and those who were drunk or disorderly were refused admittance.

The occupants were of the same class as those who usually frequent registered common lodging-houses, save that some of the persons admitted into the house were so dirty that they could not be received at an ordinary lodging-house.

It appeared from the accounts of the working of all the shelters used in connection with the scheme throughout England that there was a loss on them of over £600 in one year, although the prices charged were similar to those charged by common lodging-houses which were kept for making a profit.

The magistrate held that the facts admitted or proved were indistinguishable from those in Booth v. Ferret, 38 W. R. 718, 25 Q. B. D. 87, and that this shelter therefore was not a common lodging-house within the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853. He accordingly dismissed the summons.

The London County Council appealed.

Arthur Jelf, Q.C., and Ryde, for the appellants.—The matter came before the magistrate as a quasi-criminal case, and therefore there was no appeal from this court to the Court of Appeal. As the question depended upon whether Booth v. Ferret, decided nine years ago, ought now to be followed, an application was made to have this appeal heard by a specially-constituted court. The case raised a point of great public importance. On the one hand there were the Acts which provided for the sanitation, the good government and regulation of common lodging-houses in which the very poor herd together, and on the other hand there were these gentlemen of the Salvation Army who from philanthropic motives have started houses called shelters, who claimed on the authority of Booth v. Ferrett that the shelters did not come within the Acts. The powers given sanitary authorities under the Acts had been transferred to the county council, and they feel bound to take these proceedings. The question whether a building in which a number of poor persons congregated should be registered, and thereby open to inspection by skilled public officials, who would see that cleanliness, ventilation, and other sanitary precautions were enforced, ought not to depend upon whether the house was carried on as a philanthropic or as a commercial institution. If a man obtained admittance to an unregistered shelter suffering from an infectious disease the local authority could not properly deal with the matter. Booth v. Ferrett was decided on a wrong principle.

Pollard, for the respondent.—The Salvation Army were not fighting from mere caprice, as they were fully alive to the necessity of enforcing all sanitary precautions. Since Booth v. Ferrett was decided they have spent £40,000 in improving these shelters. If the shelters were registered the county council regulation of 300 or 400 cubic feet of air space for each inmate of a common lodging-house would be applicable to these shelters. Unless each inmate paid 4d. for his night's lodging this could not be done, and many poor wretches who were now allowed in on payment of 1d. or 2d. would have to pass the night on the stones. After a hearing lasting eight days before the magistrate, in which experts were examined, an agreement was arrived at with the local health authorities (which had been loyally kept) whereby no more persons were to be given shelter than the shelter would allow of giving to each inmate 180 cubit feet of air space.

Dec. 21.—Lord RUSSELL, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, after referring to the facts set out in the case, said: The questions which arose for our determination are as follows: (1) Is Booth v. Ferrett in principle distinguishable from this case; (2) if not, was that case rightly decided; and (3) if not rightly decided, ought we now to review it? [His lordship then discussed minutely the facts of the case, and stated that, in the opinion of the court, the present case was not distinguishable in principle from Booth v. Ferrett. He then proceeded:] The next inquiry is, Was that case rightly decided? The learned judges in Booth v. Ferrett came to the conclusion (but with hesitation) that a similar house, and similarly conducted to the present, was not a common lodging-house, on two grounds—(1) that it was not carried on as a business for the sake of profit, but as a humane or charitable enterprize; and (2) that it was not open to all comers as (it was stated) a common lodging-house was. Before examining these grounds of decision more closely it will be well to examine the scheme of legislation on this subject and endeavour to get a clear conception of its object. [His lordship, after referring in some detail to the provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, and pointing out that they must be regarded as measures of sanitary protection, continued:] Applying these conditions to the first ground on which the decision in Booth v. Ferrett was based, it seems impossible to admit that the fact that the house or building in question was carried on for charitable objects and not for gain would take it out of the measure of sanitary protection if otherwise it would be within it. The question is not with what object or prompted by what motive the house is carried on, but whether the house is such, and is so carried on as a lodging-house as to be within the provisions of the Act, as it is clearly within the mischief aimed at by the Act. It is to be observed that the learned judges in Booth v. Ferrett differentiate the house in that case from a common lodging-house only on the two grounds I have mentioned. If large numbers of the most wretched class are lodged in common sleeping rooms insanitary conditions are, in the absence of inspection, supervision, and control, likely to arise, and it was the object of the law to secure that inspection, supervision, and control. We fail to see the relevance in this connection of the motive actuating the keeper of such a house, whether it be philanthropic or mercenary. But the second ground of the decision is that the "Harbour" is not within the statute on the ground that a common lodging-house is open to all comers in this sense, that the keeper of such a house cannot refuse admission to any applicant. Is this so? To give to a common lodging-house this character is to attach to its keeper obligations analogous to that of a common carrier or a common innkeeper. We are unaware of any authority for this proposition. The language of Lindley, J., in Langdon v. Broadbent, 37 L. T. Rep. 434, is referred to where he speaks of a common lodging-house as one "open to all comers"—that is, as we understand the language, where practically all comers are received without discrimination; but that is a very different thing from saying that the keeper is under an obligation to receive all comers. We see no reason to doubt that the keeper of a common lodging-house might refuse to admit drunken or disorderly or uncleanly men or men of known evil reputation, as thieves and the like, or indeed any persons whom he chose to exclude. Further, it seems to us on the facts before us that the "Harbour" might properly be described as open in the same sense to all comers. The very "outcasts of society" are objects of the humane solicitude of the respondent. Even verminous subjects who are willing to submit to cleansing operations are admitted, and in the case before us it is stated that the occupants of the "Harbour" are of the same class as those who frequent common lodging-houses, but that into the "Harbour" are received persons who would usually be refused admission into registered common lodging-houses. The only restrictions on admission which may suggest a difference between the "Harbour" and registered common lodging-houses are the regulations (1) that men who are able to pay for better accommodation are not allowed to make the "Harbour" their permanent home, and (2) that the "Harbour" is not to be used to assist idle men to live a lazy life. We cannot assent to the view that this is sufficient to differentiate the two classes of houses. We know of no better description of a common lodging-house than that given many years ago by the law officers, Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir W. Page Wood, to the effect that a common lodging-house was that class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer class are received for short periods, and, although strangers to one another, are allowed to inhabit one common room. If this be the proper description of a common lodging-house, as we think it is, we cannot see in what material respect it differs from the respondent's shelter. [His lordship then, after intimating that the court was prepared to overrule Booth v. Ferrett, and dealing with an argument of the respondent based on the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, concluded as follows:] The result is that the appeal will be allowed, and that the case will be remitted to the learned magistrate with an intimation of our judgment upon it. Under the circumstances there will be no costs of the appeal, and having regard to the decision of Booth v. Ferrett, on which the respondent was justified in acting, the learned magistrate will, no doubt, think that the smallest nominal fine will meet the justice of the case. We desire to say that we should regret if the result of our decision were seriously to interfere with the humane work of the respondent. We do not think it will or can, but whether it does or not the law must be observed. We have read the careful regulations framed for the good government of the "Harbour" and the respondent's other similar houses, and noticed the anxiety manifested in those rules, not only to ensure observance of all conditions necessary to secure cleanliness and good health and to prevent the growth and spread of disease, but also to observe the law, whatever that law may be. Indeed, the regulations expressly provide that every shelter shall be fitted up in accordance with the requirements of the sanitary authority of the district. On the other hand, we trust that those who are charged with the enforcement of the law will do all they can consistently with their duty and consistent with effecting the objects of the law to avoid anything like harshness or unreasonableness in its enforcement.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Divorce. } July 18, 27, 1899.

SICKERT v. SICKERT. (a.)

Divorce — Desertion — Adultery by husband—Offer of forgiveness if discontinued—Continuance of adultery insisted on—Refusal by wife to continue cohabitation —Separation.

To constitute desertion there must be a cessation of cohabitation and an intention on the part of the accused party to desert the other; it is not always or necessarily the guilty party who leaves the matrimonial home.

A husband was committing acts of adultery which, on discovery by his wife, he admitted had continued from the time of the marriage, and he refused to discontinue these acts, although his wife said she could not live with him unless he did so; and they separated and lived apart for more than two years, when a suit was commenced by the wife for dissolution on the ground of adultery and desertion for more than two years.

Held, that the husband had been guilty of desertion.

Hearing before the court itself of the wife's petition for dissolution of the marriage, on the ground of her husband's desertion and adultery.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

July 18.—Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Llewellyn Davis, for the petitioner.—It is not necessarily the guilty party who leaves the home. Here the wife was compelled to cease cohabitation by the husband's conduct, and the husband refused to discontinue the adultery, although he knew his wife would not continue the cohabitation unless he did so; therefore he deserted her.

July 26.—BARNES, J., delivered the following written judgment: The petitioner in this case prays for a dissolution of her marriage with the respondent, on the ground of his alleged desertion and adultery. The adultery, which occurred in April, 1898, and May, 1899, was proved, but an important question is raised with regard to the alleged desertion. The facts appear to me to be that the petitioner was married to the respondent, who is an artist, on the 10th of June, 1885, and that they lived together until the 29th of September, 1896. The effect of the evidence is that in 1895 the petitioner had strong suspicions that the respondent was leading an improper life; that in 1895 she found a letter to him from a woman, and that he admitted two cases in adultery, one with that woman and one with another woman, but, as he promised to have nothing more to do with them, she forgave him; that in May, 1896, there was a short separation between them, in consequence of his conduct, but that he rejoined her in Switzerland; that on the 29th of September, 1896, while they were at Fluellen, on the Lake of Lucerne, he made a statement, the effect of which was that it was of no use concealing the fact that he had never been faithful to her, and never could be; and that the petitioner said that as long as the respondent lived that sort of life she could not live with him, but was willing to do so if he would give it up, but he declined to do so. They therefore separated, and have ever since lived separate. On the 8th of December, 1898, the petitioner wrote to the respondent as follows:

"Dear Walter,—In spite of your having told me, when we parted in Switzerland in September, 1896, that, immediately after our marriage and ever since, you have lived an adulterous life, and that you felt sure you could never live a different one, I have been hoping against hope that you would abandon it, but all that I have heard of you during the last two years has forced me to give up all possible hope for the future. "Yours truly,

"E. M. SICKERT."

To this letter the respondent replied, on the 14th of December:

"My dear Nellie,—I have received your letter of the 8th of December. It is quite true that I have not been faithful to you since our marriage and it is equally true that during the two years since we parted I have been intimate with several women. As I told you long ago, I cannot continue a life of dissimulation. I have chosen my mode of life and I am unable to alter it. An undertaking to do so on my part would be misleading.

"Ever your profoundly attached

"WALTER SICKERT."

Shortly afterwards—viz., in May, 1899, this suit was commenced.

There have been a number of cases on this question of desertion, but as they were mostly undefended, and as the question raised upon the facts in this case is of considerable importance, I reserved my judgment. A wife is entitled to obtain a divorce from her husband if he has been guilty of, inter alia, adultery coupled with desertion, without reasonable excuse, for two years and upwards. In order to constitute desertion there must be a cessation of cohabitation and an intention on the part of the accused party to desert the other. In most cases of desertion the guilty party actually leaves the other, but it is not always necessarily the guilty party who leaves the matrimonial home. In my opinion the party who intends to bring the cohabitation to an end, and whose conduct in reality causes its termination, commits the act of desertion. There is no substantial difference between the case of a husband who intends to put an end to the state of cohabitation and does so by leaving his wife, and that of a husband who, with the like intent, obliges his wife to separate from him. This view of the law, applicable to desertion, has been taken in the cases of Dickinson v. Dickinson, 62 L. T. Rep. 330, 38 W. R. Dig. 69, and Koch v. Koch, [1899] P. 221, 47 W. R. Dig. 51. In the first of these cases the husband brought to the house a woman with whom he had immoral relations. The wife refused to admit her, but the husband insisted. The wife remained a short time in the house, and then told her husband that either she or the woman must leave the house. The husband told her that she might do as she liked, but that the woman would remain. The wife thereupon left and never afterwards cohabited with her husband. Sir Charles Butt held that the husband was guilty of deserting his wife.

In the second case, which was heard before myself, the husband was guilty of immoral relations with a servant in the house. The husband refused to break off these relations or discharge the girl, and the wife thereupon left the house. The husband continued to live for years with the servant. I held the husband guilty of desertion. In these two cases the adulterous intercourse which the husband refused to put an end to was being carried on in the matrimonial home; but in the earlier case of Graves v. Graves, heard by Lord Penzance in 1864 and reported in 12 W. R. 1016, 3 Sw. & Tr. 350, and 33 L. J. P. & M. 66, the adulterous intercourse, though carried on for a time in the house occupied by the petitioner and respondent, was not discovered by the petitioner until after the parties had separated. The report in the Law Journal is the fuller of the two, and the head-note is as follows: "Shortly after a marriage the husband, with the intention of bringing about a separation, so treated his wife as to compel her to leave him. She subsequently made several offers to return, but he refused to receive her. She continued willing to return until she found that he was carrying on an adulterous intercourse which had subsisted since the marriage. She then refused to return except upon condition that such intercourse should cease. Held, that such conduct before the wife became aware of his adultery amounted to desertion, and that such desertion was not put an end to by her unwillingness to return while the adultery continued." The present case is scarcely distinguishable from the case of Pizzala v. Pizzala, reported only in 12 Times L. R. 451. There the husband was carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman, but not in the matrimonial home, and refused to break it off, although his wife told him that unless he did so she must leave him. The wife then left him, and he continued to live with the woman for ever two years. The President held the husband guilty of desertion.

These cases all appear to me to have been decided in accordance with the principles shortly stated above, and no distinction has been made whether the adulterous intercourse was carried on in the matrimonial home or elsewhere. A wife whose husband is carrying on an adulterous intercourse with another woman or other women is not bound to remain in cohabitation with him. She can at once obtain a judicial separation. She may, however, be willing to remain with her husband provided he will give up the connection complained of, and if he refuses to do so, a wife with any self-respect has only one course to take—that is, to withdraw from cohabitation. The husband in such a case must be taken to intend the consequences of his action—that is to say, that his wife shall not live with him. The situation then produced is just the same as if the guilty husband left his wife. Desertion is not to be tested by merely ascertaining which party left the matrimonial home first. It may be committed by a husband acting as I have just said, and if the attitude of the parties remain the same for two years the offence of desertion contemplated by the statute is complete. I may add that the American writer Bishop, in his work on the law of marriage and divorce, has the following passage on the subject of desertion (edition 1891, vol. 1, section 1710): "It is immaterial which of the married parties leaves the matrimonial home, the one who intends bringing the cohabitation to an end commits the desertion." I am of opinion that, upon the facts proved in evidence before me in the present case, the respondent has been guilty of adultery, coupled with desertion for two years and upwards, and I pronounce a decree nisi, with costs.

DE NICOLS v. CURLIER. (a.)

Domicil—Husband and wife—Matrimonial domicil—French law—Contract of marriage—Movable goods—Change of domicil—Community of goods.

Two French subjects, born and domiciled in France, married there without a contract of marriage, and became, therefore, subject to the system of "community of goods." They afterwards acquired an English domicil, and the husband died in this country possessed of movable property.

Held, that the change of domicil did not affect the rights acquired by their marriage in France, and consequently the French law of "community of goods" was still applicable; so that the husband's power of disposition by will was limited to a moiety.

Decision of Court of Appeal, In re De Nicols, De Nicols v. Curlier, 46 W. R. 532, [1898] 2 Ch. 60, reversed.

Lashley v. Hog, 4 Paton's Sc. App. Cas. 581, distinguished.

Appeal from order of Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.), 46 W. R. 532, [1898] 2 Ch. 60, reversing decision of Kekewich, J., 46 W. R. 326, [1898] 1 Ch. 403.

In 1854 M. and Madame De Nicols, French subjects, were married in Paris. No contract or settlement was made by the parties on their marriage, in which case by French law their rights with respect to property were regulated by the law of "community of goods."

In 1863 M. De Nicols came over to England with his wife.

In 1865 they became naturalized as English subjects. M. De Nicols, with the assistance of his wife, carried on a business in England, whereby he acquired a large fortune.

M. De Nicols died on the 28th of February, 1897, having by his will dated the 22nd of March, 1895, given his residuary estate real and personal to trustees upon trust for sale and to hold the proceeds upon trust for his wife for her life and after her death upon trusts for the daughter of the marriage and her husband and children.

The wife, however, claimed a moiety as her own absolute property under the French law, and an originating summons was taken out to determine this among other questions. Kekewich, J., decided that a change of domicil did not affect the rights acquired by Mons. and Madame De Nicols in each other's unsettled movable property by their marriage in France. The Court of Appeal, however, held otherwise, reversing Kekewich, J., on the authority of Lashley v. Hog, 4 Paton's Sc. App. Cas. 581.

Madame De Nicols appealed.

Graham Murray (Lord Advocate) and Westgate, Q.C. (Renshaw, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce with them), for the appellant.

Dicey, Q.C., and Whinney, for respondents other than the executors and trustees.

E. J. Elgood and F. J. Maugham, for the executors.

The authorities referred to are set out at length in the report in the court below. The German New Code, 1900, was also mentioned.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It is not necessary to state with great minuteness how the question in the present appeal arises. It is enough to say that two French subjects were married according to the laws of France on the 30th of May, 1854.

No marriage contract or instrument in writing was executed by either of the parties.

The parties lived together, and in the year 1863 they came to England, and in the year 1865 the husband obtained the status of a naturalized British subject.

The whole dispute turns on the question whether the changed domicil and naturalization of the husband affected the wife's rights so as to give the husband the power to dispose of all the movable property by will instead of being restricted to the power of disposing of only one half of it, as he undoubtedly would have been so restricted by the French law if the French law is decisive of the question.

The parties, as I have said, were married according to French law, and the first thing to do is to see how the matter would be dealt with in respect of such a marriage by the French law. There is no real conflict between the learned persons who have given evidence on this question. One of them indeed, besides giving evidence as to what the French law is, upon which he is an authority entitled to respect, has also gone on to express an opinion upon how that law should be treated in this country, upon which subject he is no authority at all, and indeed such a question is not the subject of evidence at all, but pure matter of English law for English comity to decide.

The law of France as applicable to the matter now in debate is deposed to by M. Paul Lax, a licentiate of law in the University of France, an advocate who has practised in the Court of Appeal in Paris, and his evidence upon the subject is not really questioned by the gentlemen on the other side. M. Lax says:

"2. According to the law of France, and in particular articles 1393 and 1401 of the Code Civil, parties having intermarried without entering into a formal pre-nuptial contract are governed so far as their present and after-acquired property is concerned by the legal system of community of goods as defined by articles 1401 to 1496 in Title V. of the same Code, which title is headed 'Du Contrat de mariage et des droits respectifs de époux.'

"3. The husband and wife having so intermarried without entering into a pre-nuptial contract in writing are placed by the sole fact of the marriage and stand in exactly the same position in all respects as if previously to their marriage they had in due form executed a written contract, and thereby adopted as special and expressed covenants all and every one of the provisions contained in articles 1401 to 1496 above referred to.

"4. Subject to the exceptions specified in the next following paragraph the community of goods includes (1) all personal property belonging to the husband and wife at the date of the marriage, or having devolved upon either of them during coverture; (2) all interest or income of whatever nature and source accrued or received during coverture; (3) all real estate acquired during coverture (article 1401 Code Civil).

"5. Real estate possessed by either spouse at the time of the marriage or that may during coverture devolve upon him or her by way of inheritance, gift inter vivos, or will, exclusive of real property acquired during coverture by any other means whatever, does not become common property, but remains the separate property of the spouse so possessing the same or upon whom the same has so devolved, and any real estate is deemed to be common property unless it is clearly proved that either husband or wife possessed the same previous to the marriage or became entitled to it during coverture by way of inheritance, gift inter vivos, or will as aforesaid (articles 1402 and 1404 Code Civil).

"6. The administration of the common property belongs to the husband alone, who may sell, deal with, and mortgage the same without the wife's concurrence (article 1421 Code Civil). The common property real as well as personal stands or is invested in the name of the husband alone.

"7. In the case of a legal community of goods any trade or business carried on either by the husband alone or by the husband and wife jointly is necessarily carried on for the account and benefit or at the risk of the community of goods. The whole assets of the said community, also the husband's separate real estate, if any, and the husband himself personally in infinitum are liable for the debts of such trade or business, the wife not being liable for the same except to the extent of her share in the common property. The name of the husband alone appears in the firm or style of any trade or business carried on as aforesaid.

"8. In case any real estate which remains the separate property of either spouse has been disposed of and the purchase consideration has not been re-invested in the name of the one to whom such real estate belonged, but has been merged in the common property, the spouse whose separate property the real estate so disposed of was is on the winding up of the community of goods preferentially entitled to receive out of the common property the amount of the purchase consideration referred to (article 1470 Code Civil).

"9. The community of goods when once constituted between husband and wife, and whether created by an instrument in writing or by the operation of articles 1393 and 1400 of the Code Civil, cannot cease or be determined by mutual consent or by any cause or event whatever except the following—that is to say, (1) decease, (2) divorce, (3) judicial separation, (4) separation of estates decreed by a competent court of justice."

If this is the law by which the matter is to be governed, it cannot be denied that the appellants here must succeed, and it is a little difficult to understand upon what principle contracts and obligations already existing inter se should be affected by an act of one of the contracting parties, over which the other party to the contract has no control whatever. And, indeed, it is not denied that if, instead of the law creating these obligations upon the mere performance of the marriage, the parties had themselves by written instrument recited in terms the very contract the law makes for them, that in that case the change of domicil could not have affected such written contract. I am wholly unable to understand why the mere putting into writing the very same contract which the law created between them without any writing at all should bar the husband from altering the contract relations between himself and his wife, when if the law creates that contract relation then the husband is not barred from getting rid of the obligation which upon his marriage the law affixed to the transaction.

A written contract is after all only the evidence of what the parties have agreed to, and it would seem to be of no superior force as evidencing the agreement of the parties than a known consequence of entering into the married status. I not only do not understand, but I should decline to assent to any such view, unless I am compelled by authoritative decision or statute to adopt a view which to my mind is so entirely unreasonable. And it does not appear to me that any court before whom this question has come would disagree with me as to its being unreasonable.

The Master of the Rolls himself says: "It is not altogether satisfactory to hold that a change of domicil cannot affect an express contract embodying the law of the matrimonial domicil, but that a change of domicil does affect the application of that law if not embodied in an express contract."

I should think that in order to be binding on your lordships a previous decision must be in principle, and as applicable to the same circumstances, identical, and it appears to me that the case by which the Master of the Rolls thought himself bound (Lashley v. Hog) is quite distinguishable both in principle and circumstances.

To omit other questions, the cardinal distinction between the French and the Scotch law is not, I think, without an important bearing upon the very question in debate, and I think it may be stated shortly thus:

If the wife by the marriage in Scotland acquired no proprietary rights whatever, but only what is called a hope of a certain distribution upon the husband's death, it is intelligible that that right of distribution, or by whatever name it is called, should be dependent upon the husband's domicil as following the ordinary rule that the law of a person's domicil regulates the succession of his movable property. But if by the marriage the wife acquires as part of that contract relation a real proprietary right, it would be quite unintelligible that the husband's act should dispose of what was not his, and herein, I think, is to be found the key to Lord Eldon's judgment in Lashley v. Hog. He says:

"The true point seems to be this, whether there is anything irrational in saying that as the husband, during the whole of his life, has the absolute disposition over the property, that, as to him, whom the policy of the law has given the direction of the family as to the place of its residence, that he who has therefore this species of command over his own actions, and over the actions and property which is his own, and which is to remain his own, or to become that of his family according to his will—why should it be thought an unreasonable thing, that where there is no express contract, the implied contract shall be taken to be that the wife is to look to the law of the country where the husband dies for the right she is to enjoy in case the husband thinks proper to die intestate."

It will be observed that the whole point of what Lord Eldon argues—that the whole of the property, apart from express contract, is absolutely and entirely the husband's, and that as by law he can dispose of it as he will it is not unreasonable that he should be at liberty to do something which by its legal effect will change what, I think, are inaccurately described as the rights of the wife, but are accurately described as what would have been the rights of the wife if no change had taken place, because in substance she has no rights at all.

Doubtless it is true that, according to the authorities on Scotch law, the right of the wife is no right at all in its strict sense. When speaking of the jus mariti it is described as a legal assignation to the husband, and in commenting on this authority the late Mr. Fraser, while at the Scotch bar, in his book on the Law of Husband and Wife (2nd ed.), vol. 1, p. 677, says:

"At a very early period of our law, the distinction between the two rights was recognized. The right of administration was regarded as being nothing more than its name imports—a right of administering the property of the spouses, while the jus mariti was something separate and superior, its purpose being to transfer the property from one spouse to the other. The distinction is settled and taken in a number of cases, ranging from an early period to the present time, and has not been so clearly marked in some institutional works, solely from the desire of the writers to reconcile it with the notion of an absolute veritable communio." . . . "The distinction is thus stated in argument in the Session Papers of Gowan v. Purcell: The jus mariti over the movables is a right during the existence of the marriage of absolute property. The husband may sell, or squander, or wastefully destroy the movables that fall under communion."

How different the position of the wife is under the French law is sufficiently indicated in contrast to the above extract by section 1443 of Code Civil, which enacts that:

"1443. A separation of property can only be judicially sued for by the wife whose dowry is in danger, and when the disorder of the husband's affairs is such that there is reason to fear that his property will not be sufficient to satisfy the wife's rights and claims. Any voluntary separation is void."

And if the propositions are put shortly—that the wife acquires no proprietary rights by marriage under the Scotch law at all, but under the French law acquires a real proprietary right, the distinction between the two systems is evident enough. The communio bonorum in Scotland is a mere fiction. In France it is a reality, and in England, as the Master of the Rolls says, the parties to the litigation now being discussed, Mr. and Mrs. Hog, were both English, married in England, where her unsettled property, existing and after acquired, became the property of Mr. Hog by the mere fact of the marriage, and gave Mrs. Hog no proprietary right whatever to the movable property in question.

Once it is admitted that the marriage gives a proprietary right, and therein is the importance of the distinction Lord Eldon took between what was inaccurately argued in that case, as a proprietary right conferred by the fact of marriage and a real proprietary right conferred by specific contract, the anomaly pointed out by the Master of the Rolls and sought to be explained, becomes at once intelligible.

It is only material as illustrating what was the prevailing train of thought in the minds of Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn. Both of them speak of the words "implied contract," by which I presume they mean implied from the relation of husband and wife, and not unnaturally they deduce the conclusion that if it is implied from that relation only, the husband's change of domicil may bring with it the consequential change from such relation.

Here, however, as I have endeavoured to point out, the French marriage confers not only an implied but an actual binding partnership proprietary relation fixed by the law upon the persons of the spouses, the binding nature of which, it appears to me, no act of either of the parties contracting marriage can affect or qualify.

I can only account for the absolutely inaccurate use of the Scotch term jus relictæ as arising from a reference to a dispute that appears to have existed in the Scotch authors as to whether those rights flowed from the communion; whereas, to quote again from Mr. Fraser's book, p. 671, where he says:

"It has been found, in accordance with the opinions of the French commentators, of Dirleton, and other lawyers of our own country, that the jus relictæ and legitim are in all respects the same; that they are mere casual contingent rights during the subsistence of the marriage, existing then only in hope, and coming into proper right merely at its dissolution, that they are not rights of division of a fund already held in common, but rights of debt against the husband's executors, constituting the widow and the children creditors, whose right comes into being by the husband's death, and secondary creditors too, for all other debts must be paid before theirs."

It is therefore, as I understand the case, that when once Lord Eldon came to the conclusion that the husband and wife had become Scotch domiciled spouses, the rights not affected by a previous complete and irrevocable right would properly be distributed according to Scotch law.

It follows, therefore, if I am right, that that case is not binding on your lordships, and that we are at liberty to decide the question now in dispute in accordance with reason and common sense.

I therefore move your lordships that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the respondents do pay to the appellants their costs both here and below.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—In 1854 Mr. De Nicols, the testator, and the appellant, who is now his widow, intermarried in Paris. They were both French by birth and both domiciled at the time in France. They married without a contract of marriage, and consequently under the law of France they became subject to the system of community of goods.

In 1863 Mr. and Mrs. De Nicols left Paris and came to London. They acquired an English domicil, and in 1865 Mr. De Nicols obtained a certificate of naturalization in this country. From that time forward their residence in England was continuous. Mr. De Nicols became a restaurant proprietor in London. He was successful in business, and amassed a large fortune consisting of both movable and immovable property.

Mr. De Nicols died in February, 1897, having made a will in the English form and language.

The question for your lordships' consideration is whether Mr. and Mrs. De Nicols continued subject to the system of community of goods after they became domiciled in England. On the one hand, it is contended that the change of domicil from French to English destroyed the community altogether, and therefore that the testator's will operated upon the whole of the property vested in him which, but for that change, would have been common. On the other hand, it is said that the community continued notwithstanding the change of domicil, and that Mr. De Nicols remained bound by the article of the Code Civil which provides that a testamentary donation by the husband cannot exceed his share of the community.

If the case were not embarrassed by the judgment of this House in Lashley v. Hog, which was discussed so fully at the bar, it would not, I think, present much difficulty.

Putting aside Lashley v. Hog for the moment, the only question would seem to be what was the effect according to French law of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. De Nicols without a marriage contract? Upon that point there cannot, I think, be any room for doubt. It is proved by the evidence of M. Lax, the expert in French law called on behalf of the appellant, that, according to the law of France, a husband and wife intermarrying without having entered into an ante-nuptial contract in writing are placed by the sole fact of the marriage, and stand precisely in the same position in all respects as if previously to their marriage they had in due form executed a written contract, and thereby adopted as special and express covenants all and every one of the provisions contained in articles 1401 to 1496 in Title V. of the Code Civil, headed "Of Marriage Contracts and the respective Rights of Spouses." In support of this conclusion M. Lax refers to the relevant articles of the Code and to a decision of the highest authority pronounced by the Cour de Cassation in January, 1854. The case as reported by Sirey presents the argument so clearly and so concisely that I may be pardoned for referring to it more in detail. The summary in Sirey's Reports is as follows: "The conjugal association as to property once formed at the time of the marriage by the operation of the law of the domicil or nationality of the husband cannot be altered later on either by a change of nationality or by the acquisition of a new personal domicil subsequently to the marriage": Tables Générales (Contrat de Mariage), paragraphe 8. The case was this—an Englishman and an Englishwoman—a Mr. and Mrs. Boyer were married in England without any settlement. Afterwards they went to France and jointly acquired immovable property there. The husband became a French citizen. The wife died first. On her death duty was demanded and paid on one-half of the property as having devolved upon her children as her next-of-kin. An action was brought for return of the duty. The tribunal of Lille ordered repayment, holding that "the matrimonial compact in respect of property is as immutable as the marriage itself of which it is an accessory." The Revenue authorities appealed. The Cour de Cassation affirmed the decision. They founded their judgment upon their view of English law, which seems right enough, and upon the following considerations—that "the rule of the marriage of the spouses Boyer has followed them to France when they went there to settle and there acquired property," and that "the said rule has the same force as if a formal contract had been entered into between the said spouses for the regulation of their fortune." Although this reasoning may not seem quite in accordance with the opinion which Lord Eldon expressed in Lashley v. Hog as to the effect of an English marriage without a settlement, it indicates, I think, conclusively the view which according to French law would be taken of the compact as to property constituted by a French marriage under the Code Civil without an ante-nuptial agreement. The expert who was called on behalf of the executors does not attempt to contravene this conclusion of law. He endeavours to minimize its effect by treating it as a self-evident proposition—as, in fact, being nothing more than what the Code declares. He adds, however, that in his opinion the effect of a change of domicil or nationality upon the community system was never considered by the framers of the Code. That may be so. But if there was a valid compact between the spouses as to their property, whether it was constituted by the law of the land or by convention between the parties, it is difficult to see how that compact can be nullified or blotted out merely by a change of domicil. Why should the obligations of the marriage law under which the parties contracted matrimony, and which according to the law of the country where the marriage was celebrated are equivalent to an express contract, lose their force and effect when the parties become domiciled in another country? As M. Lax points out, change of domicil and naturalization in a foreign country are not among the events specified in the Code as having the effect of dissolving or determining the community. Let us suppose a case the converse of the present one. Suppose an Englishman and an Englishwoman having married in England without a settlement go to France and become domiciled there. Suppose that at the time of the acquisition of the French domicil the husband has £10,000 of his own. Why should his ownership of this sum be impaired or qualified because he settles in France? There is nothing to be found in French law, nothing in the Code Civil, to effect this alteration in his rights. Community of goods
